P R E F A C E.

WHOEVER has had frequent occasion to recur to the Proceedings in Parliament, of former times, must have experienced those difficulties which it is the object of the present Work to remove. Merely to find the several works wherein is contained an account of the Parliamentary Proceedings, is, at this day, no easy matter; some of them being very scarce, and others excessively voluminous. Hardly any of them, those of the last twenty years excepted, are to be purchased regularly at the Booksellers. The far greater part of them are to be come at by accident only; and, of course, sometimes not to be obtained at all. But, supposing them all to be at hand, the price of them is no trifling object; and, in many cases, must present a difficulty not to be easily, or, at least, willingly, surmounted. Of these works, taken in their chronological order, the first is, "The Parliamentary or Constitutional History," in Twenty-four Volumes; the second, "Sir Simonds D'Ewes's Journal of Queen Elizabeth's Parliaments;" the third, "Proceedings and Debates of the House of Commons in 1620 and 1621, collected by a Member of that House, and published from his Original Manuscript in the Library of Queen's College, Oxford," in Two Volumes; the fourth, "Chandler's and Timberland's Debates," in Twenty-two Volumes; the fifth, "Debates of the House of Commons, from the year 1667 to the year 1694, collected by the Honourable Anchitell Grey, Esq., who was thirty years Member for the town of Derby," in Ten Volumes; the sixth, "Almon's Debates," in twenty-four Volumes; and, the seventh, "Debrett's Debates" (now in the hands of various Booksellers) in Sixty-three Volumes. These works are not to be purchased, if to be purchased at all, under One Hundred and Ten Pounds sterling. But still, with all these, the information wanted is very imperfect, without perpetually having recourse to the Journals of the two Houses, which Journals occupy upwards of a hundred volumes in folio: so that the price of a complete set of the works, in this way, cannot, upon an average of purchases, be reckoned at less than One Hundred and Fifty Pounds.

PREFACE.

These difficulties surmounted, another, and a still more formidable obstruction to the acquiring of information is found, not merely in the number and the bulk of the volumes, but also in the want of a good arrangement of the contents of most of them ; and, further, in the immense load of useless matter, quite unauthentic, and very little connected with the real Proceedings of Parliament, to be found in many of them. In the first-mentioned Work, we find a narrative of battles, sieges, and of domestic occurrences. The real Proceedings of Parliament form but a comparatively small proportion of it ; whole pamphlets of the day, and very long ones, being, in many places, inserted just as they were published and sold ; and, when we come down even to the Debates by Almon and Debrett (taking in Woodfall and others occasionally), we find, that, in numerous instances, three-fourths of the volume consists of Papers laid before Parliament, of mere momentary utility, repeated in subsequent and more correct statements, and now nothing but an expence, and, what is much worse, an incumbrance to the reader, and a constantly intervening obstacle to his researches ; to which may be added, with respect to all the Debates from Almon's inclusive, downwards, that there is a total want of all that aid which is afforded by well contrived Running Titles, Tables, and Indexes, and which is so necessary in every voluminous work, particularly if it relate to the transactions of a long series of years.

With a view of removing all these difficulties, and of putting the Public in possession of a History of the Proceedings in Parliament, from the Norman Conquest to the year 1803, (when the Work entitled, " Cobbett's Parliamentary Debates" commenced) as complete as that which has met with such general approbation in this last-mentioned Work, the present publication is undertaken. The Sixteen Volumes, of which the Work will consist, and the first of which is now presented to the Public, will be printed in the same form and size as those of the " Parliamentary Debates," with this difference only, that the character of this Work, which has been cast expressly for the occasion, will, in the same compass, introduce one-fifth more of matter. When, therefore, it is recollected, that so large a part of the several Works above enumerated, is taken up with matter, as before described, wholly unconnected, or having but a very remote connection, with the Proceedings in Parliament, and entirely destitute of authenticity ; when it is recollected also, how much room is saved by the abbreviation of words descriptive of titles and of constantly-occurring phrases of courtesy, the reader will not be surprised, that the whole of the Authentic and Useful Records of the Proceedings of the Parliament of England, of that of Great Britain, and of that of the United Kingdom, down to the year 1803, will be comprised in the Sixteen Volumes of this Work, which will, upon the best computation that can be made, contain as much print as One Hundred and Forty common octavo volumes.

The present Volume, comprising the period from the Conquest to the Death of James the First, has been compiled principally from the Records, the Rolls of Parliament, the Parliamentary or Constitutional History, and from the most reputable English Historians. From the Reign of Henry the Eighth inclusive, we have the additional aid of the Journals of the House of Lords; and from that of Edward the Sixth, that of the Journals of the House of Commons. Sir Simonds D'Ewes' Journal of Queen Elizabeth's Parliaments, has been diligently consulted, and the Debates of the House of Commons in the years 1620 and 1621, published from the Manuscript in the Library of Queen's College, Oxford, have been carefully incorporated, under their respective dates. The State of the Peerage, and Lists of the Members of the House of Commons have, from time to time, been given: and at the close of the Parliamentary History of each reign, will be found Lists of the Public Acts passed; together with an account of the Taxes imposed, of the Supplies, of the State of the Revenue, and of the Value of Money in relation to the Price of Provisions.

To the Volume is prefixed a copious Table of Contents, and a variety of useful Lists of the Persons who have filled the several high Offices of the State from the Conquest down to the Death of James the First. It was originally intended to give an Index to each Volume; but, at the suggestion of several eminent literary persons, it has been determined to undertake A GENERAL INDEX of the whole Work, which will be constructed upon the excellent Plan recommended by the Committee of the House of Commons in 1766, and afterwards adopted by the persons employed to make out the Indexes to the Journals; which General Index will, of course, be contained in the Volume with which the Work will close.

PREFACE.

In a Work of this nature, the utmost impartiality is justly expected; and it is with confidence presumed, that a careful perusal of the following pages will convince the reader, that that impartiality has been strictly and invariably adhered to. Nothing has been inserted without due authority; and, as the object has been, not so much to dive into matters of Antiquity, as to preserve what was really useful, many things have been omitted which would have swelled the bulk of the work, without adding to its usefulness. Nothing, however, has been left out, which was not judged to be spurious or not agreeable to the design of such a Collection; nor any thing added, merely on account of its being favourable to the reputation or the doctrines of any party whatever. In short, whatever appeared to have been actually said or done, in either House of Parliament, that had any tendency to what ought to be the chief object of such a publication, has, as far as authentic materials could be procured, been recorded with scrupulous fidelity.

It would be improper to conclude, without returning thanks to the several Noblemen and Gentlemen, who have obligingly offered the use of their valuable collections, some of which have already been found to be of great advantage to the undertaking, and others will, in the course of the work, be applied for and gratefully received. The many judicious suggestions, which have, from various quarters, been communicated, have been, and in future will be, carefully attended to; and, it is hoped, that the execution of the Work will prove that no pains, of any kind, have been spared to render it equal to that expectation, which, with respect to the manner as well as the matter of it, has evidently been conceived by no inconsiderable part of the well-informed men in this kingdom.

With the literary aid which the Compiler has received, the Public has, perhaps, strictly speaking, little to do; but, he cannot, for one hour, exist under the idea, that the whole of the merit, whatever it may be, should be ascribed to himself, to the exclusion of the invaluable talents and exertions of the Gentleman, who is his principal assistant, and upon whom no small share of the execution has devolved.

Botley, October 1806.

COBBETT'S

Parliamentary History.

ON THE ORIGIN OF PARLIAMENT.

THE origin or first institution of parliament lies so far hidden in the dark ages of antiquity, that the tracing of it out is equally difficult and uncertain. The word parliament is comparatively of modern date, derived from the French, parler, and signifying the place where they met and spoke, or conferred together. It was first applied to general assemblies of the states, under Lewis VII. in France, about the middle of the 12th century: but it is certain, that long before the introduction of the Norman language into England, all matters of importance were debated and settled in the great councils of the realm; a practice which seems to have been universal among the northern nations, particularly the Germans, and carried by them into all the countries of Europe, which they over-ran at the dissolution of the Roman empire. In England this general council hath been held immemorially, under the several names of michel synoth, or 'great council;' michel gemote, or 'great meeting;' and more frequently, wittena gemote, 'or the meeting of wise men.' It was also styled in Latin, commune concilium regni, magnum concilium regis, curia magna, conventus magnatum vel procerum assisa generalis; and sometimes, communitas regni Anglia. We have instances of its meeting to order the affairs of the kingdom, to make new laws, and to amend the old; or, as Fleta expresses it, novis injuriis emersis nova constituere remedia, so early as the reign of Ina, king of the West Saxons, Ossa, king of the Mercians, and Ethelbert, king of Kent, in the several realms of the heptarchy. The laws of Ina, which were made and published about the year 720, are there said to be done by the advice and consent of all his aldermen and senior wisemen of his kingdom, besides a great number of the clergy, met together on that occasion. The same is mentioned at the end of the laws of Athelstan, as well as those of Ethelred his successor. But who these wise men were, whether lords or commons, or both together, we are not able to determine. The chronicle of John Brompton mentions a great council, or assembly, to have been held at

Salisbury, in the days of king Edgar, about the year 970, of all the nobles in the kingdom; and another at Oxford, by king Canute the Dane, in the year 1030. These are all, or the strongest, instances, that can be produced of councils, or parliaments, being called, by our Saxon kings, to make laws before the Conquest. On the other hand, sir R. Filmer, dr. Brady, and others, deny that the commons had any place or power in these assemblies until long after that period. They say indeed that the Saxon kings used to convene the nobles and bishops of the realm, to consult with them how to defend themselves in case of an invasion, to levy taxes, or to promulgate some new laws amongst the people, or to be witnesses to public charters. This last is evident from several Saxon charters, copied and preserved by historians, as well as some originals still extant amongst us, wherein, besides the king, the nobility and bishops, to a considerable number, signed with him. But then these authors assert, that the whole body of the commons were in an entire vassalage to the nobility and clergy at that time, and long after, and had nothing they could call their own, no, not so much as their lives. That this was the case of the commons till some time after the conquest, appears pretty plain, but with the lords it was otherwise; for sir Henry Spelman tells us in his 'Glossary,' that, besides what has been said of their conventions in the times of the Saxon kings, William I. composed his great assembly, or magnum consilium of the nation, from those tenants that held of him in capite; and that parliamentary barons were created, by this king's writ, out of those of good possessions; whereby William reserved to himself a tenure in chief by knight's service. These judges were at that time the supreme judicature; but the origin of the house of peers, as to its transcendant power, does not seem plainly to appear till the reign of Henry III. when special writs of summons were sent out to the nobility distinctly by themselves. But waving these controversies, it is generally agreed, that in the main, the constitution of parliament, as it now stands, was marked out so long ago as the 17th year of king John, A. D. 1215, in the Great Charter granted by that prince; wherein he promises to summon all archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and greater barons, personally; and all other tenants in chief under the crown, by the sheriff and bailiffs, to meet at a certain place, with 40 days notice, to assess aids and scutages when necessary. And this constitution has subsisted, in fact, at least from the year 1266, 49 Henry III. there being still extant writs of that date, to summon knights, citizens, and burgesses, to parliament.—The power and authority of parliament, in the making of laws, and in proceeding by bill, or other ways, have been so largely treated on by others, and will be so completely developed in the course of our history, that it appears unnecessary to enlarge upon them in this place. With regard to the more antient acts, ordinances, journals, &c. of the two houses of parliament, much more might be said than would be consistent with the substance of this short introduction. The curious reader will find them admirably and concisely treated upon in abp. Nicolson's 'English Historical Library;' to which work we refer him; and, without further introduction, shall now proceed to give an impartial narrative of the parliamentary proceedings of each respective reign.

WILLIAM I.

In the year 1072, and in the 6th of his reign, William I., at the instigation of the pope, summoned a national synod, to determine the dispute betwixt the sees of Canterbury and York, about supremacy. As this was entirely an ecclesiastical controversy, it does not appear that this meeting, which was before the king and Hubert, the pope's legate, at Windsor, consisted of more than the prelates, abbots, and other ecclesiastics of the realm.

HENRY I.

In 1106, says Matthew Paris, Henry I. convened his nobles, by a special edict, on a very extraordinary occasion. His elder brother Robert, whom he had dispossessed of his right of succession to the English crown, came over from Normandy to make him a friendly visit. Henry, being jealous that this visit might turn to his disadvantage, and being more afraid, says our author, of man than God, he first cajoled his nobles, by crafty promises, to be true to him; and next thought that he could make up the matter with God by the building of an abbey, which he was then about to execute. For this reason he called together the great men of the realm, by his royal mandate, to meet at London; where he first softened and sweetened them separately, by honied words and expressions; and then, being met together, he made a speech to them as follows: which speech, as it is the first on record that came from the throne, only preserved by M. Paris, and taken notice of by very few historians, either ancient or modern, justly claims a place in our history:—'My Friends and faithful Subjects, both Foreigners and Natives; You all know very well, that my brother Robert was both called by God and elected king of Jerusalem, which he might have happily governed; and how shamefully he refused that rule, for which he justly deserves God's anger and reproof. You know also, in many other instances, his pride and brutality. Because he is a man that delights in war and bloodshed, he is impatient of peace. I know that he thinks you a parcel of contemptible fellows; he calls you a set of drunkards and gluttons, whom he hopes to tread under his feet. I, truly a king, meek, humble, and peaceable, will preserve and cherish you in your antient liberties, which I have formerly sworn to perform; will hearken to your wise councils with patience; and will govern you justly, after the example of the best of princes. If you desire it, I will strengthen this promise with a written charter; and all those laws which the holy king Edward, by the inspiration of God, so wisely enacted, I will again swear to keep inviolably. If you, my brethren, will stand by me faithfully, we shall easily repulse the strongest efforts the cruellest enemy can make against me and these kingdoms. If I am only supported by the valour and power of the English nation, all the weak threats of the Normans will no longer seem formidable unto me.'—Paris adds, that this harangue of Henry to his nobles had the desired effect, though he afterwards broke all his fair promises to them. Robert went back much disgusted, whom his brother soon after followed, gained a victory over him, took the duke prisoner, put out his eyes, and condemned him to perpetual imprisonment.—In 1107, Henry called another convention of all the estates of the realm to sit in his royal palace at London. In this assembly, the prohibiting the priests the use of their wives and concubines was considered; and the bishops and clergy granted to the king the correction of them for that offence; by which means he raised vast sums of money, compounding with the priests, for certain annual payments, to allow them the enjoyment of their wives and concubines.—In 1116, another convention of the nobles and barons was summoned by the king to meet at Salisbury. At this meeting the whole nobility did homage to him and to prince William, Henry's eldest son, in the presence of the father. The dispute betwixt the archbishops of York and Canterbury, about primacy, was also debated at this convention.

Taxes in this king's reign.

In the reign of Henry I. taxes were levied arbitrarily, as they were in the two preceding reigns of his brother Rufus and his father. In his 6th year, he set a sum upon every parish church, and forced the incumbent to pay the money to redeem his church. In his 8th year, he received for the marriage of his daughter Matilda, 3s. for every hide of land. And, according to historians, during his whole reign he levied a constant annual tax of 12d. on every hide of land. It does not appear that the king asked the consent of his barons or people for raising these subsidies.

STEPHEN.

We meet with one convention of the estates in this reign, and that was in the first year of it; for Stephen, anxious to have his title confirmed by their authorities, summoned all the bishops and nobles of the realm, by his royal edict, to meet at Oxford for that purpose. At this meeting Stephen signed, and gave a most extensive charter, wherein the rights and immunities of the church were largely and principally secured to the clergy. At the tail of this charter, Stephen also promises to punish or remove the high sheriffs, or any other of his officers, that shall use any unjust or illegal exactions on the people; and that he will well and truly keep all the good old laws and customs in all cases whatsoever. The barons and other great men, besides the bishops, who were witnesses to this charter, and consequently present at this convention, were Roger the chancellor, Henry the king's nephew, Robert earl of Gloucester, William earl Warren, Ralph earl of Chester, Roger earl of Warwick, Robert de Vere, Miles de Gloucester, Robert d'Oilly, Brian son to the earl Constable, Wm. Martel, Hugh Bygot, Humphrey de Bohun, Simon de Bellocampo, sewer, Wm. de Albany, Martel de Albany, butlers, Rob. de Ferrers, Wm. Reverel, Simon de Silvanecti, Wm. de Albania, Hugh de S. Clare, Ilbert de Lacy; dated at Oxford, in the year of Christ 1136, and the first of his reign. Richard, the prior of Hexham, from whom we now quote, and who has best preserved the annals of this king, has given us this charter; the preamble to which, as it evidently shews the title that Stephen claimed to the crown, may be acceptable to the reader. It is as follows:—
'I Stephen, by the grace of God, the consent of the clergy and people, being elected king over England, and consecrated by Wm. abp. of Canterbury, legate of the holy Roman church, confirmed by Innocent, pontiff of the same see; for the respect and love I bear to God, do declare holy church to be free, and do confirm all due reverence unto it, &c.' In 1152 he called a general council to London, and proposed to them the coronation of his son Eustace; that, says our author, he might deprive duke Henry, son to the empress Matilda, of his right of succession; and particularly required the archbishop, to whose ancient right it belonged to consecrate kings, to perform that office upon his son. The prelate boldly answered, that the pope, by his letters, had forbidden him to crown or anoint his son, because he himself, contrary to his oath, had usurped the kingdom. The king, his son, and all that favoured them, were angry at this repulse, and shut up all the bishops, with their primate, in one house, that by threats and terrors they might extort that, which, adds our authority, neither by price nor prayer they could prevail in. Some of the bishops were intimidated, and began to stagger; which the primate perceiving, found means to make his escape out of the house; and getting over the Thames in a boat, fled to Dover, and so beyond sea. For his resolution in this affair and flight, the king seized upon and spoiled all his lands and possessions.

HENRY II.

Henry II. summoned a general assembly, or, as some will have it, a parliament, in 1156, the second year of his reign, to meet at Wallingford; wherein the bishops and barons swore to the succession of his sons Wm. and Henry, and the king confirmed the charter of the realm.—In 1164, he called together a much greater assembly, and which comes the nearest a parliament of any thing we have yet met with. This convention of the estates was held at Clarendon, and consisted, as M. Paris writes, of the archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, and nobles of the realm; over whom, by the king's command, John de Oxford, his chaplain, was made president. In this assembly the king carried it with a very high hand against the prelates and holy church, say the Monkish writers, and even forced Thomas à Becket, abp. of Canterbury, with the rest of them present, to swear to 16 articles, drawn up for that purpose. These articles, at large in M. Paris and other ancient writers, called the 'Constitutions of Clarendon', have been so often copied by the moderns, that it is needless to insert them here.—There was also another assembly of the bishops and barons, called to York, in 1171, in which Malcolm king of Scotland, and his successor William, appeared and did homage to Henry for that kingdom.—In 1176, Henry, at Northampton, by and with the advice and consent of his son, the bishops, earls, barons, knights, and others, constituted and appointed justiciaries, in six different parts of the realm, three in each division; who were sworn to execute justice impartially to every one.—Again in 1186, another convention of the estates was called to meet at Gayntington, and by their consent he imposed the same tax upon his subjects in England, which he had just then executed in Normandy and the rest of his foreign dominions. This was imposed in order to carry on a war, jointly with the king of France, against the Turks and Saracens, for the recovery of the Holy Land.

Taxes in this king's reign.

Taxes seem to have been raised in this king's reign as arbitrarily as before; in the beginning of it there was a scutage, but there is no account what it amounted to. A 2nd scutage was made in the 5th year of his reign, amounting to 180,000l. In his 7th year a 3d scutage was raised, at two marks every knight's fee. In the twelfth, 2s. in the pound for the first year, and 1d. a pound for four years after, of all rents and moveables. In the 14th of his reign a 4th scutage, at a mark a knight's fee. In the 18th, a 5th scutage; uncertain what it was. In the last year of this king's reign, a 10th on all moveables, for the crusade.

RICHARD I.

In this king's reign we meet with a convention of the estates, in 1189, the very first year of it. At this time the French king sent an ambassador to acquaint the king of England, that he and the whole noblesse of France had sworn to go and attempt the rescue of the Holy Land from the hands of the Saracens; and invited Richard and his nobles to join with them in this holy undertaking. Upon this embassy, the king convened the bishops, earls, and barons of the realm, says M. Paris, to meet at Westminster, when, acquainting them with the French king's invitation, it was readily agreed to accept of it, by Richard and his peers: the king and the nobles taking the same oath, set out from England some time after, to meet the French, and prosecute this holy war with their joint forces.—Soon after his return, in 1194, the king thought fit to call a parliament, at Nottingham; where it is said by some, that queen Eleanor, his mother, was present, and sat on his right hand. But Roger Hoveden, who is very particular in his account of this assembly, and what was done at it, writes, 'that the king sat in state, with Hubert, abp. of Canterbury, on his right hand, and Geofry, abp. of York, on his left.' The rest of the bishops and peers that composed this meeting, and are mentioned, were Hugh bp. of Durham, Hugh bp. of Lincoln, William bp. of Ely the king's chancellor, William bp. of Hereford, Henry bp. of Worcester, Henry bp. of Exeter, and John bp. of Whitehaven; David earl of Huntingdon, brother to the king of Scots, Hamelin earl of Warren, Ralph earl of Chester, Wm. earl Ferrers, Wm. earl of Salisbury, and Roger Bigot earl marshal. On the first day of their session, which was March 29th, the king deprived Gerhard de Canville of the possession of the castle of Lincoln, and his office of sheriff of that shire; Hugh Bardolph of the castles of York and Scarborough, the custody of Westmoreland, with the office of sheriff of Yorkshire; and exposed them to sale. The abp. of York bought the sheriff's office for that county for 3000 marks, and an annual rent of 100 marks. On the 2d day the king demanded judgment against his brother John, for having, contrary to his oath of fealty, usurped his castles, and entered into a confederacy with the king of France against him; as also against Hugh de Navant, bp. of Coventry, for adhering to him and his other enemies. It was determined that they should both appear upon a day fixed, to answer according to law; which if they refused to do, the earl should be banished, and the bp. undergo such penalty both from clergy and laity as his crime deserved. On the 3d day the parliament granted to the king 2s. from every plough-land in England: besides he required a 3rd part of the service of every knight's fee for his attendance in Normandy, and all the wool that year of the Cistercian monks, which being judged too hard, he compounded with them for a fine. The 4th and last day was spent in hearing and determining of grievances and accusations; and so this assembly broke up after coming to a resolution, 'that to nullify the act of submission, which Richard had been obliged to perform to the emperor, he should be crowned again,' which accordingly was performed on the Easter following, at Winchester.

Taxes in this king's reign.

In the first year of it a scutage of 20s. was laid on every knight's fee. In the 2nd, for the armament to carry on the holy war, 2 saddle horses and 2 sumpter horses were taken of every city; of every abbey one saddle horse and one sumpter horse; and of every manor of the king's the same as the abbies. For his ransom, when prisoner to the emperor, of every knight's fee 20s.; 1-4th of the rents of the laity; 1-4th of the rents of some clerks, and 1-10th of others; all the gold and silver the churches had; and all the wool of that year the Cistercians had, as well as the monks of the order of Sempringham, who never were taxed before. The sum the emperor demanded for king Richard's ransom was 140,000 marks of silver. For liberty of tournament, every earl gave 20 marks, every baron 10 marks, every landed knight 4 marks, and every knight of fortune 2 marks. In 1185 and 1196, were raised the sum of 1,100,000 marks, but it is not said how; also an aid of 5s. of every plough-land. Great sums were also raised by seizures, fines, and compositions, and sale of the demesne lands. So much money went out of the kingdom on this expensive crusade, and for the king's ransom, that not one genuine coin of this king's stamp is to be met with in the collections of the curious.

JOHN.

In 1200, the first of his reign, John called together the estates of the realm to meet at Lincoln; where, also, say our historians, he had summoned Wm. king of Scotland to appear and do homage to him for that kingdom. The Scotch king came, and the ceremony was performed on a hill near Lincoln, in the presence of all the noblemen of both kingdoms, and all the people. This convention is also called a parliament by some old writers, though for what reason we are not able to learn, for there were no laws of any kind enacted at it. But, in 1204, we find a meeting of the nobles called, much more like a parliament than the last. They met at Oxford on the 2nd of Jan. but by what writ they were summoned is not specified.

Here was granted to the king 2½ marks of every knight's fee; nor did the bishops or abbots, or other of the clergy, depart without a promise of the same.—The storm betwixt this king and his barons beginning to grow high, Stephen Langton, abp. of Canterbury interposed, and with much ado prevailed upon John to call a parliament, or convention of estates, which met at London, in St. Paul's cathedral. Here the abp. produced a charter of Henry 1st. by which he granted to his people their ancient liberties, which had been violated by the unjust exactions of his predecessors, such as were according to the laws of king Edward, and with those amendments which his father, by the council of his barons, did ratify. This charter, which is still extant in M. Paris, being read amongst the barons, they were much rejoiced at it; and swore in the presence of the abp. that for these liberties they would, if need required, spend their blood; and making an agreement with the prelate to that end, they broke up without any answer from the king.—We now come to the time when Magna Charter, or the Great Charter of our liberties was granted, or rather forced from this king by his barons. This being the fundamental part of our English laws, stands in the front of all our printed statutes, and is the great bulwark betwixt the power of the crown and the liberties of the subject. This charter was first granted in form by king John, in the 16th year of his reign; after a long series of civil wars betwixt him and his barons, of which our chronicles give a melancholy and terrible description. The king being at last hard put to it by the barons; deserted almost by every one; and having, as M. Paris writes, scarce 7 horsemen left to guard his person, thought it high time to sooth his angry nobles, and therefore sent Wm. Mareschal, earl of Pembroke, with some others, to the lords, then at London, to tell them that he would grant the laws and liberties they desired. The ambassador and his message were received with great joy by the barons, who appointed a time and place, according to the king's desire, for the meeting.—This great assembly of the king and the barons, was in a place betwixt Windsor and Staines, called Runny-mead. On the 15th of June, 1215, the king and the nobles met in this meadow; on the king's side appeared with him the archbishops of Canterbury and Dublin, the bishops of London, Winchester, Lincoln, Bath, Worcester, Coventry, and Rochester; Pandulph, the pope's agent and master of the order of Templars in England: of noblemen, Wm. Mareschal, earl of Pembroke, the earls of Salisbury, Warren and Arundel; Alan de Galewey, Wm. Fitzgerald, Peter Fitzherbert, Tho. Basset, Mat. Fitzherbert, Allan Basset, Hugh de Nevile, Hubert de Burg, Robert de Roppelay, John Mareschal, and Philip de Albiney. On the part of the barons, says M. Paris, appeared such a number, that it seemed as if all the nobility of England was collected into one body. At length, adds our author, after they had treated on various subjects, the king, knowing full well that his strength was much inferior to that of the barons, without the least seeming reluctance, agreed to several articles, and confirmed them by his charter. Next follows the charter at length, in M. Paris, as well as the Charta de Foresta, granted at the same time; which forest-laws and customs, as they could not be inserted in the same schedule with the former, by reason of their length, says M. Paris, made a different instrument, and was witnessed accordingly.

HENRY III.

In 1223, a meeting of the barons was summoned to London; where the king met them, Jan. 13th, in the same year. At this conference the abp. of Canterbury, and other great men, requested the king that he would confirm the liberties and free customs for which a war was made with his father; urging, moreover, that when Lewis left England, both the king and all the nobility had sworn to observe, and cause to be observed, those liberties, and therefore could not refuse to do it. Upon which Wm. Briwere, one of the king's council, replied, 'That the liberties they desired were violently extorted, and therefore ought not to be observed.' The abp. of Canterbury in a passion reproved him, and said, 'that if he loved the king he would not hinder the peace of the kingdom.' The king, seeing the prelate much moved on the occasion, assured them, 'that he had bound himself by oath to preserve their liberties, and what was sworn he would observe.' And having called a council he forthwith sent his letters to all the sheriffs in the kingdom, to make enquiry by the oaths of 12 knights or legal men, in every county, what were the liberties of England in the time of king Henry his grandfather, and to make a return of them to London 15 days after Easter.—The next year, 1224, the king met the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, and, says M. Paris, many others, summoned to appear at Northampton, to treat about the affairs of the kingdom: The king being willing to take the advice of his great men, concerning his foreign dominions, which the king of France had then in his possession. But their negotiations were interrupted by a rebellion, which, at that time, broke out very near them. One Falcasius, or Fauke de Brent, had seized upon Braibroke, one of the king's itinerant justices, for setting a fine upon him for committing much spoil and rapine in the country, and had imprisoned him in his castle at Bedford. The king and his great council being much scandalized at such a bold proceeding, ordered the castle to be besieged; which it was, and taken, and 24 of the garrison hanged up on the walls of it; the rebel himself found means to fly into Wales; but by the intercession of a bishop he was introduced to the king, fell down at his feet and implored his mercy; urging his former services for his pardon. The king, by the advice of his council, having first taken from him his castles, lands, and goods, committed him to the custody of the bishop of London till further orders. After this, the assembly granted to the king, for his great trouble and expences, 2s. of every plough-land; and the king, in return, granted the barons two marks sterling of every knight's fee, to be levied on their tenants.—In 1225, Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster, where it appears that the barons, &c. were summoned. Here it was, that in a very full assembly, of both clergy and laity, Hugo de Burgh, the king's justiciary, in the presence of them all, declared, 'the damages and injuries the king sustained in his dominions beyond sea; wherein, not only the king, but, also, several earls were thrown out of their possessions. That seeing many were concerned, the assistance ought to be proportionable; he therefore required their counsel and aid, that the royalties of the crown and their antient rights might be recovered; for the retrieving of which, he thought, the 15th part of all moveables, both of ecclesiastics and laics, would be sufficient.' This being moved by the chief justice, the peers, after some deliberation, returned this answer to the king, 'that they would readily satisfy his desires, if he would grant to them their long desired liberties.' To this the king consented, and charters were forthwith writ, sealed with the king's seal, and one directed to every county in England. To the counties, also, where there were forests, two charters were directed; one concerning their common liberties, and the other the liberties of the forest. The tenor of these charters are the very same with those of king John. A month after Easter, a day was set to choose 12 knights, and legal men, who upon oath should distinguish the new forests from the old ones; and whatever forests were found to be made after the coronation of Henry II. were forthwith to be disforested. The council being ended, charters were carried to every county; and, by the king's command, every one sworn to observe them. The way and manner of levying this 15th was directed by the king; and because it is very particular to know how 15ths were raised in those days, Dr. Brady has printed the record of it in the Appendix to his 'Complete History.' In this parliament, also, the barons granted the king the wards and marriages of their heirs; which proved what it was then called, by those who had a view into the consequences of things, initium mali.—The same year, in the month of March, another assembly of the great men was called; but nothing more was done at it than the trial of Falcasius, the rebel above-mentioned; when the king, with the consent and advice of the nobles, condemned him to perpetual banishment.—Thus far matters went very even betwixt this king and his barons; but now, Henry, being arrived at manhood, wanted to knock off the shackles which were imposed, as he thought, on the royal prerogative, by the granting of the Great Charter, &c. notwithstanding he had, at his coronation, sworn to keep them inviolably, and had publicly confirmed this oath at several times after. To this purpose, in 1227, at an assembly of the peers, called to meet together at Oxford, the king told them, 'that since he was now arrived at a lawful age, for the future he would be released from the government of others, and take the reins of it into his own hands.' He then by his authority cancelled Magna Charta and Charta de Foresta; giving this reason, 'that those charters of liberties were made and signed when he was not his own master, but under the government of others, and consequently could not be valid, because he was not bound to keep what he was forced to promise.' This declaration, says M. Paris, occasioned great murmuring in the assembly; and all ascribed this act of the king's to the advice of his prime minister, Hubert de Burgh, at that time chief justice of England; who, adds our authority, was grown so much in the young king's favour, that no advice but his own was the least regarded. At the same time, it was told the churchmen, 'that the king intended to maintain their liberties, provided they would all take out new charters, esteeming the old ones as no ways valid.' And as a more mortal wound to the clergy, a fine was laid, not according to their abilities, but what the prime minister demanded, that they were obliged to pay.

In 1232 the king kept his Christmas at Winchester, and upon the 7th of March following he met the nobles, as well prelates as laics, at Westminster; to whom he declared, 'that his late expedition abroad had involved him in very great debt, by which he was now absolutely obliged to require a general aid.' To this demand Ranulph, earl of Chester, replied, in the name of the noblemen, 'that the earls, barons and knights who held of the king, in capite, had personally served him, and had been at great expence to no purpose; whereby they were reduced to poverty, and therefore of right they owed no aid to the king at that time.' Then the lay-lords, asking leave, departed. The prelates, &c. answered for their parts, 'that many bishops and abbots, who were summoned, were not yet come up; and therefore desired that it might be deferred, and a day appointed for all to meet together, and consult what ought to be done in that business.' The king agreed to this, and the meeting was fixed to be 15 days after Easter.

Some time after this, a great storm was raised against Hubert de Burgh, the king's prime minister, and chief justice of England: he was accused of several high crimes and misdemeanors, recounted at large by M. Paris: that he had been guilty of several treasonable practices, and given treacherous advice to the king, much to the prejudice of both him and the kingdom: that he had procured Wm. earl of Salisbury, Wm. Mareschal earl of Pembroke, Falcasius de Brent, and Richard abp. of Canterbury, to be poisoned; and that he had gained the king's affections by sorcery and witchcraft. He was accused, also, of injustice, extortion, and rapine. All which extraordinary crimes were urged so home against the favourite, before the king, that he caused it to be publicly proclaimed in London, that whoever had any complaint against Hubert should come before him, and justice should be done to the offended.—On the 14th of Sept. the king summoned the bishops and other prelates of the church, with the nobility of the kingdom, to meet at Lambeth; by whom the 40th part of all moveables belonging to all bishops, abbots, priors, clerks and laymen, was granted to the king, for the payment of the debt which he owed to the earl of Britain. At this convention, also, Hubert de Burgh was required to give in his answer to the several articles preferred against him; as it had been stipulated by the king. But Hubert, says M. Paris, fearing that the king would put him to some shameful death, thought fit to abscond and shut himself up in a sanctuary amongst the canons at Merton, in Surrey; waiting for a time to give in his answer when the king was in a better humour. Henry, enraged at this, sent to the mayor of London to force Hubert from his sanctuary, and bring him before him dead or alive. The Londoners, glad of this opportunity to be revenged of Hubert, for hanging a favourite citizen of theirs, rung the alarm-bell, and instantly, near 20,000 of the meaner sort were collected together, to whom the mayor read the king's letter, and desired them to be all ready in the morning to perform the king's commands. But some of the graver sort of citizens, dreading the ill consequence of raising such a mob, went to the bishop of Winchester's house in Southwark, and desired his advice, who told them plainly, that whatever came of it they must execute the king's precept. Struck with this strange episcopal advice, says Matthew, they retired; and accordingly, next morning, the same number of citizens, or more, appeared in arms, and, with colours flying, marched towards the sanctuary. Hubert, when he heard of this, gave himself up for lost, and throwing himself on his knees before the high altar of the church, recommended both his soul and body to God. But Ranulph earl of Chester had hinted to the king, that if such tumultuous proceedings were countenanced, a sedition might be raised, that would not be easily appeased, adding that it would be a great reproach to the king abroad, when it was heard that he thus treated those who had been his favourites. The king was staggered at this, and immediately dispatched two messengers with letters to the mayor to revoke his former precept. The citizens were amazed at these counter orders; but, however, notwithstanding they missed of their prey, they all went quietly back to their own homes. These things happened whilst the aforesaid convention of the nobles was sitting at Lambeth, in order to have Hubert brought before them. Hubert, however, escaped the fury of his enemies for that time; and having soon after delivered up all his immense riches to the king, it so softened Henry's heart, that if he did not wholly forgive him, yet he granted him all his lands again; and Hubert only remained a state prisoner in the castle of Devizes for some time. In the place of Hubert de Burgh, Henry soon got a new favourite, ten times more obnoxious to the barons than the former. This was Peter bishop of Winchester, who with Peter de Rivall, his kinsman, now governed the king and all the public affairs of the kingdom. These men, being foreigners, invited over into England several Poitevins and Bretons, to the number of 2000 knights and servants, who were placed as garrisons in several castles; and to these the easy king committed the wardships of the nobility, which afterwards much degenerated by being ignobly matched to these foreigners. And when any Englishman complained of their burdens and oppressions to the king, they were hindered from any redress by the powerful influence of the bishop of Winchester. By these means, the flame that burnt so fiercely in his father's time was again lighted up in the kingdom; for Henry, having sent out his letters, says Paris, to call the barons together to a council, to be held on the feast of St. John, in the year 1233, at Oxford, the barons absolutely refused to obey the king's command, by reason that they feared the treachery of the foreigners, who then swarmed at court, and because they had conceived a just indignation against the king, for preferring the Poitevins to his own natural subjects. This refusal they had delivered to the king in a very solemn manner; who, being much exasperated at the barons for this affront offered to his authority, took advice of his lawyers how he should compel them to obey. The king was advised to summon them a 2nd and a 3rd time, to try whether they would appear or not. But one in the council being so bold as to tell him, that it would be to no purpose, nor would the barons ever obey his mandate, or he enjoy any peace, unless he would remove Peter bishop of Winchester, and Peter de Rivall, from his councils; the king sent again to his barons, to summon them to meet at Westminster, on the 10th of July following, and there, by their advice, he promised to amend whatsoever was amiss, or by right ought to be amended. But when the barons had heard that the king only sought to ensnare them; that he had actually got over from abroad a set of banditti, or robbers, with arms and horses for that purpose; they could see no signs of concord, and again refused to come to him; sending special messengers to the king, with this positive demand, 'That if he did not, without more delay, dismiss Peter bishop of Winchester, with the rest of the Poitevins, from his court, they would never obey any of his summons; but instantly drive him and his evil counsellors out of the kingdom, and elect a new king.' Henry was amazed, and his court terrified, at the haughtiness of this extraordinary message; but yet, by the advice of the bishop, he sought to repel force by force, seized upon several manors belonging to the barons nearest him, declaring the rest of them traitors, and that he would give their estates to his foreigners. However, the year after, 1234, the king was better advised, and the bishops and barons met him at Westminster, in order to settle, in this general council, the national disturbances. The abp. of Canterbury, with the rest of the prelates, went to the king and his council, and told him, boldly and openly, 'That if he would not consent to the conditions the lords had already proposed to him, and agree with his faithful subjects, that he, with the bishops, would immediately excommunicate him, and all his evil counsellors.' The thunder of the church had a better effect on the king than the threats of the barons; and, says our author, he humbly and meekly answered the prelates, 'That he would do whatsoever they desired.' Accordingly, in a few days, he sent Peter bishop of Winchester to his see, there to take care of his flock, and never more to meddle with state affairs. Peter de Rivall he stript of all his castles and wealth, which he had unjustly acquired; affirming, with an oath, that if he did not instantly go into holy orders, and take a benefice, he would order both his eyes to be put out. Moreover, he banished all the foreigners from his court, and from all the castles they were possessed of, into their own country, commanding them never to see his face again. And thus, says Paris, the king, having dismissed all his evil counsellors, recalled to their obedience his natural subjects; and hoped, by the advice of the prelates aforesaid, to restore his harrassed kingdom to peace and tranquillity.

In 1236 another select council of the bishops and peers was called to Merton, where the king's marriage with Eleanor, 2nd daughter of Raymond earl of Provence, was notified, and some foreign affairs transacted, of no consequence to our design. We call this a select meeting of the peers, because we are told that it was only composed of the abp. of Canterbury, the bishops of his own province, and the major part of the earls and barons. It was here, however, that the 'Statutes of Merton' were made and enacted, which have ever since formed a part of the statute law of England.

In 1237, whilst the king and his whole court kept Christmas at Winchester, the royal writs were sent out, says M. Paris, to every part of the kingdom, commanding all and singular archbishops, bishops, abbots, installed priors, earls, and barons, to appear, without delay, at London, on a day appointed, there to treat on the urgent affairs of the kingdom. Accordingly, an infinite number of the nobility, adds our authority, from all parts of the nation, came to London, imagining some matters of very great moment were in agitation. In Westminster-Hall they met, in order to know the king's pleasure; when a certain priest, called William de Kele, a domestic chaplain of the king, a man very discreet, and learned in the laws of the land, and one who was a sort of mediator betwixt the king and peers, stood up and delivered the king's will and purpose in this manner: 'Our lord the king commands me to acquaint you, that he will entirely submit himself to your advice, both in the present affair and hereafter. Nevertheless, he must inform you, that the people he entrusted with the management of his treasury have given in false accounts of the receipts. The king, therefore, finding himself destitute of money, without which a king is a cipher, craves help of you to supply him. In this manner, however, that what money you please to collect may be made use of for the kingdom's service, in a way that some of you, chosen for that purpose, may think proper.' Not one of this assembly expecting such a message, it was received with great discontent. The lords answered with great indignation, 'that he had promised and broke his word many and many a time with them; asserting, that it was derogatory to their honour to suffer a king so easily seduced, who never either repulsed any, or the meanest of the nation's enemies, or even alarmed them; who was so far from enlarging the bounds of his kingdom, that he rather streightened and subjected it to foreigners, to extort from them, by the same arguments, at so many different times, so much money, to the great detriment of his own subjects, and the benefit of strangers.' The king, finding his nobles in this temper, sought to soften them, lest the discontent should prove more general, by promising upon his oath, 'never more to injure or molest them, provided they would kindly grant him, for his present use, the 30th part of all moveables throughout the realm. He said that he had sent a great deal of money to the emperor, the most of it out of his own treasury, for the marriage of his sister.' To this it was loudly answered, 'that he did all those things without the advice or consent of his subjects; nor was it necessary that they should partake of the punishment who were no ways guilty of the crime.' The lords, after this, withdrew themselves into a private place, that they might be more at liberty to consult together on the exigency of this affair, and the king's demand. Whilst the lords were making this secession, Gilbert Basset, not careful enough of his words, adds our author, said openly to the king, 'My lord the king, send some of your own friends to go along with the barons to their consultation.' He sat whilst he said this very near the king. On the other hand, Rd. de Percy, much moved with this saying, stood up and answered him, 'What is it, friend Gilbert, that you say? Do you take us for foreigners, and not the king's friends?' Basset was reproved for his rash and indiscreet advice: nevertheless, by these debates, this meeting was prolonged four days.—At length the king again confirmed to all his subjects their Magna Charta, and swore to keep it inviola-

ble; and because, says M. Paris, he did not think himself quite free from a sentence of excommunication, which Langton, then abp. of Canterbury, with the rest of the bishops, had denounced against all violators of that charter when it was made; he therefore declared, 'that if he went about to break this promise, by any new mischievous design, he should think himself under the full weight of the church's sentence.' By this declaration, adds he, the hearts of the whole audience were in a moment changed to the king's side; and, having appointed the earl of Warren, Wm. Ferrers, and John Fitz-Geofry, to be of council to him, he made them swear, 'that by no gifts or reward they would be drawn from the truth; but that they should at all times give him such wholesome counsel as was only conducive to the good of himself and kingdom.' After which, the king's demand was granted, and the 30th part of all moveables was levied through the realm. The manner how this tax was gathered, by officers appointed for that purpose, may be seen at large in M. Paris.

The 14th of Sept. in this year was appointed by the king and the pope's legate, Ottoboni, for a meeting of the peers at York, to treat upon some great affairs that concerned the kingdom. The king of Scots met them there, to make an end of the difference depending between Henry and him. After much consultation and debate, it was agreed that the king of Scots should have 300l. lands by the year in England, for which he should do homage to Henry, but should not build any castles upon it, and was to quit all pretences to any farther claim.—Henry, having quickly got rid of his last supply, was obliged to use the same means to gain another. In the same year, another assembly of the peers was called to meet at Westminster, where the king laid before them his grievances, asserting by oath, that his money was all gone, and that he was scarcely worth a groat, and therefore demanded the same supply as the former. After some disputes and much murmuring, this demand also, being the 30th part of all moveables, was granted.

We meet with no other convention of the estates till 1242, when by the king's writ they were all, as before, summoned to appear at London, on the Wednesday before Candlemas Day. The old animosities were here raised again; the barons engaged one another by oath, not to consent to give any money at all; and when the king demanded it, they answered him with great bitterness, 'that such were his councils, and such his insolent manner of asking, that they would not do it; that he had fleeced and impoverished his subjects so very often, drawing his exactions into consequences, as if they were the meanest slaves; and all this money which he had extorted had been wasted scandalously; therefore they flatly told the king to his face, that they would not be so robbed and plundered any more.'

The king, says Paris, well versed in Romish tricks and illusions, commanded them that they should wait to know his pleasure, on the morrow, on this and other matters; but in the mean time adds, that he drew them one by one into his closet secretly, in the manner that penitents go to confession to their priest; and there, what he could not do with them altogether, he strove to gain by fair speeches to them singly; promising, among the clergy, this man an abbey, another a priory, and so on, till he found he could make nothing at all of them, for not one of them would recede from the common answer which they had sworn to stick to. Henry, growing angry at their obstinacy, said, 'what, would you have me perjured? I have sworn by the blessed sacrament to carry my arms against the king of France, in order to reclaim my just rights; and without you grant me an ample supply, I am not able to perform it.' Yet neither by these, or any other words, could he gain upon them, notwithstanding the politic method he took to bring them over to his interest.—He then thought proper to call before him those of the barons that were his own officers at court, and spoke to them in this manner: 'What a pernicious example have you set to others? You, who are earls, and barons, and mighty men at arms, ought you, though others are intimidated, to tremble like a set of bishops and priests? You ought to be more eager to defend the rights of the crown, and by deeds of arms oppose yourselves against all its enemies. I called this assembly to strengthen and defend my rights, with a sure expectancy, that they would suffer my affairs to go on prosperously, after the example of Wales, where of late we so happily triumphed. And with what face can you leave me, your sovereign lord, with the heavy burthen of state upon me, so poor and desolate; especially when you know my promise to go abroad, and that I have sworn strictly to perform it.' When the purport of this speech was made known to the whole assembly, they returned the king this answer: 'Your majesty gives us great occasion to wonder into what gulph you have thrown that vast quantity of money which, by various and cruel extortions, you have raised, as well from churches kept vacant, as from the lands of the nobility, creating horror in the minds of the hearers. Besides, you have called over certain legates, or those that did the office of legates, into this kingdom, that, like gleaners after the vintage, have plucked from us all the money we had left. It is therefore less to be wondered at, that without the consent, or even advice, of the nobility of England, you have involved yourself in such difficult and dangerous negotiations; staking your faith to those that have none; and, despising the favour or esteem of your own subjects, you have brought yourself into a very doubtful state of fortune. The league that was made betwixt the king of France and you, and which you swore from your soul to keep inviolably to the end, being transacted also by your most noble brother, earl Richard, and earl Roger Bygot on your part, you have most dishonestly and scandalously broke.'—These, with some other matters, being urged home to the king, he fell into a very great rage, and swore bitterly, 'that he would not be hindered of his design by any thing they could say or do; but that he intended to begin the war in France in a very short space of time, let the consequence be what it would.' And thus, says our authority, this council was dissolved, with very great heartburnings on both sides. However, lest this answer of the barons to the king should be forgot or misconstrued, it was thought proper to reduce it into writing, which, being in the nature of a Protest, is the first of the kind we meet with. It is in these words:—

'Since, by the king's command, the lord archbishop of York, the rest of the bishops, abbots, and priors in England, by themselves or proxies; also all the earls, and most of the barons of England, have met at Westminster, on the Wednesday before the Purification of the Blessed Mary, in the year of our lord 1242, and in the 26th of the reign of Henry III. to hear the will and pleasure of the king, for which he summoned them. And the said lord the king, sending unto them the said abp. with the noble lord earl Richard, and master Walter of York, provost of Beverley, as his solemn messengers, to notify to them the king's mind and business, and to ask the advice and assistance of the lords, in sustaining his hereditary dominions beyond the sea, that regard his kingdom of England; therefore the said bishops, abbots, priors, earls, and barons, taking the king's message into their serious consideration, returned the king, by the same lords, this advice, viz. that the king should wait until the truce betwixt him and the French king was expired; and if the said king of France should chance to enterprize any thing against the form and tenure of the said truce, that then the said king of England should send unto him solemn messengers, to ask advice, and to put the said French king upon holding the said truce, and forbearing those enterprizes, if they were made by him or by his subjects. That if the said French king refused to do this, that then they freely, to this advice, would lend all their aid and assistance; which they all unanimously consented to. Likewise, that since he had been their sovereign lord, they had many times granted him supplies; first, the 30th part of all moveables, after that the 50th, and then the 60th; a 40th part on all carucats and hides of land; many scutages, and one very great scutage, for the marriage of his sister to the emperor. After all this, truly, 4 years were scarce elapsed, but he again sought another aid; and at last, after much entreaty, a 30th was also granted him; with this condition, however, which he ratified by charter, that neither this, nor any former exactions, should stand as precedents for others. Besides this, the king then granted to them, that all liberties contained in Magna Charta should in a more ample manner be held through his kingdom; and to that end gave them a smaller charter, in which it is so included. Add to this, that our said lord the king, of his own free will, and by the advice of his whole assembly of barons, granted to them, that all the money rising from this 30th part should be laid up safely in the king's castles, under the guardianship of 4 English noblemen, the earl Warren, and others, by whose direction and advice the said money should be disbursed, for the service of the king and kingdom, whenever it was necessary. And because the barons never knew nor heard that the said money was expended by the advise and consent of the aforesaid lords, they do verily believe that the king is still possessed of that money, and therefore cannot now have occasion for more. They are likewise well acquainted, that since that time he has had so many escheats, as that of the archbishoprick of Canterbury, and other rich bishopricks of England, as well as of the lands of the deceased earls, barons, and knights, who held of him; that even by these very escheats he ought to have a large sum of money by him, if it was properly taken care of. Besides, from the time of giving that 30th part, his itinerant justices have not ceased to make their circuits through all parts of England, as well with pleas of forest, and with all other pleas; so that every county, hundred, city, town, and almost every village in England has been grievously amerced; and by these circuits alone great sums of money have been collected for the king's use. From all which they can well aver, that the kingdom is so burthened and impoverished, that they have little or nothing left for themselves. And because that our lord the king, after the grant of the last 30th part, never kept to his charter, therefore it more than usually troubled them; and since, by another charter, he granted that these exactions should not be made precedents; therefore they positively made answer to their said lord the king, that they would not, for the present, grant him any aid. Nevertheless, as they acknowledged him to be their sovereign lord, they should be willing to give him the best advice in their power, if he would carry himself well towards them to the end of the said truces.'

When the lords appointed for that purpose had waited upon the king with this answer to his demand, they returned to the assembly, and told them, 'that the king desired to know of them, what they proposed to do if the French king should break the truce before the expiration of it? They promised also, on the king's part, that if he had injured any particular baron, that he would make reparation, as the lord Peter of Savoy, and others of his council, should think fit to advise.' To this the lords replied, 'that if the king of France should break the truce, and would not forbear his enterprizes, then their counsel was the same they had given to be done at the end of the truce, provided they were satisfied of the truth of these facts. As to that which related to particular injuries received from the king, they would not at that time enter into pleadings with him about them. That on the grant of the last 30th, the same thing was promised on the king's part, as well and faithfully, by Wm. de Kele; and how well the king had kept his promises, he himself best knew.'

In the year 1244, Henry summoned another assembly of the great men to meet at Westminster; and, sitting in state amongst them, in the refectory of the abbey, there, says M. Paris, 'with his own mouth asked a pecuniary aid from them.' The king's private intention was to reduce the king of Scots; but he openly pretended that, having by their advice passed into Gascony the year before, by that undertaking he had contracted great debts, from which he desired them to relieve him. The barons answered, 'that they would consult about his proposal.' The archbishops, bishops, abbots, and priors, withdrew by themselves to treat of this affair; and then they asked the earls and barons to consent to what they had resolved upon; who answered, that they could do nothing without the whole community. It was then agreed to by all, that from the clergy should be chosen this committee, the abp. elect, Boniface, of Canterbury, the bishops of Winchester, Lincoln, and Worcester: on the part of the earls, were earl Richard, the king's brother, earl Bygot, the earl of Leicester, Simon Montfort, and the earl mareschal: on the barons' part, Richard de Monfitchet, John de Bailiol, with the abbots of Ramsey and Bury. What these 12 should do was to be communicated to the whole, that nothing might be offered to the king which had not the common assent.—Now, because the charter of liberties, which the king granted some time ago, and for which Edmund, the abp. of Canterbury, on behalf of the king, had sworn to observe, was in no wise kept; and because the aids that had so often been given before were not used to the advantage of the king and kingdom; and likewise, by default of the chancellor, writs were granted and issued, contrary to justice; therefore it was desired, 'that such a chancellor and such a justice might be chosen, as would fix the state of the kingdom on its old basis.' The king, lest he should seem to do any thing new by compulsion, would not grant the petition of the nobles; but promised, 'that he would amend what he had heard was amiss.' Upon this the assembly was adjourned for 3 weeks; and if, in the mean time, the king should, of his own accord, choose such counsellors that would manage the laws and rights of the kingdom to the satisfaction of the nobles, then they designed to give him an aid; yet so, that it should be expended to the advantage of the kingdom, by the advice of the committee of 12 before mentioned.—When the king saw that he could do nothing with them altogether, he tried the clergy apart again; and, having got the pope's letter to them, in which he required, admonished, and exhorted them to give the king a liberal donation of money; their answer was, 'that they were engaged, and could do nothing without the common consent of the estates concerned with them.'—The great men and prelates met at London, according to the time of adjournment, to treat about the demand of an aid; where the king again renewed to them, and promised entirely to keep, the charter of liberties which he had sworn to at his coronation; and gave the bishops leave, in their respective dioceses, to excommunicate himself and all others that should act contrary to its intent in any article. Yet, for all this, he could only obtain 20s. of every knight's fee, of those who held of the king in capite, towards the marriage of his eldest daughter; half to be paid at Easter, and the other half at Michaelmas following.—Henry met with somewhat worse treatment from another assembly of his barons, called also in this year, when the king, says Paris, with great earnestness, not to say impudence, demanded a pecuniary aid of those whom, adds the author, he had so often injured, in this manner, and laughed at them for it. But this we find, was as resolutely denied, with one accord, by the barons, even to his face.

In a parliament held at London in 1246, some severe laws were made against such as robbed parks or warrens. If the malefactor fled, and was killed in the pursuit, there was neither law nor appeal allowed for his death. If any earl, baron, or knight complained to the king that his deer were stolen, an inquisition was made by the king's writ; and, if he that was indicted was convicted of the same, he was to lie in the king's prison a year and a day; and to pay three years value of his estate, having just sufficient allowed out of it to maintain him; after which the king was to have two parts, and he that received the injury one; then the convict was to find 12 sureties that he should never do the like again, in parks, warrens, nor forests, nor do any other thing against the king's peace; of all which his sureties were to answer for his body and transgressions. Also, if any one was taken in a park, or warren, without the king's writ of inquisition, he was to be imprisoned, fined, and to give sureties as before.—But, in the same year, 'a most general parliament,' (says M. Paris) of the whole kingdom met at London, according to summons, relative to an ecclesiastical affair of the utmost consequence to the nation. It seems the pope had been strongly solicited by the king to remove several grievances which were greatly complained of, and which he had promised to reform. The substance of these grievances were—'1. That the Pope, not content with the payment of Peter-Pence, oppressed the kingdom, by extorting from the clergy great contributions, without the king's consent; against the ancient customs, liberties and rights thereof; and against the appeal of the proctors of the kingdom, in a general council at Lyons.—2. The church and kingdom were greatly injured in that the patrons of churches could not present fit persons to them, because they were given by the Pope's letters to Italians, who understood not the English language, and carried all the money out of the kingdom, to the great impoverishment of it.—3. The nation was oppressed by the Pope's exaction of pensions from churches, and by Italians succeeding Italians.—4. The English were forced to prosecute their rights, out of the kingdom, against the customs and written laws thereof; and against the indulgences granted by the Pope's predecessors to the king and kingdom of England.—5. The church and kingdom infinitely suffered by reason of the clause of non obstante, which weakened and enervated all oaths, antient customs, written laws, grants, statutes, and privileges. And, 6. That in the parishes where the Italians were beneficed there were no alms, no hospitality, no preaching, no divine service, no care of souls, nor any reparations done to the parsonage-houses.—The king, in consideration of these papal usurpations, had summoned this parliament; and at the meeting conferred with the bishops apart, the earls and barons apart, and the abbots and priors apart, in order to find out their sentiments and the properest way to get these grievances removed. The result of all was to try the mildest way with the holy father; and it was agreed that the king should write singly to him, the bishops by themselves, the earls and barons by themselves, and the abbots and priors by themselves. All which letters are preserved by M. Paris, and by their humble and submissive stile, evidently shew that the fear of the vatican thunder, bulls, and interdicts, was terrible in those days. Notwithstanding these reasonable remonstrances to the see of Rome, we do not find that they produced any effect, for the grievances complained of continued, through the course of this whole reign.

In 1248, another assembly of the nobles was called, by the king's writ, to meet at London, in order, says our author, to treat of the affairs of the kingdom, at that time sadly disturbed and much impoverished. The old demand, the want of money, was again urged, and the same murmurings began on the part of the barons against it. They said, 'They admired the king did not blush at making such a demand of them; because he had given them his charter, when the last demand was granted, to which the lords scarcely consented, that he would not again load his subjects with such exactions: that he was greatly to blame for his indiscreet calling over of foreigners, on whom all the good things of the kingdom were scandalously and prodigally wasted; that even the daughters of the nobility were by his means married to ignoble strangers, without their mutual consent, which is the cement of matrimony; and his own natural born subjects set aside and despised. He was blamed, also, says M. Paris, that whatever in eatables, drinkables, or even in his robes, but particularly in wines, that he used, his custom was to take them by force from the lawful owners and venders of them; by these means greatly injuring his own subjects, as well as foreign merchants who brought goods into this kingdom. That the nation was scandalized and impoverished, the merchants got nothing from the king but law-suits, or some mean trifle in return, whence thousands of terrible curses are called down on him, to the danger and disgrace of the whole kingdom. Moreover, that, in order to get greater gifts and premiums from these merchants, he had seized upon their wax, silks, and other merchandize, in order to make them pay for the return; to the dishonour of himself and the whole kingdom; and not without grievous offence to God. That in all these things he so tyrannized, and studied to be cruel; that even the poor fishermen on the sea-coasts, who take herrings, or other fish, were not permitted to dispose of them according as they liked, nor dare the inhabitants of the towns on the sea-coasts purchase them, but the poor men thought it safer to put to sea with them, even in stormy weather, in order to dispose of them in foreign markets. That these miserable traders were so cruelly treated by the king's collectors, that punishment was added to loss, for after receiving injury upon injury in their proper persons, their carts and horses were taken away from them, and driven into secret places. That he kept in his hands several rich bishopricks and abbacies, founded by their pious and noble progenitors, and made himself both guardian and governor of them, to their utter destruction; contrary to the solemn oath which he, principally, swore at his coronation. Lastly, the king was very much blamed, by all and singular the complainants, that he had neither chief justice, chancellor, nor treasurer in his council, as he ought to have, and as his most noble predecessors had before him; but those officers he had were allowed to do their own will and pleasure, provided he gained thereby; not promoting the public good, but seeking, only, their own preferment, being suffered to get as much money as they could, provided his customs and rents were but first paid.—The king, when he heard all this, was much confounded within himself, and ashamed, says M. Paris, because he knew it all to be very true. He promised, therefore, 'That, certainly and truly, all these faults should be amended;' hoping by this humility, though it was feigned, to bend their hearts to the granting his demand more easily. But the barons, more exasperated at this seeming complaisance, answered again, 'All this will be made manifest in a little time; we have waited hitherto patiently, and as our king carries to us, so we in all things will behave towards him.' Thus, adds our author, matters were delayed and postponed, from Candlemas, when this convention met, to the feast of St. John the Baptist, to which time they were prorogued. In the mean while the king became more hardened and more exasperated against his barons; so that the aforesaid grievances still remained unredressed. At the day appointed all the nobility met again at London, and were received by the king with the following speech:

'My lords and peers of England—You are all of you willing, I find, to have my mind bent to your own wills, and have not treated your king at all civilly, in this matter. You would have me submit to your pleasure, and yield to any terms that you think fit to offer. By this you impose a very slavish condition on me, and deny me that liberty and authority which every master exercises in his own family. For surely, every master of a family may use whose and what counsel he pleases; and, in his own house, put in or put out what officers he thinks fit; yet all this you presume to deny to your lord and king. As servants, therefore, ought not to judge or impose any difficulties on their masters, so neither should vassals any on their prince. The servant is not above his lord nor the disciple above his master; and what is your king more than your servant, if he is to obey your commands? Therefore my resolution is, neither to remove the chancellor, justiciary, nor the treasurer, at your pleasure; nor will I appoint any other. I expect a sufficient aid of money from you for the defence and recovery of my rights beyond sea, in which you are also equally concerned.'—To this speech, the barons unanimously returned this short answer, 'That they would no longer impoverish themselves, to enrich foreigners; as they had formerly done, when they gave money for the king's expedition into Gascoigny and Poitou.' And thus this parliament was dissolved without any satisfaction either to their sovereign or themselves: but the king was hereby reduced to so great a necessity, that he was obliged to expose to sale his jewels, plate, and other rich utensils of his house.

In March, 1251, a great parliament was held at London, in which Henry de Bath, chief justice of England, was called upon to answer to several crimes and misdemeanors alledged against him. The king himself was his prosecutor. He was very angry with the justice, that he came thither, as it were, guarded, by a great number of armed men of his wife's kindred and his own, as well as all his servants; he accused him more highly than the rest, laying to his charge, amongst other things, 'That he was a disturber of the whole kingdom, by exasperating all his barons against him, from which a general sedition might be expected.' Therefore the king caused it to be proclaimed by the common cryer at London, and in court, that if any person had any cause of action, or complaint, against Henry de Bath, they should come into court before the king's presence, and there they should be fully heard. By these means many complaints were urged against him; and one of his own brother justices openly protested, that he suffered a very great villain, imprisoned and convict, to escape unpunished, having received several rich gifts for that purpose. Upon which, says M. Paris, the king, being much provoked, mounted up on high, and called out with a loud voice, that 'if any man whatsoever will kill Henry de Bath he shall be acquitted of his death, and I pronounce him acquitted accordingly; and then the king withdrew hastily. There were many present, adds Paris, that would have done this lord of Bath's business for him soon, had not the lord John Mansel interposed, and prudently checked their fury. 'My lords and friends, said he, I am not against prosecuting him, but it is not necessary at all to be thus in anger; perhaps our lord the king by this time repents his rash expression. Besides, if you lay violent hands on Henry, behold the bishop of London will excommunicate you, and his military friends may revenge his death.' Thus, in a great measure their fury was appeased; and earl Richard, with the aforesaid bishop, taking up the matter, things were carried with more moderation against him. The king being afterwards privately informed, that there might be some gain in the case, and a certain sum of money being promised, the prisoner was released both from death and bondage; and in a short time after, on the payment of 2000 marks, was reconciled to the king, and entered again into his office, as if nothing had happened.

In another great convention of the estates which met at Westminster, in 1252, and continued, by adjournment, till after Easter, in the year following; the exactions of the pope on the clergy of England was the great subject of complaint; in regard that besides his other claims, he had now demanded a tenth of all the goods of the clergy for his own use. The history we quote from does not mention what was done to alleviate this complaint; and only adds, that at the next meeting, by adjournment, a curse was denounced, in the most solemn manner, by the abp. of Canterbury, and 13 other bishops, in Pontificalibus, against all persons who sought to infringe the liberties of holy church, and those of the great charters. This ceremony was performed before the king in the great hall at Westminster; the form of the Anathema itself is preserved in the annals of Burton, under this year.

The next year Henry went with an army into Gascoigny, and there recovered what had been taken from him in that country. During his absence, in 1254, another parliament was held in London, to which came, as special messengers from the king, the earl mareschal Roger Bygot, and Gilbert de Segrave: there were present at this meeting the queen, Rd. earl of Cornwall, the earl of Winchester, and all the bishops of England, except the two abps. and the bps. of Durham and Bath, who were with the king in Gascoigny. The assembly being all met, the king's prolocutor and messenger rose up and said—

'My lords and friends,—In whose breasts the king our master places his confidence, nor hath he any other refuge to fly to but to his faithful subjects. You all know very well how he has exposed himself, with courage and constancy, to the dangers of the sea, and to the uncertain fate of war, for the good of his kingdom. He found abroad the enemy very formidable and strong against him; some part of them he has already subdued, and the rest he hopes to conquer. The king of Castile, whom he expected to have found his very good friend, as well as kinsman, was his bitterest enemy, and proved very unfaithful to him; to whom the Gascoigns were greatly inclined, and would rather have a Spaniard for their king, than their own natural lord; therefore, the king being in a great strait, demands from you a powerful and sufficient aid to assist him.—Earl Richard first answered, and testified his steadiness, says Paris, in this memorable saying, ‘I that am more powerful and more obliged than the rest of you, will assist my lord and brother as much as I can, and therefore I will keep, at my own expence, 300 soldiers, by the year, to fight for him.’ The earl of Gloucester promised, also, an aid to the king, according to his power; adding, ‘that he would in no wise help the king to conquer countries, but would assist him against the king of Castile if he assaulted him.’ In this manner, also, earl Richard couched his promise, saying, ‘if things really be as they are reported.’ At these words the whole assembly took fire, and discovering the snare that was laid for them, immediately broke up without doing any thing; and earl Richard sent an account of it to his brother.

In the same year, another assembly of the nobles was called to meet at London, to whom the king, under his royal signet, sent an account of his extreme want of money; in order, as he said, to enable him to withstand the force of a very great enemy coming against him. To this he was answered by all and singular, says Paris, ‘that they had waited now full three weeks in London, in expectation of seeing earl Richard, and the rest of the nobles who were gone over to the king into Gascoigny; and that they were so often grieved with these exactions, that they could not live under them. That they would not refuse to go to the king’s assistance in person, if they were better assured that the king of Castile was coming against him as an enemy. Though they could but wonder, that when Simon earl of Leicester went into Gascoigny and subdued a great party of rebels, that the same king of Castile did not at that time assist them, in opposition to the interest of England.’

In 1255, soon after the king’s return from abroad, another parliament was called to meet at London. The king acquainted them with the great debts he had contracted, and that without their assistance he could not discharge them, and therefore, with much earnestness demanded a pecuniary aid for that purpose.—This parliament proved full as resolute against the king as any of the former. They began with recounting old grievances; and withal demanded that the chief justice, chancellor and treasurer might be chosen by the common council of the kingdom; as had been justly and antiently used; and likewise that they might not be removed but for the most apparent crimes, and by the deliberation and consent of the whole kingdom. Concluding with this extraordinary expression, ‘that they should never be able to bind their Proteus of a king, without he granted all that they demanded.’ But this the king resolutely refused; on which the barons declared that business should be deferred until the Michaelmas following; and this council was dissolved for that time.—The same year, on the feast of St. Luke, the nobility met again, by adjournment, at Westminster. Here the king first attacked his brother Rd. earl of Cornwall, and earnestly pressed him to give him an aid of money; to whom the pope also had wrote, requiring him to lend his brother 40,000 (without saying whether pounds or marks,) that he might set a pious example to others. But Richard, regarding his money more than either his brother’s wants or the pope’s letters, refused him the loan. And when the king moved the matter to the rest, they replied, ‘that at that time all had not been summoned according to the tenor of their great charter, and therefore they would then make no answer or grant any aid without the rest of the peers.’ This parliament, says Paris, by many fictitious delays, was continued a month, whilst the nobles were emptying their purses at London, and then returned home without doing any business.

In 1257, another parliament was called to meet at Westminster, in order to treat of the business of Apulia. To this meeting, says Paris, came such a multitude of persons, of all sorts, that London scarce could contain them. It seems that the crown of Sicily, and the small territory of Apulia, in Italy, had been offered to prince Edmund the king’s second son, by the pope the year before; provided the king would recover Sicily from the hands it was then in. This had been refused by the states, as a foreign country, not worth the trouble and expence of recovering; and Apulia now was rejected in the same manner, though the king came in person to this parliament with his son Edmund, clad in an Apulian, or Italian habit, says Paris, in order to induce their compliance. In this parliament Richard earl of Cornwall, the king’s brother, took leave of the peers, and soon after set out for Germany to be crowned king of the Romans; to which dignity he had been elected some time before.

In 1258, parliament was again summoned to meet at London. The king was pressed by the pope on the subject of Apulia, for it seems he had sent a kind of a legate to demand the money, which, upon the king’s request, he had obliged himself to pay to the merchants for that business. The king demanded a very large sum to clear himself of this matter; which the barons stiffly denied to assist him with. And in this parliament there arose great heats and contentions between the king and the barons, who made great complaints against him. They said 'that he slighted the keys and power of the church, and did not observe the tenor of his great charter; that he had raised to dignities and riches his half brothers, against law and right, as if they had been the natural people of the land, and would not suffer any writ to issue out of chancery against them. That although the pride of his brothers and other Poitevins was intolerable, yet Wm. de Valence exceeded them all.' Simon Mounfort, earl of Leicester, taking his advantage of these disputes, complained aloud, not to the king, but to the whole assembly, 'calling for justice; and charged the king with promoting and enriching strangers, despising and wasting his own people, to the subversion of the whole kingdom; by which means he became unable to repel the injuries of so inconsiderable a people as the Welch.'—These heats and debates continued for some time, when the parliament was adjourned to be holden at Oxford on the feast of St. Barnabas following. But, before the adjournment, the barons promised the king, 'that if he would reform the state of the kingdom, according to their advice, and the pope would make the conditions about the affair of Sicily, &c. more easy, so that it might be prosecuted with effect, they would then endeavour to procure him a common aid, or tax, for that purpose.' The king agreed so far, that before Christmas the state of the kingdom should be rectified by them, and the pope's legate, if in England. And for the performance of what should be ordained, he put himself into the pope's power, so as he might compel him to it, which way he pleased, by ecclesiastical censure. And to this he made his son Edward swear that he would observe and keep what he had granted.—At the same time he likewise granted to the barons, that the state of the kingdom should be rectified and reformed, by 12 faithful persons of his council then chosen, and 12 others to be chosen by the barons, who should meet at Oxford, a month after Whit-Sunday, next coming, to do every thing that they should see fit to the honour of God and the good of the kingdom. The king promised inviolably to observe whatsoever should be ordained by those 24, or the majority of them, under such security as they should direct. He made his son Edward swear, also, to these articles, and that he would inviolably keep and observe them; whereupon, says M. Paris, the earls and barons, on their parts, promised to endeavour that the parliament should grant him an aid. These 24 had power to elect 4 that were to choose the king's council, which was to redress and amend all matters appertaining to the king and his kingdom; and the council, or the greater part of it, was to choose one or more in the place of such as should make default.

On the feast of St. Barnabas all the great men and nobles arrived at Oxford, according to their adjournment; but came attended by all such as owed them military service. They sought to cover this proceeding by saying, that they came thus armed in order afterwards to go and attack the king's enemies, the Welsh; but their true reason was, for fear of the king's half brothers and the Poitevins drawing them into a snare. However, matters went better than they imagined; for in this parliament all the elections mentioned before were made, and 24 persons were chosen to amend and reform the kingdom.—The noble men who composed the grand committee of 24 demanded of the king: '1st, his confirmation of the charter granted by king John, his father: 2nd, that such a justiciary should be constituted, as would do justice to such as suffered wrong, as well to the poor as the rich: 3rd, that they should choose the judges, chancellors, treasurers, and other officers and ministers, from year to year, for ever: 4th, that they themselves, or friends, should have the custody of the king's castles: 5th, by edict they made it capital for any, of what degree or order soever, to refuse to consent to these things; and against such the abps. and bishops also pronounced sentence of excommunication.'—These 24 also ordained, that there should be three parliaments in a year, and when and how they should be holden: this order, translated from the original French, is as follows: 'Be it remembered, that the 24 have ordained, that there shall be three parliaments in a year; the 1st on the Octaves, or 8 days after st. Michael; the 2nd on the morrow after Candlemas Day; the 3rd on the first day of June, that is, three weeks before st. John. To these three parliaments shall come all the chosen counsellors of the king, whether summoned or not, to provide for the state of the realm, and to treat of the common business of the realm, when need shall be, by the command of the king or by his summons.'—The whole community then chose 12 persons to represent them in these parliaments, &c. to save the charges of the community. The entry or record of which election was to this purpose: 'Be it remembered, that the community have chosen 12 wise men to come to parliaments, and at other times when there shall be need, when the king and his council shall command or send for them, to treat of the business of the king and realm; and that the community will hold for established what the 12 shall do; and this shall be done to spare the cost or charges of the community.' Which 12, virī probi vel prudentes, as the record has it, were entered in this form: 'These are the 12 which are chosen by the barons, eslu par les Baruns, to treat in the three parliaments in a year, with the king's council, for all the commons, or whole community of the land, pur tut le commun de la terre, upon public business.—Many other provisions were made in this parliament relative to feudal tenures, custody of wards, marriages, and escheats; suits to the king's courts before justices itinerant, county courts, hundred courts, sheriffs' turns, writs of right, waste of estates in custody, taking of distresses, &c. 'all in abatement,' says dr. Brady, 'of the rigour of the feudal law, and for their own ease and benefit.'—All this was done, and commissions for the government of the king's castles were issued out in eleven days' time, as appears by the record of them, printed in dr. Brady's Appendix, No. 191, 2, 3, to which we refer the curious reader.

Early in 1265, and the 49th of the king's reign, was the famous parliament called; which, with another in the 18th of Edw. I. were certainly the models of our present English parliaments.—The business of this parliament was chiefly to treat about prince Edward's release, at that time a prisoner in Dover castle.—On the 8th of September, the king called a parliament, to meet at Winchester; where, by their advice, the liberties of the city of London were seized, and the greatest offenders committed to prison, to be punished at the king's pleasure. This parliament gave the king also all the rebels' lands; and, by their advice, he appointed two commissioners in each county, who, with the sheriffs, were to extend them, and return the extent, with the names of the lands and their owners, to him at Westminster, by the 13th of Oct. following. The commission bears date at Winchester, Sept. 21; and Paris adds, that the king disinherited all those that stood for Montfort against him and gave their lands to those who had faithfully served him.

This severe sentence on the earl of Leicester's followers was strictly put in execution; but the cry of the sufferers was so great, that it induced the pope's legate, Ottoboni, then in England, to take their case into his protection. To this purpose he requested the king to call a parliament, which he granted, and it was summoned to meet at Kenelworth, Aug. the 22nd, 1266. Here it was agreed, by the common assent of the bishops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, and all others, that six persons, viz. the bishops of Exeter and Bath, and Worcester; sir Allan Zouch, sir R. de Sumery, and Sir R. Walerand, by their oaths there made, should choose six others, who would, according to their judgments, do the best for the security and peace of the land. To these 12 were committed the case and facts of the disinherited, with full power from the king and parliament to hear and determine all matters concerning it; which determination was called the Dictum de Kenelworth. If there arose any difference between the 12, that was only to stand good and firm which received the assent and approbation of the legate, and Henry, son to the king of the Romans; and they were to finish their work by the feast of All Saints.—This determination and award was made to better the condition of the disinherited, and to turn the forfeitures and loss of their estates into a composition for them; and therefore, 'all who began the war and persevered in it; all who violently and maliciously kept Northampton against the king; all who fought against the king at Lewes; all who were taken at Kenelworth under the command of young Simon Montfort, had plundered Winchester, or were in any other place against the king, which he had not pardoned; all fighting against him at Evesham; all that were in the fight at Chesterfield; all that freely sent their service, that is, horse and arms, against the king or his son; all bailiffs and servants of the earl of Leicester, that plundered their neighbours; burnt their houses, or killed them, or did any other mischief; all were to pay 5 years rent of their lands, and if they paid it, they were to have their land again. The earl Ferrers and Henry Hastings were to pay 7 years profits of their lands. Those who had committed lesser crimes than the above recited, compounded, or were fined 3, 2, 1, or half a year's rent of their lands, according to the nature of their offences; those who had no lands were fined in goods. All obligations, writings, or instruments, made by the king, or his son, concerning the Oxford provisions, or made or entered into by any of the king's faithful subjects, by reason of the troubles, were made null and void by this award: whereby it was declared, that the king might and ought to exercise his royal power and authority without the let or contradiction of any one; by which, contrary to the laws and customs of the land, which had long subsisted, his royal dignity might have been injured; yet the great charter, and charter of the forest, were to remain in full force by this judgment. The commissioners also requested the king and legate, that under danger of corporal punishment and ecclesiastical censure, they would strictly forbid any to speak of Simon Montfort as a saint, or to spread the vain and foolish miracles reported of him. This award, or Dictum de Kenelworth, was finished in the castle of Kenelworth, on the 31st of Oct. 1266, and the 50th of the king's reign.

In 1267, Henry called another parliament to meet at St. Edmundsbury, where, says the continuator of M. Paris, were summoned to appear the earls, barons, abps. bps. abbots, and all that owed him military service, with their horse and arms, to go against those rebels who had got into the Isle of Ely, and still held it out against him. The same author has given us an exact account of the king, with the Pope's Legate who was then with him, and what demands they made for a supply from the clergy, with their answer to each article. 1. It was demanded, 'That the prelates and rectors of churches should grant them the tenths of their churches, for 3 years next to come, and for the year last past, as they gave the barons for keeping the coasts against the invasions of strangers.' To this it was answered, 'That the war began by unreasonable desires, and did then continue, and therefore it was necessary to forbear repeating the like demands, and treat of the peace of the kingdom; and make use of the parliament to the benefit of the church and kingdom; and not to extort money, especially, when the nation was so much destroyed by the war, that, if ever, it must be a long time before it could recover itself.'—'2. That the churches might be taxed by laymen according to their true and highest value.' To this it was answered, 'That it was not reasonable, but contrary to justice, that laymen should meddle with collecting of tenths; nor would they ever consent to a new way of taxing, but that the old should stand.'—'3. That the bishops and abbots should pay the tenths of their baronies and lay-fees, up to their true and highest value.' Answered, 'That they were impoverished by depredations and plunderings; that they followed the king in his expeditions, and spent so much money that they were grown very poor, and that their lands laid uncultivated by reason of the war.'—'4. That the clergy, in common, should give to the king 30,000 marks, for the aforesaid tenths, which a certain legate had claimed for the use of the court of Rome, for the debts contracted in Sicily, Apulia and Calabria, in the name of the lord Edmund, the king's son then present.' Answer, 'That they would give nothing, because all these taxations and extortions first made by the king, were never expended to the use of the king and realm.'—'5. That all clerks holding baronies or lay-fees, should go armed in their own persons against the king's enemies, or find so much service as belongs to their lands or tenements.' To this they answered, 'That they ought not to fight with the material but spiritual sword, that is, with their prayers and tears. And that by their benefices or fees they were bound to maintain peace, not war. That they held their barony in Frank Almoign, in pure alms, and therefore owed no military service, but what was certain; and would not perform any that was new.'—'6. That with all speed the expedition of the cross might be preached through the whole kingdom.' To this it was answered, 'That a great part of the people had been killed by the war; that if now they should undertake the crusade, few or none would be left to defend the nation.'—'7. That the prelates were absolutely bound to comply with all these demands, on the oath which they had taken at Coventry, that they would assist the king by all the ways they were able.' To this they, also, answered, 'That when they made that oath they only meant it of spiritual help and wholesome counsel.'

In 1269, Henry called the last parliament in his reign, being summoned to meet at Marlborough the 19th of Nov.; in which, by the assent of the earls and barons, were made the statutes of Marlborough.

Taxes in this king's reign.

The parliament called at Northampton, in 1224, granted the king 2s. of every plough land; and the king granted the barons scutage, two marks of every knight's fee. The parliament called at Westminster, granted the king a 15th of all moveables in the whole kingdom, for the grant or confirmation of Magna Charta. In the same year a 40th part of all moveables was granted. In 1226, the king wrote to his foreign bishops and clergy to give him a 15th of all their moveables, as the bishops and clergy of England had then done. The next year he compelled the city of London to pay him 5000 marks, because they had given as much to Lewis late king of France, when he left England; and levied a 15th. At the same time he took from the burgesses of Northampton an aid of 1200l. besides one 15th. He likewise forced all religious and beneficed clerks to pay a 15th, as well out of their spirituals as temporals; and they who were unwilling to pay, were compelled either by the king's authority or ecclesiastical censures. Soon after this, the religious and others had notice, that unless they renewed their charter, the old ones should be of no advantage to them; and for the renewal every one paid according to his faculty, at the discretion of the justiciary. In 1230, archbishops, bishops, abbots and priors gave a great sum of money for recovering the king's rights beyond sea. At the same time he put the citizens of London to grievous redemption; and forced the Jews to pay him a 3d part of what they were worth.—In 1231, the king required a scutage of three marks of every knight's fee, of all that held baronies, as well prelates as laics.—In a parliament held at Lambeth, in 1232, a 40th part of all moveables, as well of ecclesiastics as laics, was granted to the king, and was collected very soon after.—In 1235, he had 2 marks of every plough-land, for the marriage of Isabel his sister to Frederic emperor of Germany, and gave with her 30,000 marks for her portion.—In 1237, a 30th part of all moveables was granted to the king.—In 1242, the king required a scutage of 3 marks from every knight's fee through all England. So says M. Paris, but others say only 20s.—In a parliament held at London, in 1244, 20s. of every knight's fee was granted to the king, for the marriage of his eldest daughter.—In 1253, the clergy granted the 10th of all ecclesiastical revenues for 3 years, and the nobility 3 marks of every knight's fee, for the relief of the Holy Land, on the king's confirmation of Magna Charta.—In 1267, 3 years tenths of all church revenues were granted to the king by the pope.—And in 1270, a 20th part was granted the king. EDWARD I.

The first parliament called by royal authority in this king's time was in the third year of his reign. They met at Westminster in the beginning of May 1275; the chief occasion of their being called together was to settle the affairs of the kingdom before that Edward made war upon the Welsh; whose prince, Lewellyn, was summoned to appear at it, and do homage to the king, as his vassal and subject. The Welsh prince neglected the summons, and sent for excuse, 'that the king having shewn, on many occasions, an extreme animosity to him, he would not trust his person with his declared enemy. Nevertheless, he offered to do him homage in his own country, if the king would send commissioners thither to receive it; or else in some third place, where he might be without danger. He offered likewise to come into the king's territories, provided he would give him the prince his eldest son in hostage, with the earl of Gloucester, and the lord high chancellor.' This answer greatly provoked the king; but yet he dissembled his resentment for the present, that he might not interrupt the necessary business of the session. And indeed this parliament was employed in affairs of great importance; that is, in enacting excellent laws for securing the peace and liberties of the people, as well as the immunities of the church and privileges of the clergy: these were called the 'Statutes of Westminster the first,' and contain in the whole 51 chapters.

The same year, 1275, another parliament was called to sit at Westminster, Oct. 6th, in which statutes were made to restrain the excessive usury of the Jews; and it was also enacted, that they should wear a badge upon their upper garments, in the shape of the two tables of Moses's law. On the 18th of the same month they met again, and granted the king a 15th upon the clergy and laity, by the common consent of the abps, bps, earls, and barons. This money or subsidy was given, says Wikes, to defray the expence of the king's crusade. Another writes, that it was said by some to be for novelty sake, or for a good beginning. However, doctor Brady has published an act of the king's, whereby he declares, that this gift of the clergy proceeded only from their free good-will, and that it should not be drawn into consequence for the future.

In 1276, the king convened his nobles, &c. again to Westminster, on the affair of Lewellyn; when, upon an open hearing of the matter, the prince was judged guilty of felony, and war was immediately proclaimed against him. At this juncture the king gave orders for levying the 15th granted in the last parliament on the clergy and laity; and issued out his orders for the exact observance of the charter of liberties and the charter of the forests.—The same parliament met again at Winchester this year, and again at Westminster on the 4th of Oct.; when, amongst other laws, the Statute of Bigamy was enacted.—At this parliament the king confirmed the Charters of Liberties and Forests; and ordered that it should be proclaimed all over England, that they should be strictly observed.—There is mention made of another parliament, said to be held in 1277, after the king's expedition into Wales, in which the laity granted the king a 30th part of their moveable goods towards his charges. Tyrrel observes, that this parliament is not expressly mentioned on the Rolls; which shews, adds he, that there were many more parliaments than we can now find upon record.—In 1279, another parliament was summoned to meet at Westminster, when an affair of great importance to the interest of the whole nation came before them. The clergy, ever since the first introduction of Christianity into this island, had been accumulating lands and riches. The enormous bulk of their present possessions, and what they were daily acquiring from the mistaken charity of that age, made it justly suspicious that in another they might engross the whole. Besides, it was well known, that whatever lands they gained this way, they were from thenceforth unalienable, and a dead hand laid on them for ever. The laity had been long desirous to stem this torrent; but wanted a king of resolution enough to despise the Vatican thunder, and effectually put a stop to these dangerous proceedings. Such a king they found in Edward I. and a parliament was called in this year for that purpose. They met at Westminster, in the beginning of Nov. by the king's appointment; and when he made the proposal, it was received by the laity with universal joy; nor durst the clergy oppose it, for fear a heavier blow should fall upon them. In fine, it was enacted, 'that from henceforth none should either give, sell, bequeath, or change, or, by any title whatsoever, should assign any lands, tenements, or rents to any religious body, without licence from the king had for that purpose.' This statute was called the 'Statute of Mortmain', because it was intended to prevent estates from falling into dead hands, that is, hands of no service to the king or the public, without hopes of ever changing their owners. Nor did the king end here; for in the second statute of Westminster he confined the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical judges to narrower limits; and required one half of all their goods, both temporal and spiritual, for one year; at which, though they were very much vexed, yet they were forced to comply with the king's demand; because, their discontent being discovered, a knight, called sir John Havering, came, by authority no doubt, amongst them into the Monks' Hall at Westminster, and said, 'rev. fathers, if any of you dare to contradict the king's demand in this business, let him stand forth into the midst of this assembly, that his person may be known and taken notice of, as a breaker of the peace of the kingdom.' At which speech they all sat silent, and made no opposition to the king's demand, as they had often done in the time of his father.

About this time Edward was busy in his conquest of Wales, which he soon after fully accomplished. Lewellyn, their prince, was slain in the open field, and his whole army routed upon the spot: David his brother was soon after taken prisoner and brought to the king to Shrewsbury. Here it was that a parliament was called on that occasion, Sept. 30, 1282, which condemned David to die the death of a traitor. This rigorous sentence was executed with all the circumstances attending that infamous punishment. His head was fixed near that of the prince his brother, and his four quarters were sent to York, Bristol, Northampton, and Winchester. The king, in summoning this parliament was more explicit than ever he had been before. The writs of summons are still extant on record; the first of which is to the lords to meet the king at Shrewsbury, on Sept. 30. The second is directed to the sheriffs of every county in England, to cause to be chosen two knights for the commonalty of the same county; as also a third directed to several cities and boroughs, and a fourth writ to the judges. (See Rymer's Fœdera, t. 2. p. 247.)—Shortly after another parliament was called, the better to secure the possession of the recently conquered country. The parliament met May 24, 1282, at Ruthland; and it was there resolved, that Wales should be inseparably united to the crown of England; which it has ever since continued to be. 'It was certainly of great benefit to the nation,' says an historian, 'for the miserable contests and bloody mischiefs, which often happened to both nations, were hereby extinguished; and they became one people, governed by one law, and under one prince, as may be seen by the statute of Rutland (a). At this meeting, also, the laity granted to the king a 30th, and the clergy a 20th, towards the expences of the war. Edward having settled all matters in Wales, came in Dec. to Bristol; where he kept his Christmas, and held a parliament. Not a general one, but a particular parliament, says an old writer; but what was done at it he is not so particular as to mention.

In 1283 another parliament met, in Oct. at Acton Burnel, in Shropshire; where was made the statute of Acton Burnel (b).

In 1285, we meet with another parliament called to Westminster, after Easter, where were made some additions to the antient statutes of the realm, which bear the title of the 'Statutes of Westminster the Second' (c). The statute called Circumspecte agatis was, also, made at this session, which gave another blow to the power of the clergy (d).

The next year Edward went over into France, on special occasions, which detained him 3 years in that kingdom. In his absence, a parliament was held at London, in Feb. 1288, wherein John de Kirby, lord treasurer, demanded, as he said, by the king's orders, an aid for the king's charges in France. But the parliament answered, by the earl of Gloucester, their spokesman, 'that they would grant nothing unless they saw the king personally present.' Hereupon the treasurer imposed a tallage on the cities and boroughs of the king's demesnes (e). At his return, in Aug. 1289, his first care was to reform several abuses, introduced in his absence, particularly in the administration. To that end he called a parliament soon after his arrival to meet at Westminster in Jan. following; where the necessity of reforming such great abuses being propounded, the judges were had all under examination, and upon a plain proof of their extortions, they were fined to pay these following sums: sir R. de Hengham, chief justice of the King's Bench, 7000 marks (f). Sir J. Lovetot, justice of the common pleas, 3000 marks. Sir W. Brampton, justice, the same sum. Sir S. Rochester, justice of assize, 4000 marks. Sir Rd. de Boyland, 4000 marks. Sir Th. Sodington, 2000 marks; Sir W. Hopton, 2000 marks; the four last were itinerant justices; Sir W. de Saham, 3000 marks; R. Lithebury, master of the rolls, 1000 marks; Roger Leicester, 1000; Henry Bray, escheator and judge for the Jews, 1000. Sir A. de Stratton, chief baron of the exchequer according to some, to others only chief clerk of the courts, no less than 34,000 marks; and sir T. Wayland, chief justice of the common pleas, who was found the greatest delinquent, had all his goods and whole estate confiscated to the king, and was also banished for ever out of the kingdom. Hollingshead informs us that there were but two judges out of the whole bench that were not found faulty, John de Mettingham, and Elias de Bekingham. From this time the judges were obliged to swear at the entrance into their offices, that they would take no money or present of any kind, except a breakfast, from such persons as had suits depending before them.

Another affair of consequence came before this parliament, which was the entire banishment of the Jews out of the kingdom. The nation had long desired it; but the Jews still found means to divert the blow by large presents to the king, and his ministers. They wanted to play the same game again now, but could not do it; the king being unable to protect them any longer, and unwilling to risque the disoblighing his parliament on their account. Accordingly, the act of banishment was passed, whereby their immoveable goods were confiscated; but they had leave to carry away the rest with them: (The number of these banished Jews, says Matthew of Westminster, were 16,160.) To gratify the king for this piece of service to the nation, in general, the parliament willingly granted a 15th. It was at this time, also, that the statute called 'Westminster the Third,' otherwise, from the first words of it, Quia Emptores Terrarum, was enacted. (See Ryley's Placit. Parl. An. 18 et 19 Edw. I.)

Edward having now his coffers full of money by all the aforesaid fines, confiscations, and taxes, began to turn his thoughts on gaining a conquest much greater than the last, and to unite the crown of Scotland to his own. Upon the death of Alexander the Scotch king, and his grand-daughter Margaret, without heirs, the crown of that kingdom fell into controversy. No less than 12 competitors started at once; who were all descended from David, earl of Huntingdon, the younger brother of William king of Scots, grandfather to the late king Alexander. Edw. pretending a right of superiority over that kingdom, from his ancestors, undertakes to decide the quarrel. The regency of Scotland, to avoid greater inconveniences, were forced to make him arbitrator, and the six chief competitors to stand to his award. John Baliol, lord of Galoway, and Rob. Bruce, both descended from the aforesaid David, had the plainest and most indisputable claim.—The first step that Edward took in this matter was a peaceable one, which was to ensure the succession of the kingdom of Scotland to his posterity, by a marriage betwixt his eldest son, prince Edw. and Margaret, daughter of Eric king of Norway, by Margaret, the only daughter of Alexander, who was, at her grandfather's death, the undoubted heiress to the crown of Scotland. The king sent messengers into Norway to treat about this marriage, and Eric gave his consent, so far as it was consistent with the desires of the Scottish nobility, &c. and the good of that kingdom. The articles on which this marriage was to have been consummated, are given at length in dr. Brady. This grand design was totally frustrated by the death of the young queen of Scotland, in her voyage towards England for that purpose, which left the field open for the rest of the competitors to pursue their separate claims. Edw. now had another game to play; and that was to pretend a right to an absolute dominion over the crown of Scotland, in case of such an accident, and to set up himself as umpire in the several contests for that crown. To that end he summoned a parliament to meet at Norham, on the confines of the two kingdoms; and on the 10th of May, 1291, by the king's command, the nobility, prelates, knights, and many other of both kingdoms, met at that place, (See Mut. Westm. sub hoc anno); where Roger Brabazon, chief justice of England, in the presence of a public notary, and witnesses purposely called, in the king's name, told them, that, 'he taking notice in what confusion the nation had been, since the death of Alexander their last king and his children, (out of the affection he had for them and all the inhabitants thereof, whose protection and safeguard was well known to belong to him, and for the doing right to all that claimed the kingdom and the public peace; to shew them his superiority and direct dominion, out of divers chronicles and monuments, preserved in several monasteries) purposed to use his right; but yet to do justice to all, without usurpation or diminution of their liberties, and to demand their assent to, and recognition of his superiority and direct dominion over them.' The chief justice having ended his harangue, and the Scottish lords there present understanding his meaning, they required time to consult with such of their several orders as were absent, which the king granted them to the next day only. Accordingly, the next day, May 11, they all met again, in the church of Norham, and then they earnestly pressed the king to give them longer time to consult with such as were absent, and answer to his demands concerning their recognition of his superiority and direct dominion over the realm of Scotland which he had claimed as his right. Upon deliberation, the king gave them time till the 2d of June next, and on that day, precisely they were to answer to his demand; and if they had any evidence, which could exclude him from his right aforesaid, they were then to exhibit them. And that they might the better understand his title, and make their objections against it, the bp. of Durham was appointed to declare it to the nobility and prelates there present. After the king of England's title, to the dominion of Scotland, had been thus declared, on the 2d of June, the bps. prelates, earls, barons, &c. representing the whole community of Scotland, met, in order to sell their country, says our authority, in a green plain, on the banks of the Tweed, directly opposite to the castle of Norham, where Edw. then resided (g). To them was sent the bp. of Bath and Wells, to demand in the king's name, 'what they had done since the last meeting; and whether they would say, exhibit, propound, or shew any thing that could or ought to exclude the king of England from the right and exercise of the superiority and direct dominion over the kingdom of Scotland; and that they would there and then exhibit it, if they believed it was expedient for them; protesting, in the king's name, that he would favourably hear them, allow what was just, or report what was said to the king and his council; that upon their deliberation they might do what justice required.' Upon repeated demands the Scots answered nothing; whereupon the bp. recapitulated all that had been said, at the last meeting, relating to the king's claim; and a public notary being present, the right of deciding the controversy between the several competitors, for that kingdom, was entered in form for the king of England. After which, the said bp. beginning with Robert Brus, lord of Annandale, and one of those that claimed the right of succession to the crown of Scotland, he asked him, in the presence of all the bps. earls, barons, &c. 'whether, in demanding his said right, he would answer and receive justice from the king of England, as superior and direct lord over the kingdom of Scotland?' Who presently, publicly, openly, and expressly, in the presence of them all, and the public notary, none contradicting or gainsaying, answered, 'that he did acknowledge the king of England superior and direct lord of the kingdom of Scotland; and that he would, from and before him, as such, demand, answer, and receive justice.'—The bp. then proceeded with all the other competitors in like manner, who had the same question put to them, and received from them the same answer; and they did not only make this public recognition, but they all joined in letters patent to the king to corroborate the same; which letters patents are preserved in Mat. Westm. and in Brady's Comp. Hist. vol. ii. App. No. ii.

The consequence of all this was, that the affair of the succession to the crown of Scotland was debated by commissioners of both nations, to the number of fourscore in all; and the king was to give judgment according to equity and justice. The disquisition of this matter is amply taken notice of by most of our more modern historians; and, as the English parliament had yet nothing to do with the controversy, it is unnecessary here. But at the time that Edward had appointed to give sentence in this weighty affair, a full parliament was summoned to meet at Berwick upon Tweed, where all the commissioners appeared, as well as all the candidates, by themselves or proxies; and where John Baliol was declared, in full parliament, to be the only person that had a right of possession. Edward therefore adjudged the crown of Scotland to him; saving, however, to himself and successors, the right of prosecuting their pretensions to the said kingdom, whenever they thought proper. It was not long after this that Baliol found the bad effects of his subjection, being often summoned to appear before Edw. in person, on the bare complaints of private people; by which he was become rather the absolute slave than vassal to the king of England. And, in a parliament held in 1293, this king of Scotland was obliged to stand at the bar, like a private person, and answer to an accusation brought against him for denying justice, and imprisoning the earl of Fife. Baliol, in plea to the accusation, alledged that, as it concerned his crown, he could not answer to it without first advising with his subjects^(h). This excuse not being deemed valid, the parliament ordered that three of his principal castles should be seized into the king's hands till he gave full satisfaction. The English authors affirm, that before the sentence was pronounced, Baliol presented a petition, acknowledging the sovereignty of the king of England over Scotland, and praying Edw. to allow him time till he could consult his parliament⁽ⁱ⁾. As soon as he had stooped so low as to petition, his demand was granted, and a certain day was assigned him to appear. The Scots king went back into his own country; but so incensed at the affront he had received, that he was bent upon trying all means to free himself from so intolerable a yoke.

About this time an accident happened that seemed favourable to Baliol's design. The king of France had by a stratagem seized upon the district of Guienne, in Normandy, on so slight an occasion as a private quarrel betwixt some English and French mariners. Edward therefore summoned his parliament to meet at Westminster soon after Whitsuntide in 1294; whom he acquainted with the loss of Guienne, and the ill usage he had received from the French king. John, king of Scotland, was also present at this parliament; and, when they were told by Edward's ambassadors the shuffling answers they had from the French king, it was unanimously resolved to recover the duchy of Guienne by force of arms. John Baliol granted to Edward towards the expence of this war, the revenues of his paternal estate in England for 3 years. Notwithstanding this concession of the Scotch king, he hoped for greater advantages from this rupture; and accordingly he concluded a secret alliance with the king of France, and promised to invade England as soon as Edw. transported his armies abroad. Edward got intelligence of this plot, contrived against him at Paris, and called another parliament at Westminster, in order to lay before them the state of his affairs. Here the laity agreed to allow the king the 11th part of their goods, the clergy the 10th, and the merchants a 7th.—Edward having got this supply, neglected his more foreign concerns, and entirely bent his mind on the conquest of Scotland; which would be of much greater importance to him than the other. But to prevent the king of Scotland's designs, he demanded of him the three castles aforementioned, which Baliol, to amuse and gain time, actually delivered him. However, being assured of his revolt, Edw. lost no time with him, but marched his whole army directly for Scotland; and Baliol, being certain of assistance from France, bids defiance to Edw. renounced his oath and his allegiance, as unlawfully promised; alledging that it was not in his power, without the consent of the states, to do any such acts. 'And now, says Daniel, began the contests between the two nations, which spilt more Christian blood, did more mischief, and continued longer, than any wars that we read of, between any two people in the world.'

We shall, however, pursue these wars no farther than is consistent with our design; suffice it to say that Edw. in a short space of time overrun all Scotland, and reduced Baliol with the rest of the nobility to sue to him for peace. After which, he called a parliament to meet at Berwick, Aug. 24, 1296, to which came all the Scottish nobility, and did their homage and fealty to him in a most submissive manner, binding themselves to serve him faith-

(h) The whole process, after the summons, of this matter, relating to Macduff, the son of Malcolm earl of Fife, will be found at large in Riley's Plac. Parl. p. 192, &c.

(i) The petition was made by his own mouth, before the king and council, and delivered in writing. The form of it is in Riley's Plac. Parl. p. 159, in French, translated by Tyrrel, Vol. ii. p. 76.

fully against all nations, and to come to his assistance at any time and place he should require them; moreover, they all, upon the Blessed Evangelists, solemnly swore to observe all this before the whole English parliament.

The conquest of Scotland being thus completed, Edw. called before him all the chief officers, &c. of the Welsh, Irish, and English armies, who had assisted him in this great expedition; he returned them his thanks in a public manner; and added, that the crown of England was eternally obliged to them for their services. He afterwards put an end to this parliament.

On the 3rd of Nov. in the same year, Edward met his parliament again at St. Edmondsbury. They were called, in order to raise subsidies for carrying on the war against France, which he had determined to prosecute with the utmost vigour. The laity contributed cheerfully to this expedition, and taxed themselves, the citizens, and burgesses an 8th penny, the rest of the laity a 12th. The clergy, however, openly refused to give any thing, saying, 'That they could neither give nor grant, neither could the king receive any subsidy from them, without both incurring a sentence of excommunication, which was included in the pope's bull to that purpose.' The king was much displeased at this answer, but nevertheless gave them time to think upon it; and required them to meet him again the 14th of Jan. 1297, at London; to which time and place this parliament was adjourned. The day being come, and the parliament, with the clergy met, Robert de Winchelsea, abp. of Canterbury, made the following speech to his brethren:—

'My lords,—It is very well known to you and all the world, that under the Almighty God we have both a spiritual lord and a temporal one. The spiritual lord is our holy father the pope, and the temporal, our lord the king. And though we owe them both obedience, yet we are under more subjection to the spiritual. But to do all that is in our power to please both, we are willing to send special messengers to our holy father the pope, at our own expence, to desire that he would grant us leave to oblige the king in this matter; or, at least, we shall have an answer from him what we ought to do. We do believe, that our sovereign lord the king is as fearful of incurring this sentence of excommunication as we ourselves can be. So, my dear lords, we desire that you would send some select persons out of your body, to inform the king of this matter, for we, verily, notwithstanding we know the king's anger to be raised against us, dare to speak the truth at all times.' We find that the king was not so much afraid of the pope's bull as the abp. pretended. For, he had no sooner heard the clergy's answer to his demand, than he immediately put the abp. and the whole body of the English clergy, out of his protection and defence; and ordered that all their lands and possessions, throughout the whole realm, should be seized to his use. This edict had the consent of the earls, &c. who constituted this parliament, which continued to sit whilst all the bishops were excluded. The chief justice of the king's bench, sitting in his tribunal, says Knyghton, pronounced sentence against the clergy in these words:—'You that are the proctors, or attornies, for the abps. bps. abbots, and priors, with the rest of the clergy, take notice to acquaint all your masters, that, for the future, no manner of justice shall be done them in any of the king's courts, on any cause whatsoever; but justice shall be had against them to every one that will complain and require it of us.'

Edward did not prosper so well in this French war as he had done in the last. The Scots took the advantage of his absence to revolt; and, under the conduct of Wm. Wallace, committed great ravages in England. Neither were things quite well at home; Edward before his departure having greatly disoblged some of his lords; of which the earl of Hereford, high constable of England, and Roger Bygot, earl mareschal, were the chief. These great men raised an insurrection in the king's absence; by which means, and by the revolt of the Scots, the peace of the kingdom was much endangered. The occasion of this quarrel is said by Hollingshead and others to have happened at a parliament called to meet at Salisbury, at which meeting the clergy were totally excluded. The king insisted that most of the nobility, there present, should attend him to the French war, but many excused themselves, whereat Edw. being greatly moved, plainly told them that they should go, or he would give their lands to those that would. The nobles were very much offended at this bluntness in the king; and some of them, the chiefest, viz. the earl of Hereford and the earl mareschal, told the king, that they were ready to attend him, if he went in person, otherwise they would not go. The mareschal added, that if the king went, he should willingly attend him in his wars, and take his hereditary post in the vanguard of the army. 'But,' says the king, 'you shall go, whether I do or not.' 'I am not so bound,' quoth the earl, 'neither do I purpose to go without you.' The king, then in a great rage, said, 'By God, sir earl, you shall either go or hang.' 'And sir king, by the same oath,' replied the earl, boldly, 'I will neither go nor hang.' And so they both left the king abruptly, without taking any leave, and the parliament broke up, without doing any further business. Edward, after this, resolved to go over in person, but the lords would not go along with him. Yet, notwithstanding the ill correspondence between the king and these great men at this assembly, it seems they agreed well enough how to proceed with the clergy; for Tyrrel, from an anonymous Chronicle in the Bodleian Library, relates, 'That the king and his barons and knights there assembled, passed an ordinance, that if the clergy did not make their peace with the king, within a certain time then limitted, they should lose all that was already seized by the king, and it should not be lawful for any one, from thenceforth, to have any common dealing with them.—See Tyrrel's Hist. of England, vol. iii. p. 107.

But, to close up the differences with the discontented lords in time, the regents thought proper to call a parliament in prince Edward's name, and to summon them to meet at London, on the 10th of Oct. 1297. The lords paid a willing obedience to this new summons from their future king, and came at the time and place appointed. However, they did not come without a strong guard to secure their persons; having 500 horsemen, well armed, and a large body of choice foot to attend them. Nor would they enter the city, until they were allowed to place a sufficient number of their own men at each gate of it for their better security. This being granted, the lords came quietly to their seats in parliament; where, after many consultations, the lords would agree to no reconciliation, unless the king would consent to confirm Magna Charta, and the Charter of Forests, with some additional articles: and that he would neither desire nor exact any aid or vexatious tax either from the clergy or the people, for the future, without the advice and consent of his Great Men. Further that all rancour and malice might from henceforth be removed from the minds of them and all others their associates, the following writing was agreed to, and ordered to be drawn up in these words:—

‘No manner of tax or aid shall either be imposed or gathered by us or our heirs, for the future, on our kingdom, without the common consent and free-will of the abps. bps. and other prelates, the earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other free men of this realm. We will not take to ourself any corn, wool, hides, or any other kind of goods whatsoever, without the consent of the person to whom such goods belong. We will not take for the future, in any name, or on any occasion whatsoever, evil toll (k) of any pack of wool. We will and grant for us and our heirs, that all the clergy and laity of the kingdom shall have all their laws, liberties, and customs, as freely and fully as ever they enjoyed them at any time. And if any thing be enacted or ordained against any article in this present writing by us or our ancestors, or any new customs introduced, we will and grant that such customs or statutes be for ever null and void. We do remit also, to Humphry de Bohun, earl of Hereford and Essex, constable of England; Roger Bygot, earl of Norfolk, mareschal of England; and others the earls, barons, knights, esquires, and to John de Ferrars, and to all others his colleagues and confederates, and also to all those that hold 20l. lands, either of us in chief or of others in our kingdom who were summoned to go into Flanders and did not appear, all manner of rancour and ill-will which for the aforesaid causes we might have taken against them, and also all kinds of transgressions which to us or ours may have been done, to the making of this present writing. And, for the greater security of this matter, we will and grant, for us and our heirs, that all abps. and bps. of England shall for ever in their cathedral churches have this present writing read, and shall publicly excommunicate as well there as cause it to be done in the several parish churches throughout their dioceses, twice in a year, all those who shall seek to weaken the force of these presents in any article, or in any manner whatsoever. In testimony of which we have put our seal to this present writing, together with the seals of the abps. bps. earls, barons, and others, who of their own accord swore to observe strictly the tenor of these presents, in all and every article, to the best of their powers. And for the due observance of which they promised all their aid and advice for ever.”

The young Prince did not hesitate to confirm the decree, as far as it was in his power; and gave the offending lords his letters patents to them and all their followers, that no harm should come to them; and promised also in the said letters that he would do his utmost to induce his father to consent to all their demands. Likewise all the king's council, present at this parliament, promised to act accordingly. Messengers were immediately dispatched to the king in Flanders, with letters intimating, that if he regarded his own honour and safety, or hoped to preserve his kingdom, he should send back the aforesaid articles confirmed and sealed. The king being driven to a strait, took 3 days to consider of this message; and then, that he might gain the hearts of the revolvers once more to him, consented to all, and confirmed them accordingly. For this extraordinary concession of the king, the parliament granted him a 9th penny on the laity; and the abp. of Canterbury with his clergy a 10th; the abp. of York, with his clergy, who were more in the neighbourhood of danger, a 5th penny, as a subsidy to carry on the war against Scotland.

Edward having concluded a truce for two years with France, turned all his thoughts on Scotland, and sent word to the earl of Warren, his general, not to proceed with the army any farther than Berwick till his return. He arrived there in person some short time after; and the first thing he did was to remove the courts of Exchequer and King's Bench from London to York; and then he called a parliament to meet in that city, where the Scotch lords were again summoned to appear at it; which they not regarding, he sent out his commission of array, ordering all his subjects to be ready with horse and harness, at Rokesborough, on the feast of St. John Baptist following, which was done accordingly. After this happened the battle of Falkirk; in which the English gained a compleat victory over the Scotch army, and retook all the towns and fortresses which had been lost in the king's absence.

Soon after the king's return, he called a parliament to London (l) to meet in Lent, 1299. The first thing that was done at this meeting was to read before them the Pope's instrument of award, between the two kings of France and England, who had agreed to make him, as a private person, only, under the name of Benedict Cajetan, the amicable composer and arbiter of all wars, controversies, differences, and causes whatever moved between them. This character was worthy of the Christian Pontiff; and accordingly he did award and pronounce: 1. That there should be a firm and stable peace between the two kings. 2. That the voluntary forbearing of hostility, and the truce lately made and confirmed between the two kings, &c. should be inviolably observed. 3. That the king of England should marry Margaret the king of France's sister, and endow her with 15,000*l*. Tournois (i. e. 3750*l*. st.) per an. 4. That Isabel, the daughter of the king of France, not then 7 years old, should, at convenient time, be married to Ed. the king of England's son, then 13 years of age, with the dower of 13,000*l*. Tournois per. an. 5. That all goods on either side, ships especially, taken before the war, and then not embezzled or destroyed, should be restored; and if destroyed and not to be found, then either king to make satisfaction at the request of each other. 6. That all the lands, vassals, and goods, which the king of England had in France before the war, which he may have restored to him by virtue of this compromise, he should have and enjoy under such conditions and security as shall be awarded. 7. That all the lands, vassals, and goods, which the king of France was then possessed of, that were the king of England's before the war, and those the king of England was then possessed of, should be put into the hands and possession of the Pope, and so to remain until the kings themselves agreed about them, or he should order what was therein to be done, without prejudice to the lands, vassals, and goods; or the kings, as to the possession, detention or property of them.' This award was dated at the Pope's palace at Rome, on the 20th of June, 1298, 26th Ed. I.; to which, when it was read in parliament, all the clergy and laity gave their consent.

In the spring of 1300, Edward made another inroad into Scotland, and again subdued those resolute spirits, and obliged them to sue to him, in a most submissive manner, for peace. At his return, he issued out writs, dated at Berwick, for calling a parliament to meet him at Westminster the 2d Sunday in Lent; in which the Great Charters were renewed and confirmed, and a new statute was made for the better explaining them, called 'Articuli super Chartas,' or articles upon the charters.—See Statutes at large, an. 1300. Coke's 2nd Inst. 537.

On the 12th Jan. 1301, Edward called a parliament to meet at Lincoln. At the opening of this assembly, Roger de Brabazon, the king's chief secretary and privy councillor, made them a speech on the king's behalf, to this effect. 'His majesty has ordered me to let you understand, that whatever he hath done in his late wars, hath been performed by your joint consent and allowance; but that lately, by reason of the sudden incursion of the Scots, and the malicious contrivances of the French, the king hath been put to such extraordinary expences, that being quite destitute of money, he therefore desires a pecuniary aid of you, viz. a 15th of your temporal estates.' Hereupon the nobility and commons began to murmur, and complained grievously against the king's menial servants and officers, for several violent depredations and extortions. Afterwards, they desired that the liberties contained in the Great Charter should remain for ever in full force. Also, they requested the king that the disforestings, by which the richer sort had encroached much upon the poor, and which he had often promised should be amended, might be now ordered to be done without more delay. These and some other articles, which they earnestly pressed the king to grant, protracted this session several days. At last, says our authority, the king perceiving that they would not desist from their demands, nor would supply his necessities without they were granted; he answered, that he was ready to do what they would have him, and if they had any thing else to ask, it should be granted. Then the Charter of Liberties and that of the Forests were again renewed, and sealed with the king's seal; they were afterwards carried into every county in England, and when read before the people, the sentence of the greater excommunication, as ordained by the abp. of Canterbury, and the rest of the bps. against the violaters of them, was proclaimed amongst them. For this confirmation of their liberties, this parliament granted the king a 15th of all their moveable goods to take place at Michaelmas following.

Mr. Tyrrel has given us an abstract from an old MS. Chronicle, wherein the insolent demands of the barons run near as high against this great king, as they did against his weak father: the great council of the nobility being continued, after the commons were risen, till towards the latter end of Lent, they began to fall upon several rash and imprudent projects and demands; as, that the chancellor, chief-justice, and treasurer should be chosen and appointed by the community of the kingdom; which so far provoked the king, that he returned them this resolute answer:—"I perceive you would at your pleasure make your king truckle to you, and bring him under subjection. Why have you not asked the crown of me also? whilst at the same time you look upon that as very fit and necessary for yourselves, which you grudge me that am your king: for it is lawful for every one of you, as master of his own family, to take in, or turn out what servants he pleases; but if I may not appoint my chancellor, chief-justice, justiciary, and treasurer, I will be no longer your king; yet if they, or any other officers shall do you any wrong or injustice, and complaint be made of it to me, you shall then have some reason to complain if you are not righted."—This reasonable answer made those ashamed that were for these alterations; and the major part of the nobility, seeing these designs to be vain and frivolous, humbly begged the king's pardon for their presumption. The king and his barons being thus perfectly reconciled, an elegant epistle, as Mat. Westm. calls it, was written to the pope, sealed with 100 seals, in order to prove the right which the English kings had to the crown of Scotland, from the earliest times, against the false suggestions, adds he, of the perjured Scots, who had avouched otherwise. In this parliament, also, the king created his eldest son, prince Edw. prince of Wales and earl of Chester, to the no small joy of the Welch, as this prince was born amongst them.

One great end of a parl.'s being called by the king at this time was, to lay before them a letter he had received from the pope; wherein his holiness claimed the kingdom of Scotland, as a right belonging to the see of Rome. The pope alledged, in this letter, that the king of England, both against reason and justice, had made that claim; for which he gave the following reasons:—"1st. That Henry III. had asked aid of Alexander, king of Scotland, against Simon Montfort, and his other rebellious barons; and the same king Henry acknowledged by his letters, that he sought not this aid from the said king Alex. as a service due to him, but merely out of favour. 2nd. When the said kind Alex. came to the coronation of the said Henry, he came, only, as a friend and out of kindness, &c. And, as Edw. king of England, after the death of Alex. had attacked and subdued the realm of Scotland, for want of a governor, to himself, he declared it was contrary to justice and the liberty of the see of Rome. And that the said king Edw. had suppressed all the Scotch bishops, and held them under subjection to him, against the constitution of the Catholic church in general, and the see of Rome in particular." The king, by the advice of his parliament, returned this answer to that part of the letter wherein the pope commanded Edw. to send his proctors and messengers to the court of Rome, to shew what right he had to claim the realm of Scotland, "That he did not think fit to say any thing to it himself, but that the whole Barony of England would write to his holiness, that their king could not act in that manner, nor refer a right, which was so clear and open, to the doubtful judgment of another court." However, the king himself thought proper to dissemble his anger against the holy father; and accordingly answered the pope's letter in a very submissive manner: he was, also, very copious in the declaration of his right that he had to Scotland, and began his claim from king Brute and his Trojans; and, no doubt to amuse the Italians who could not contradict it, carried his title clear through the fabulous history of Geofrey Monmouth, &c. But the lords were more explicit in theirs, and made out their meaning very plain to his holiness; which letter is preserved in Rymer's Fœdera, and is deserving a place in our history. The following is a translation of it:—

"Our holy mother, the church of Rome, by whose ministry the catholic faith is governed, as we firmly hold and believe, proceeds upon mature deliberation in her resolutions; takes care to prejudice no man; and is as solicitous to preserve the rights of other people as of her own. Verily, being summoned by our most serene lord, Edward, by the grace of God, the illustrious king of England, to his general parliament holden at Lincoln, the same our lord the king shewed us some apostolic letters, which, upon certain affairs touching the condition and state of the realm of Scotland, he had received from your holiness, and seriously communicated them to us all. Which letters, having heard and diligently considered, we were extremely shocked at the contents of them, being altogether new and unprecedented. It is well known, most holy father, both in these parts, and other countries, that the realm of England, from its first institution, with the kings thereof, as well in the times of the Britons as Saxons, had an absolute dominion over that of Scotland; and, in succeeding times, have always kept the possession, or the superiority over the said realm, nor in any times, did the said realm, by any right whatsoever, belong, in temporals, to the see of Rome, but rather the said realm of Scotland was always feudal to the progenitors of our lord the king, from all antiquity. Nor were the kings of Scotland, or their kingdom, ever subject or accustomed to submit to any other than to the kings of England. Neither have the kings of England, in their said kingdom, ever submitted their rights, in temporals, to any ecclesiastical or secular court; have never answered to them, nor ought to answer, but have inviolably observed to keep up the free pre-eminence, state, and dignity of the said kingdom, at all times. Whence, upon a due deliberation and treating upon the contents of your memorable letter, the common and unanimous consent of all and singular was, is, and will be, God willing, for ever. That our aforesaid lord the king ought not to answer judicially before you, nor submit his rights over the realm of Scotland, nor any other of his temporal rights whatsoever, to your doubtful judgment. Neither has he any reason to send his messengers or proctors to plead for him in your presence; particularly, when the premises will most manifestly tend to the disinheritance of the right of the English crown, and its royal dignity, and the utter subversion of the state of the said kingdom; and be a prejudice to our liberties, customs, and paternal laws; the observation and defence of which we stand obliged, by our oaths, to defend; and which, by the help of God, we will with all our power and strength maintain. Neither shall we in any wise permit, as we can and ought to hinder, such unaccustomed doings; nor shall we suffer our aforesaid lord the king in any manner to attempt to do, if he would, such undue, prejudicial, and heretofore, unheard of actions. Therefore, we humbly and reverently beseech your holiness, that you would kindly permit our sovereign lord the king (who, amongst other princes of the earth, shews himself a true catholic, and devoted to the see of Rome) to possess quietly, all his rights, liberties, customs, and laws, without diminution or disturbance. In testimony of which we have put our seals to these presents, as well for ourselves, as for the whole community of the aforesaid realm of England."

Mat. Westminster mentions two parliaments, or a prorogation of the same, to be held in the next year. The business they were both called for was in order to be consulted about making a peace with France. In the first, it was the commissioners desire that the king himself should go into France, and treat personally with the French king about it; a resolution, add they, that the great men of both kingdoms would applaud, and what the middle and lowest sort of people could not be grieved at. But, at the next meeting, this motion being again made it was strenuously opposed, and a quite contrary resolution was taken by the whole body, viz. 'That the king should remain in his own dominions, and not go abroad out of England, on any command or pretence of the French king's whatsoever.'

There is some notice taken of a parliament in the Public Acts, said to be called in Lent, 1305, wherein the king ordains 4 of his chaplains to be receivers of petitions at it. But Ryley has preserved a great deal of a parliament which his authorities say was held at Wesminster, on the Sunday after the feast of st. Matthew, in the 33rd of this reign. The primary ceremonials of which, as they are very circumstantial, may give our readers a notion of the whole proceedings of such an assembly in those times; translated from the old French, as follows. First, it was ordained by the king, that sir Gilbert de Roubiry, master John de Caam, sir John de Kirkeby, and master John Bush, should be receivers of all the petitions of those who shall be petitioners of this parliament, at Westminster. And, upon this, proclamation was made, by the king's command, in the great hall at Westminster, at the chancery-bar, and before the courts of the king's bench and exchequer, in the guildhall of London, and in Westchepe, in these words: 'know all those that come with petitions to this approaching parliament, that they deliver them, from day to day, betwixt this time and the 1st Sunday in Lent, at the farthest, to sir Gilbert de Roubiry, master John de Caam, &c. or to any of them, who are appointed to receive them, to the aforesaid time, at the farthest. And by this ordinance and proclamation all petitions shall be given in accordingly.' The business of the session being over, the following proclamation was made by the king's command; which seems to be the method of dissolving a parliament at that time. 'All abps. bps. and other prelates, earls, barons, knights of shires, citizens, and burgesses, and all other of the commons which are come, by the command of our sovereign lord the king to this parliament, the king gives them many thanks for their coming, and wills that, as they have desired, they may return into their own country; going forthwith and without delay, notwithstanding other commands, except the bishops, earls, barons, justices, and others, who are of the king's counsel, and those must not depart without special leave from the king. Those, also, who have business have leave to follow it. And the knights which are come for the shires, and others for the cities and boroughs, may apply themselves to sir John de Kirkeby, who will give them briefs to receive their wages in their several countries. And the aforesaid John de Kirkeby, is hereby commanded to deliver, to the chancellor, the names of all the knights of shires, and the names of all the citizens and burgesses that come for such briefs for their expences.'

The last parliament called by this king, met at Carlisle on the 21st of Jan. 1307. The first business of this assembly was to consider of means to secure the possession of Scotland, by uniting that kingdom to England, as appears by the writs dated at Lanercost, Nov. 3, preceding. At this meeting, also, great complaints were made by the barons against one Wm. Testa, an Italian priest, sent by the pope, for several oppressions and extortions of money, from the churches and monasteries of this kingdom, not heretofore used. It was therefore prohibited the said priest, by the consent of the earls and barons, to do any thing of the like nature for the future; and messengers were ordered to be sent to the pope to prevent such proceedings from that see.

We shall conclude our historical account of the parliaments in this king's reign, with the following complete, List of the Prelates, Abbots, and Barons in this parliament.

"The names of those who were summoned to parliament, in the 35th year of Edw. I. at Carlisle, in the Octaves of St. Hillary, Jan. 21, 1307, in order to treat upon the affairs of Scotland, and other matters specially relating to this kingdom.

Price of provisions in this reign.

In 1283, wheat was sold at London for 3s. 4d. a quarter, when it was dearest; and in other parts abroad for 20, 16, and 12d. the quarter; and in the west and north parts for 8d.; barley for 6d. and oats for 4d. the quarter. And in 1299, a fat cock was sold for 3 halfpence, two pullets for 3 halfpence, a fat capon for 2½d. a goose 4d. a mallard 3 halfpence, a partridge 3 halfpence, a pheasant 4d. a heron 6d. a plover 1d. a swan 3s. a crane 12d. two woodcocks 3 halfpence, a fat lamb from Christmas to Shrovetide 16d. and all the rest of the year 4d.—See Stowe's Chron.

In 1276, Edward had a 15th granted him by the earls, barons, great men, and community of the kingdom; and by the abp. of Canterbury and his suffragans, a subsidy of their goods (not said how much) as a free gift only, not to be drawn into example.—See Rot. Parl. 4 Edw. I.—In 1277, the laity gave him the 12th part of their goods, towards carrying on the war in Wales. In 1283, toward the war against the Welsh, the laity gave him a 30th, and the clergy a 20th part of their goods. Pope Nicholas IV. granted him the 10th of all ecclesiastical benefices, according to their true value, upon oath, throughout all England; to be received for the space of 6 years next ensuing, for the relief of the holy land against the Turks.—See Wikes Hist. Ang.—In 1290, the abps. bps. abbots, priors, earls, barons, &c. granted a 15th of all their moveable goods, as appears by the chequer-roll in the 19th Edw. I. with the king's remembrance. In 1294, the prelates and clergy granted the moiety of their benefices and goods. And in the same year, at a parliament holden on the 12th of Nov. at Westminster, when four knights were summoned from every county, to consult and consent to such things as the earls, barons, and great men should ordain, for themselves and the communities of the counties; they gave the king a 10th of their moveable goods. In the same month the city of London granted a 6th part of their moveable goods, as a subsidy toward the war. About the same time there were commissioners appointed to require, in person, the men of all his demesne-cities and towns in all the counties of England, by all ways they should see expedient, to grant a 6th part, as London had done, that it might shew example to others of his demesne-towns. In 1295, the clergy gave the king a 10th; the earls, barons, knights, and others of the kingdom, gave an 11th; and the citizens and burgesses, and other good men of his demesnes, gave him a 7th of their moveable goods. In 1296, the earls, barons, knights, and others of the kingdom, gave a 12th part; the citizens, burgesses, and tenants of his demesnes, gave an 8th part. The clergy gave nothing, by reason of an inhibition the abp. had obtained from pope Boniface; which he caused to be published at this time in all the cathedrals. In 1297, he had an 8th of all the laity, and a

10th of the clergy, for the confirmation of the Great Charter, and the Charter of the Forests. The clergy of the province of Canterbury gave a 10th; and the province of York a 5th. In 1301, upon his confirmation of the perambulations of the forests, the laity gave him a 15th of their moveables. Robert abp. of Canterbury, would grant nothing for the clergy without the special licence of the pope. In 1304, the king being in Scotland, commissioners were appointed to tax cities, boroughs, and his demesnes in cities and boroughs, either capitation by poll, or in common, as it might turn most to his advantage. In 1305, the king having summoned a parl. at Westminster to raise money for the war against the Scots, there was given him by the clergy, nobility, and knights of the shires, the 30th penny of all their moveable goods; and at the same time the citizens and burgesses gave a 20th of the same estates. In this parliament, also, the abps. bps. prelates, earls, barons, and other tenants of his demesnes, petitioned, that they might have leave to taliate their tenants of the same demesnes, as he had taliated them; and it was granted. And about this time he had a 15th granted to him in parliament. In 1306, the king intending to knight his eldest son, summoned the abps. bps. abbots, priors, earls, barons, &c. to grant an aid upon that occasion. He also sent to all the sheriffs of England, to cause to come two knights of every county, and of every city two citizens, and of each borough one or two burgesses as as the borough was greater or less. The prelates, earls, barons, &c. and also the knights of shires, unanimously granted to the king for themselves, and the whole community of the kingdom, a 30th part all of their temporal moveable goods, &c. for a competent aid toward the knighthood of his son, and also for an aid toward his expences, which he was to be at in the war with Scotland. The citizens and burgesses also unanimously granted a 20th.

—EDWARD II.

The first parliament called by this king, was at Northampton, in 1308, in the first year of his reign, and before his coronation, wherein it was enacted, that the base coin used in his father's reign should not be refused upon pain of life and limb. Here the clergy granted a 15th of their goods, and the laity a 20th. An order was made at this time for the burial of the late king, who was solemnly brought from Waltham, and interred at Westminster, with much funeral pomp and ceremony. But to allay the young king's grief for the loss of his father, a marriage was, also, concluded in this parliament between his favourite Pierce Gaveston, the new earl of Cornwall, and the daughter and heir of Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester. Our modern historians are full of invectives against the king's favourite, Gaveston; and every fresh favour granted to this foreigner, by the king, increased the hatred of the lords against him. Rapin observes, 'that hardly would an Englishman raised to so high a station have been endured, much less a private Gascon gentleman, in whom they discovered no other merit than a handsome face, an easy shape, and a quick wit; very agreeable in conversation, but little proper to govern a state.' On the other hand, dr. Brady, from sir Thos. de la More, who was servant to Edward II. and wrote his life, adds to the character of person and sense, which the Monsieur gives him, 'that he was a great general and sufficiently skilful in military affairs; which appeared by his management of, and keeping in due subjection the Scots, when he commanded the English forces in that kingdom; and for which, adds our authorities, he was much envied by those who saw his happy success.' However, since the lords plainly saw that it was in vain to press the king to part with his favourite, and that he would never consent to it unless he was forced, they convened themselves at Ware, and from thence went to Northampton; and the king, having no forces to oppose them, was obliged to summon a parliament to meet 15 days after. Which being met accordingly, at London, divers articles were laid to the charge of the favourite, 'as abusing the king's ear by obtaining immoderate grants to himself; his embezzling the treasure of the kingdom, and taking the best jewels of the crown to his own use.' Thus far Mr. Tyrrel; but he omits what J. Stowe adds in their complaint, though he quotes the very passage from that history, viz. that the lords told the king, 'that Gaveston's father was executed for being a traitor to the king of France; that his mother was burned for a witch; and that the said Pierce was banished for consenting to his mother's witchcraft; and that he had now bewitched the king himself.' See Stowe's Hist. p. 213.—The king, as is said, hoping to divide the barons, and take off some that had been the least provoked, proposed it to the abp. of Canterbury, the bp. of Durham, the earls of Lancaster and Hereford, that he would refer all differences to them, and confirm whatsoever they should judge most fit to be done on this occasion. But the bps. and lords would not undertake the odium of such an arbitration; and said, 'they would act nothing without the general consent of all the rest of the barons, who would not be satisfied with any thing less than that the earl of Cornwall should immediately quit the kingdom.' This the king delaying to grant, they were about to take up arms; but, he, fearing the ill consequence of a downright denial, after many alterations with his nobles, was, at last, obliged to part with his favourite, and to banish him from England for ever. This sentence had the ratification of all the estates: and to make it stronger on the king's part, he confirmed it by letters patents under the great seal, which letters patents, and the sentence of banishment, are to be found at large in Tyrrel's Hist. vol. 3, p. 229. All the mitigation the king could gain his minion, in this matter, was to send him into

Ireland, over which kingdom he made him governor; and the king himself bore him company as far as Bristol. But this was not the only business transacted at this parliament. The lords had a mind to fall upon new modelling the government again; and accordingly presented an address to the king, complaining, 'that the state and his own household were so ill managed, that it was absolutely necessary to find means to prevent the consequences of this disorder.' They added, 'that the only proper method, as they thought, was for the king to leave to certain lords, appointed by the parliament, the care of well governing the kingdom, and his own domestic affairs.' This very modest address, which his father would have made them smart for, this weak prince gave his consent to; and without considering the consequence, says M. Rapin, of a condescension so pernicious to his authority and quiet, he permitted the parliament to chuse 7 bishops, 8 earls, and 6 barons, to make the proposed regulation. No sooner were these commissioners constituted, but they all took an oath, 'That they would make such ordinances as should be to the honour of God, the honour and profit of holy church, to the honour of their lord the king, and to the profit of him and his people, &c.' After which they made several ordinances, to the number of 41, which will be found in dr. Brady's Hist. p. 103, and is printed in his appendix. The same author has given us a translation of them, in effect, with the king's confirmation of them, both of which are too long for our purpose.

Another parliament met at Stamford, July 26, 1309: it was summoned to suppress the ill intentions of the Scots; but we do not find any thing done to that purpose. Here the king so far prevailed with the major part of the nobility, there present, that they were content Pierce Gaveston should enjoy the earldom of Cornwall during life.

On the 18th of Oct. 1310, the king held another parliament, or rather a piece of a parliament, at York; for here several discontented lords refused to come; being greatly dissatisfied at what was done at the last. At this meeting the renowned Pierce Gaveston appeared again, and took his place as earl of Cornwall; but he had much better have staid where he was, as the consequence will shew. The heads of the opposition, who refused their attendance, were the earl of Lancaster, the king's cousin German; and the earls of Warwick, Oxford, Lincoln, and Arundale; whom dr. Brady calls The Ordainers. The chief business done at this meeting was, first the king published his reasons for the recalling his favourite, which were, 'that he was banished contrary to the laws and usages of the kingdom, which he, the king, was bound to maintain by the oath he took at his coronation; and seeing he was, in the instrument of exile, stiled no otherwise than good and loyal, he returned at his commandment; and was ready to stand trial before him, and answer to all such as would accuse him, every thing that should be objected against him, according to the laws and usages aforesaid.' This declaration was dated at York, Jan. 18, and directed to the sheriff of Yorkshire and all the sheriffs in England. The lords, who were assembled, neglected not this opportunity offered them, and represented to the king, 'that the laws and customs of the kingdom were not observed, nor the late made Ordinances regarded.' Upon which the king, to obviate such reports, issued out another declaration, by which he commanded the sheriffs of all counties to proclaim in full county, and in all cities, boroughs and market towns, and in other places which they should think expedient, 'that it was his great care and chief desire, his peace should every where be observed, and that all the laws and customs of the kingdom, used and approved in the time of his progenitors, and also all the ordinances lately made to the honour of God and holy church, and his own, to the profit of him and his people, which were not to the damage or prejudice of him and his crown, or contrary to the laws and customs aforesaid, should be maintained and kept. Witness the king at York, Jan. 26.'—See Brady's App. No. 54.—The discontented lords were then in London, and the king, fearing some disturbance might happen, sent an order to the mayor, aldermen, and common council of London, 'to secure the city, so as by the meetings of the prelates, earls, barons and others, there might happen no hurt or danger to him, or the city. The declaration and order above, availing nothing to better the king's cause; nor another, wherein he sets forth, 'that he was resolved to preserve the rights of his crown and royal dignity, the peace and tranquillity of holy church, and the whole people committed to his charge in all things;' in order to proceed, amicably, with the dissatisfied bishops and barons, and according to the power reserved in the protestation he made when he confirmed the Ordinances, the king appointed commissioners out of those prelates and barons he had with him at York, to treat with those of the Secession at London, about the observation of the Ordinances, upon which were grounded all their pretences of discontent; and to reform and correct, by their good advice, all such things in them as were prejudicial or injurious to him, or contrary to the form of the commission, before granted, if any such should appear. The prelates, earls, and barons, who were then at London, excused themselves from treating concerning the Ordinances, in the absence of the king, and sent him this answer, 'that in his presence, whenever he pleased to call them together, they would treat upon the Ordinances, and should be ready to do all things according to his own protestation, and also according to the protestation they made at the time of publishing these ordinances.

The seceding lords began now to declare openly, that they would by force drive Gaveston from the king; and accordingly raised an army, over which, by common consent, Thomas earl of Lancaster was made general. After which they sent a message to the king, 'that they besought him either to deliver Pierce Gaveston to them; or, as it had been ordained, command him instantly to depart the kingdom.' The king, putting his favourite's preservation on a footing with his own, retired with him from York to Newcastle; where the barons and their army followed them. From thence they went to Tinnmouth, where the king taking shipping, carried Gaveston with him to Scarborough, and placing him in the strong castle there, he himself left him and went to York. The earl of Lancaster and his army still followed them, and coming before Scarborough castle, they besieged it; which, after some time, capitulating, Gaveston rendered himself upon condition, 'to stand to the judgment of the barons, and that he might once more speak with the king.' But now, having him at their mercy, he found but a small share of it from them; for they soon after, without much process, beheaded him, as a public enemy to the kingdom. Gaveston being thus cut off, the lords in the confederacy sent a haughty message to the king, proudly demanding, says Walsingham, that their Ordinances should be confirmed and put in execution, threatening, 'that, if it was not done speedily, they would come and compel him to do it.' And they united all their forces, and quartered themselves in the country about Dunstable, the king being then at London. But soon after, a treaty was set on foot betwixt the king and his barons, by the mediation of some bishops; and articles of agreement, 8 in number, were settled betwixt them. By the first, it was stipulated, 'that the earls and barons, concerned in the affair above, should come before the king in Westm. hall, and with great humility, on their knees, make their submission, and swear, if he so desired, that what they did, and for which they had incurred his displeasure, was not done in despite of him, and they should humbly pray his forgiveness, and receive it with a good will,' &c. This submission was to be made publicly, at the next parliament. But for all that the king took the death of Gaveston so heavily, that he never forgave the authors of it; and, when he had it in his power, revenged it severely on them.

In 1313, Edward summoned a parliament to meet at Westm. on the 21st of September. The earl of Lancaster came thither attended with a great number of armed men, raised from his own tenants; notwithstanding the king had sent him a positive inhibition against it, as well as to some other lords of the same party. When they were met, the king renewed his complaints before the clergy and laity, 'concerning the affronts and injuries he had lately received from the barons; of their taking Pierce Gaveston and cutting off his head, contrary to the articles he had made at his surrender.' The confederate lords, on the other side, unanimously answered to these accusations, 'that they had in no wise offended the king in what was laid to their charge, but rather deserved thanks and good will from him; since they did not bring an army thither, in contempt of his authority, but only to destroy a public enemy of the kingdom, who had been often banished by the community thereof, and which sentence had been confirmed by the king himself, as being a person who had not only injured the king's reputation, but had robbed the crown of its revenues, and had raised perpetual dissensions betwixt the king and his natural-born subjects.' They, also, boldly declared, 'That they would no longer trust to his vain promises, or be deferred any longer of their securities.' The queen, the bishops, and the earl of Gloucester, who was a neutral lord in this matter, undertook to settle these differences, and to make peace between them. By their mediation, therefore, the king was to remit his displeasure towards the lords, provided that they and their adherents, did in Westm. hall, in full parliament, perform the submission which had been before agreed on, viz. 'That they should humble themselves before him, and beg his pardon in whatever they had offended him, and thereupon the king should again receive them into his grace and favour, and should look upon them for the future as his liegemen and subjects; and, confirming all the articles required, should never again question any man for the death of Gaveston, but should grant his charter of indemnity to all that should desire it.' All which particulars being agreed to by the king, and performed by the confederacy, they, with the rest of the great men of the kingdom, considering the king's necessities, granted him a 15th of all their moveable goods; and then the parliament was dissolved, every man going home with joy and satisfaction.

The affairs in Scotland, at this time, went worse than at home; Rob. Bruce, their new king, taking advantage of the civil dissensions in England, had now reduced the greater part of that country to his obedience. To recover what was lost, Edw. raised a vast army, and marched against the Scotch king; but met with so great an overthrow at Bannockburn, that, after leaving the greatest part of his army dead behind him, he retired with much precipitation to York. Here it was that he called a parliament, or a council of his shattered nobility, to meet on the 15th of August, 1314; but the nation being in much consternation, by their late great loss, though this assembly sat, from the time aforesaid until Michaelmas, yet nothing but the exchange of the lady of Robert Bruce, and some other prisoners, was concluded at it.—See Tyrrel and Brady.

This devastation of men was followed by a dreadful famine which lasted 3 years, and destroyed an infinite number of people. To remedy which, and to settle the price of provisions, which were grown excessive dear at that time, the king summoned a parliament to meet at Westm. on the 20th of Dec. this year.

When the prelates, peers, and commons were there assembled, they took into consideration the sad condition of the kingdom, and how to abate the excessive price of victuals, which by reason of the late bad years was grown so scarce that the ordinary people had much ado to live. The abps. bps. earls, barons, &c. presented a petition to the king and his council, praying, that a proclamation might be issued out settling the Price of Provisions in the manner following:—

'Because, say they, that oxen, cows, muttons, hogs, geese, hens, capons, chickens, pigeons, and eggs, were excessive dear, that the best ox, not fed with corn, should be sold for 16s. and no more: and if he was fed with corn, then for 24s. at most. The best live fat cow for 12s. A fat hog, of 2 years old, for 3s. 4d. A fat weather or mutton, unshorn, for 20d. and shorn for 14d. A fat goose for 2½d. A fat capon for 2d. A fat hen for a 1d. Two chickens for 1d. Four pigeons for 1d. and 24 eggs for 1d. And those who would not sell the things for these rates were to forfeit them to the king.' Proclamation was made in every county in England accordingly. Mr. Tyrrel observes, that silver was then at 24d. the ounce, which must argue a great allay in it at that time. This petition being made by a parliament, from thence it became a temporary statute; yet it did not take sufficient effect, by reason that the scarcity of all provisions still increased. A quarter of corn, being sold not long after for 20s. and barley for a mark; the sheep being, also, mostly dead of the rot, and corn being so very dear, hogs and poultry could not be kept, whereby all manner of fresh meats became so scarce, that the king, going to St. Albans in Nov. this year, had much ado to get bread to sustain his family. This parliam. however, granted the king a 20th part of their goods or moveables; but in Staffordshire and Shropshire some refused to pay it, and hindered the collectors, appointed by the king, from gathering it. Their pretence was, that this tax was granted on certain conditions; viz. 'that the king should cause the great Charter of the Liberties of England, the Charter of the Forest, the Ordinances made by the prelates, earls, and barons, and the Perambulation of Forests, to be observed, which had not then been duly put in execution.' The king was much surprised and displeased at this remonstrance, since he had strictly commanded that all these laws should be kept, and had assigned commissioners in all counties to make the Perambulations; whereupon that he might be thoroughly satisfied about the nature of the action, and have the names of the actors, he appointed one of his clerks to go with the collectors, and to make enquiry by themselves, or by the oaths of lawful men of those parts, if it was needful, concerning the particulars, and certify them distinctly to him.—See Tyrrel and Brady.

In 1315, the king summoned a parliament to meet at Lincoln Jan. 28; where being met, the king deferred going upon any business, because his cousin Thomas earl of Lancaster, and other great men were not yet arrived, according to whose advice he intended to proceed. But, in the mean time, the chancellor, treasurer, and justices of both benches, were enjoined to bring in briefs of such matters depending before them, in their several places, which could not be determined out of parl. that here in this session they might proceed in them as they ought. The cause of summoning this parliament was declared; being for their advice and assistance against the Scots, who had possessed themselves of the greatest part of that nation, and thrown off all allegiance to England; the king, 'besought and enjoined all his liege subjects, there present, to advise and assist him in this matter. Upon this it was agreed to meet the next day; when being assembled they debated many things, which took up all that day, and the king commanded they should come together again the day following. Here it was agreed, that the act passed the last parl. relating to the proclamation for the prices of victuals, should be repealed, and that they should be sold as formerly at as reasonable rates as they could be afforded. For a very good reason, says Walsingham, because that after that statute, provisions were grown much dearer; the dearth still continuing in a greater degree. Two or three days after the king, by the bp. of Norwich, declared to the whole body assembled, 'that he would observe all the Ordinances, formerly made by the prelates and great men, and also the Perambulations of Forests, made in his father's time; saving to the king his reasons against them.' And writs were made out accordingly. The next day the parl. granted to the king, in aid for his war with Scotland, of every village in the kingdom one stout footman, except cities, boroughs, and the king's demesnes; and these footmen were to be armed and furnished with swords, bows, arrows, slings, lances, and other armour fit for footmen, at the charge of the towns, and their expences to be paid, until they came to the place of rendezvous, and their wages for 60 days after, and no longer, unless the king's service required it, at 4d. a day. Market-towns that were able to be charged further with men, were so to be charged; the king promising to give his letters to the peers and commons and to their heirs, 'that this grant should be no precedent nor drawn into example for the future.'—The same day, by the advice of this parl. the king ordered all the military service due to him, which was the whole militia of England, to be summoned to appear at Newcastle upon Tyne, 15 days after Midsummer. Then the knights, citizens and burgesses granted the king an aid to carry on this expedition into Scotland, which was a 15th part of all moveable goods, on citizens, burgesses, and men of cities and boroughs and the king's demesnes, which they were possessed of at Michaelmas last. Before this parl. was dissolved, the king, to shew his sincerity towards his cousin Th. earl of Lancaster, sent the bp. of Norwich to tell him, 'that he desired he would cast away all fears and doubts on his account, assuring him that he bore the earl a hearty good-will, with the rest of the nobles, and held them to be his faithful liege-men; and further told him that the king desired to have him the chief of his council; requesting him, in behalf of the king, prelates, and great men there present, to take upon him and assist and advise in the affairs of the king and kingdom.' The earl thanked the king and humbly requested time to give in his answer, and after a very short pause he consented to the proposal, and was sworn of the king's council. Our records have preserved the form of this oath, or protestation, which since it is singular, done in parl., and ordered to be entered on the Roll, claims a place in our history.

"Whereas our lord king Edward, by the grace of God king of England, hath with the prelates, earls, and barons of the land, in full parl. requested his dear cousin, the lord Thomas, earl of Lancaster, that he would be chief of his council in all great and weighty affairs, touching himself and his realm; together with other prelates, earls and barons, who shall, between the king and him, take care, that it may be for the profit of the king and the realm; the said earl, for the great love he hath for his lord the king, and for common profit of the kingdom, and the Ordinances, which he had entirely granted to observe, and the right laws to maintain in all points, and in hopes to make amendments in such things as had been ill done in his court, and the estate of his realm, did yield to be of the king's council, with the prelates, earls, and barons; so as at any time, if the king shall not do according to his directions, and those of his council, concerning the matters of his court and kingdom, after such things have been shown him; and that he will not be directed by the council of him, and others, the earl without evil will, challenge, or discontent, may be discharged from the council; and that the business of the realm concerning him, shall not be done, or performed without the assent of him and the other prelates, earls and barons, which shall be ordained or appointed to advise him; and if any of the prelates, earls and barons, shall advise the king, or do other thing, which shall not be for the profit of him and his realm, then at the next parl. by the advice of the king and his friends, they shall be removed; and so it shall be from parl. to parl. as to them, and every of them, according to the faults found in them." In witness hereof this bill was to be entered on the Parliament Roll.

So great were the confusions that followed the last parl. by the Scottish invasions, that though more parliaments were called, yet none sat to do any business to the purpose; and one, particularly, which was summoned to meet at Lincoln, in 1318, the writs being revoked for this reason, 'that his enemies and rebels the Scots had invaded England and come into Yorkshire, committing many murders, plundering, wasting and burning the country; so that the king resolved suddenly to march against them with an army to restrain their incursions and bring them to a submission; and therefore this parliament was put off.

In the midst of these tumults, the king found an opportunity to meet his parl. at York; which had been summoned to come to that city, Oct. 20, 1319. Here it was that an indenture, made betwixt the earl of Lancaster and certain prelates, earls, and barons, who were sent by the king to Northampton to consult with the earl relative to the better regulation of the government, was read in parl. and all things in it diligently considered. Upon which the parl. agreed to petition the king, 'that for the honour of himself and the profit of him and the realm, that for the great affairs which concern him and which do daily happen, he would please to assent that 2 bps., 1 earl, 1 baron, 1 baron or banneret of the family of the earl of Lancaster, in his name and for him, should be present and remain with him by turns, or quarters of the year, to deliberate with, and advise him in due manner; and that they might deliberate and advise about all considerable matters out of parl. until a parl. should otherwise determine concerning them; so as none of these things should be debated without the counsel or assent of the prelates, earls and others which remained with the king according to the form of the said indenture; and if any thing was done otherwise it should be void.' The king understanding this request, and, says our authority, desiring to be advised what to do for the honour and profit of him and the realm, agreed to have the said prelates, earls and barons to advise him in the form aforesaid; yet so as his ministers should always perform their offices according to the law and usage of the kingdom. And whereas it was contained in the said Indenture, "that the prelates, earls and barons there named, had undertaken by the assent of the king, that he should make to the earl of Lancaster, his people, or party and followers, releases and acquittances of all manner of felonies and trespasses against his peace, until st. James's day this year; and that the charters of release and acquittances should be absolute without condition, and if better security could be found for them in the next parliament, they should have it, and also confirmed by the king and his baronage; the king by the assent of the prelates, earls and barons, and commonalty of his realm in his said parliament, granted a pardon to the earl of Lancaster and his followers, for the breach of his peace, and whatever belonged to him, by reason thereof; and of all manner of felonies and trespasses committed against the peace unto the 7th of Aug. last past, and a pardon of outlawry to those that should demand it, if any had been pronounced against them, before the making of their charters; and commanded the bp. of Ely, then his chancellor, that he should make charters under his great seal, absolute and without condition, for the earl of Lancaster, and such as he should by his letters name to the chancellor. Also, whereas in the same indenture it was contained, that the Ordinances should be holden and kept as they had passed the great seal, the king now willed and granted, that they should be so observed, and that all these things should be entered upon the parl. roll, and sent to the chancery to be enrolled there, and from thence to both benches, to be likewise enrolled in them."

At this parl. also, the Despensers, father and son, came first upon the stage; Hugh Despenser the younger, being by consent of this assembly made the king's chamberlain. Sir Thos. de la More, the cotemporary historian of this king's reign, writes, that he was put upon the king because they knew he hated him. But the young man soon played his cards so well that he quickly changed the king's mind towards him, and he became as great a favourite as Gaveston; for which he was persecuted with equal fury by the Ordainers.—We have not met with any parliamentary aids given by the clergy for some time; but at a prorogation of this last parl. to meet again after Easter, an aid was demanded of that body: they excused themselves from granting any, without the pope's licence; but allowed that a messenger should be sent to Rome, at the king's expence, for that purpose. At his return he brought a licence from his holiness, that the clergy should grant a 10th for one year, which was done accordingly.

Another confederacy of the barons now started up against the Despensers, father and son, whose lands and lordships they burnt and destroyed all over England. Thomas earl of Lancaster was, also, at the head of this league; and they had bound themselves by certain written instruments, or indentures, to pursue both father and son to destruction. These indentures will be found at large, with the names of the principal confederate lords, in Brady and Tyrrel, under the year 1320.—After many lawless devastations, in which the innocent were involved with the guilty, they marched to St. Albans, from whence they sent five bps. to the king, 'to demand in their names that the two Despensers, Hugh and Hugh, as traitors, should be banished from his court and kingdom.' The king answered the messengers, mildly, 'that Hugh, the father, was beyond sea, in his service, and Hugh the son was at sea, for the guarding the cinque-ports, according to his duty; and that according to right and custom they ought not to be banished without answering for themselves.' This answer, though it seemed so fair and reasonable, says Tyrrel, did but the more enrage the angry barons; who, taking up arms again, marched directly for London, where the king then was, and where, in order to settle these differences and disorders he had called a parliament to meet on July 15, 1321.

The parl. met at Westm. on the day appointed.

ed, but the discontented lords, though they were so near, came not according to the summons, but remained in London, in an armed posture, in direct defiance of the king and laws, for 15 days after the parl. was begun, without once appearing at it. They held councils, however, by themselves, and, without ever consulting the king about it, they drew up a sentence, or judgment, against the two Despensers, and brought it down to Westminster, with force of arms, which the king, being in no wise able to oppose, they got passed into a law and enrolled accordingly. This sentence, or statute, translated from the old French, is as follows:—

“ To the honour of God and holy church, and of our lord the king, for the profit of him and his realm, and to maintain peace amongst his people, and the estate of the crown, the prelates, earls, barons, and other peers and commons of the realm, do shew against sir Hugh Despenser, father and son, that whereas sir Hugh the son, at the parl. held at York, was appointed to be chamberlain to the king, in which parl. it was agreed, that certain prelates and other great men should be with the king by turns, at several seasons of the year, the better to advise him, without whom no great business ought to be done; now the said sir Hugh the son, drawing to him his father, who was not by order of parl. to be near the king, or to be one of those counsellors, between them both have usurped royal power over the king and his ministers, and the government of the kingdom, to the dishonour of the king, the injury of the crown, and the destruction of the kingdom, great men and people, and have done the wickednesses underwritten, in contriving to turn the heart of the king from the peers of the land, that so they (the Despensers) may have the sole governm. thereof. That sir Hugh the son made a bill or writing, whereby he would have had sir John Gifford of Brimmesfield, sir Rich. de Greye, and others, enter into a confederacy, to have forced the king to do what he would have him, and had almost done it; the tenor of which bill is underwritten:—1st. Homage and the oath of allegiance is more due, by reason of the crown, than of the person of the king, and is more tied or fixed to the crown, than to the person; and this appears, for that before the state of the crown descends, there is no allegiance due to the person expectant; wherefore if the king does not govern himself by reason, according to the right, or law, of the crown, his lieges are then bound by their oath taken to the crown, to remove the king, and to take care of the state of the crown, by a due administration; for otherwise that oath could not be observed. Now if it be demanded, how the king is to be dealt with, whether by suit of law, or by rigour? not by the former, for no man can be redressed that way, because he can have no judge, unless it be from the king himself; in which case, if the king will not be guided according to reason, he will then be obstinate in his error: wherefore he ought to keep his oath, and when the king will not relieve him, but is outrageous, and will do that which is injurious to his people in general, and withal is prejudicial to his crown, then is it time for them to proceed against him with rigour; for he is bound by his oath to govern his people and his lieges; and they are bound to govern in aid of him, in case of his default.

—2nd. Upon any application of the great men and people unto him, the king's answer still was according to the pleasure of these two, in turning the king from his duty against his oath, and the hearts of the great men and people against their liege lord.—3rd. By their evil contrivance, they would not suffer the great men of the realm, nor good counsellors to speak with, or come near the king to advise him, nor the king to speak with them, unless in their presence, or in the hearing of one of them, and that too but when they pleased; thus usurping royal power and sovereignty over the person of the king, to the great dishonour and peril of him, his crown and kingdom.—

4th. To attain their wickedness, covetousness, and to the disinheriting of the great men, and the destruction of the people, they had put out good and agreeable ministers who had been placed by assent, and put in others false and wicked, that were of their own party, who would not suffer right to be done; as sheriffs, escheators, constables of castles; and made those justices, who understood not the law, as sir Hugh the father, sir Ralph Basset, sir Ralph Camois, and sir John Inge, and divers others their friends, who caused by false jurors of their alliance, the peers of the land to be indicted; as the earl of Hereford, the lord Gifford of Brimmesfield, the lord Rob. de Mont-halt, and other good people, to get their lands from them.—5th. They falsely and maliciously advised the king to raise arms against his people, in Gloucestershire, contrary to the great charter, and the award of the peers of the land; and by their false and evil counsel, would have made war in the land, for their own proper quarrel, to the destruction of holy church, and the people. 6th. Whereas the earl of Hereford, and the lord Mortimer of Wigmore, by the king's command, were assigned to make war upon Llewelyn Bren, who had levied war against him in Glamorganshire, when the earl of Gloucester's lands, by reason of his death, were in the king's hands; this Llewelyn had rendered himself into those lords hands, to the king's grace and pleasure, and upon that condition was delivered to the king, who received him accordingly: but when these lords were out of the country, these two sir Hughs, the father and son, usurping royal power, took Llewelyn, and carried him to Caerdiff. After which, sir Hugh the younger being seized thereof, and pretending to a jurisdiction where none was in this case, there caused the said Llewelyn, to be drawn, hanged, beheaded, and quartered, feloniously, for things done in the time of king Henry; and they also took upon them royal power and jurisdiction, which was appendant to the crown, in disherison thereof, and to the dishonour of the king, the said lords of Hereford and Mortimer, and in ill example and great peril in the like case for time to come. 7th. They ill advised the king, to take into his hands the lands and goods of sir Hugh Audley the son, who was fore-judged without due process, contrary to the law of the land, by the covetousness of the said Hugh to get some of those lands, and by other false pretences, contrived to get the lands of sir Roger Dammory, having attainted him upon his entering into Gloucestershire, to the disheritance of the peers of the land.—8th. That whereas the king had granted by his letters patents to the earl of Warwick, in full parl. at Westm. that after his death, his executors should have his lands, until his heir was of full age; which grant, after the earl's death, was confirmed by the king at Lincoln, at the request and assent of the peers of the land in parl.: yet the said sir Hugh the father procured his son to cause the king to repeal this grant, without cause; and to give the guardianship of the said lands to the said Hugh the father, for his own profit; and also had defeated by evil counsel, what the king had granted in his parliaments, by good advice, and by assent of the peers of the land; to the dishonour of the king, and against right and reason.—9th. That they would not suffer the king to take reasonable fines of the peers of the land, and others, when they entered upon, and received their fees, as it had been used before that time: but by covetousness, to obtain such lands by the royal power, they had caused undue impeachments to be brought, surmising the land to be forfeited, as were those of sir John de Mowbray and others, to the damage and dishonour of the king, and contrary to the law of the land, in disheritance of the great men and others; and also making the king do against his oath in parliament.—10th. By wicked covetousness, and engrossing of power-royal, they would not suffer the king to hear or do right to the great men, upon what they presented to him, on behalf of himself and themselves, touching the disheriting the crown and them, concerning the lands which were the Templars: also by usurping power-royal they governed the king, his council, and prelates; so that in matters concerning them and their friends, or which they undertook, no right could be obtained, but according to their pleasures: to the damage and dishonour of the king, the peril of his oath, and disheritance and destruction of the people of his realm.—11th. Bishops, abbots, and priors elect, who ought to be received of the king, when duly elected, could not come near him, nor speak with him to obtain his favour, until they had agreed and made fine with sir Hugh the son, according to his pleasure; nor those that had any grant to ask of the king, could obtain it, before they had made their agreement or fine with him.—Which wickednesses being notorious and true, as it is found by the examination of the earls, barons, and other peers of the land; therefore we the peers of the land, earls and barons, in the presence of our lord the king, do award, that Hugh le Despenser the son, and Hugh le Despenser the father, shall be disherited for ever, as disheritors of the crown, and enemies to the king and his people; and shall be banished the kingdom of England, never to return again, unless it be by the assent of the king, and by assent of the prelates, earls and barons in parliament duly summoned; and to quit the realm between the time of the date of this statute, and the feast of the decollation of st. John Baptist (or nine and twentieth of August) next coming; and if found in England after the day, or if they return after that day, then to be dealt with as enemies of the king and kingdom."

This in the printed copy of old statutes, is called The Banishment of Hugh Despenser, father and son. Yet it is remarkable that these articles were admitted and taken for granted, without any direct proof, as the manner then was to proceed in parl. After this sentence was publicly read and agreed to, the confederate lords had, yet, another game to play; which the same force would easily carry them through. They bethought themselves that it was necessary to have some security for what they had done; and in order to it they addressed a kind of a petition, or rather a remonstrance, to the king, setting forth, "That the two Despensers, usurping royal power, and having the king and his ministers and the direction of the law, at their devotion, or in their power, the great men of the land made a confederacy by oath, writing, and in other manner, without the king's leave; and then they and others, with horse and arms, had marched against them, and took and seized divers castles, towns, manors, lands, tenements, goods and chattels of the king's liege-subjects; and some of them they took and imprisoned, and others they ransomed, and some they killed, and did many other things, in destroying the said Hugh and Hugh, and their allies and others in England, Wales and the Marches, of which some may be called felonies; which things having been so done by necessity, ought not to be taken notice of, nor punished by law; nor can be without great trouble or hazard of war. The barons therefore pray the king, for peace sake, for the assuaging of anger and rancour, and making unity in the land; and that he may more entirely have the hearts and good-will of his people, to defend his own countries, and offend his enemies; that it might be accorded, and assented to in full parliament, by the king, prelates, earls, barons and commons; that no great men of the realm, prelate, earl, baron, knight, clerk, or esq. for the confederacy made by oath, writing, or in other manner; or for riding with the king's or other banners displayed; nor for the taking or detaining of any castles, towns, manors, lands, tenements, goods or chattels; the seizing, imprisoning, and ransoming the king's liege-people; or for killing of men, and other robberies, felonies, or other things done against the king's peace, which may be judged trespasses or felonies; from the beginning of the world to that day; nor that any people of what condition soever they were, for the trespasses and felonies aforesaid, committed since Candlemas last past, to that day, should be impeached, grieved, or molested at the suit of the king, or any other. But of all such things, by this statute and accord, should be quit for ever; saving to every one, except the said Hugh and Hugh, their right to demand, and recover their frank-tenement and their right; without punishment from the king, or giving damages to the party. And also that it might be granted by the king in the said parl. that if any earl, baron, or any great men, for themselves or others, whom they shall name to the chancellor, between this and St. Michael next coming, will have the king's pardon for suit or process of the peace, or what pertains to him, of all manner of felonies and trespasses done contrary to the peace; or of any disobediences, contempts, conspiracies, confederations, privy covenants, and obligations made against the king, they shall have their several charters of pardon, under the great seal, without paying any fees in the chancery: and that all such writings to the contrary, wherever found, shall be null and void."—After this follows the form of the charter of pardon, that was taken out by the earl of Hereford and the rest of the barons and great men, who had been confederates in this violent undertaking. It bears date at Westm. the 20th of Aug. in the 15th year of this reign.

In 1322 the king issued his summons for a parl. to be holden at York. They met in that city, according to summons, 3 weeks after Easter; when upon the petitions of the Despensers, father and son, to the king, the process and judgment against them for their disinheritance and exile were brought into parl. and, upon shewing divers errors in them, they were revoked and made null. All which process and the statute made thereupon, being still on the rolls in the Tower, are translated at large by dr. Brady, because, says he, 'they contain some of the history and much of the practice and manner of great men's living in those days.' As we have given the Articles exhibited against the Despensers, it would be inconsistent with the impartiality we profess, to omit the statute for revoking their sentence of banishment: since it may justly stand as a summary of the defence they were not allowed to make at the time of their accusation. This statute of revocation first relates to Hugh the son, and begins with the recital of the sentence or award made at a parl. held 3 weeks after Midsummer last past, against the said Despensers, father and son; as also a petition which the son had some time before given to the king, shewing;

"That while he was in his service, as his chamberlain, the lords Mortimers, uncle and nephew, with divers barons there named, made a confederacy by oath and writing, to pursue and destroy him: by virtue of which, they with their retinues, consisting of 800 men at arms, 500 hoblers, or light horse, and 10,000 foot, came to Newport in Wales; and from thence marched forwards to take his towns and castles; and entering upon his lands, they killed part of his tenants or people; some of which were knights, therein named, besides others of the same degree, who were made prisoners; and they took and carried away his goods and chattels. Then it proceeds to recount every thing in particular; as how much provisions of all sorts, what horses, armour, and other things, were lost; as also how many oxen, cows and sheep, to a vast quantity, they then plundered and carried away; together with the loss of his charters, writings, and ready money; as also the burning his granges, destroying his crop upon the ground, seizing of his rents and debts, and disparking his parks; all which damages, as appeared by casting up the particulars therein mentioned, amounted to the sum of near 20,000*l*. Then it further recites, 'That they, the said earls and barons, with all their force and power came to the parl. at Westm. and there, upon false accusations, without calling the said Hugh to answer, against all manner of right and reason, and against the law of the land, erroneously awarded him to be disinherited, and exiled England; wherefore he prays the king, as he is bound by right of his crown, and by the oath he made at his coronation to maintain all people in their rights, that he would please to cause to be brought before him the process of the award made against him, that it may be examined; and that the said Hugh may be admitted to shew the errors in it, and if there shall be any found, he would please to repeal and redress them; with a protestation that he will be hereafter ready to answer any complaint according to reason.'—Next it proceeds to shew the errors of the said process, as, '1st. that the great men who pursued and destroyed him, prayed pardon of the king for all those things which might be judged felonies or trespasses in that pursuit, which they made by their own authority; by which they wrongfully made themselves judges of him, where they could not, nor ought to be judges. 2d. That the said Hugh was not called into court, to answer when the award was made; also, that the sentence was given without the assent of the prelates, who were peers in parliament. 3d. That there was no record of their pursuit, or the causes contained in the award; also, that the award was made against the form of the great charter: wherein is contained, that no man shall be fore-judged, nor in other manner destroyed, unless by judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.—Then he requests the king to take notice, 'that the great men were summoned to come duly to the parl. yet did not, but came with horse and arms, and all their force: after which he the said Hugh came in, and surrendered himself prisoner to the king; praying to be received into his protection, to prosecute his complaint, and that right might be done him in these matters: that the king received him as he ought to do; and caused his petition to be carried to the abp. of Canterbury, the bps. and other prelates and clergy in the province of Canterbury, then being in a provincial council at London; charging them by the faith they owed to him, to advise about the petition, and let him know their thoughts concerning it. And when they had well advised thereupon, they answered, that it seemed to them, that the process and award of the exile, and disinheritorship of Hugh the son, and father, were erroneous and wrongfully made; wherefore they agreed, and unanimously assented as peers of the land, and prayed as peers spiritual, that the award which was made wickedly and wrongfully against God and all manner of right, might be by the king repealed, and annulled for ever. And they said further, that they, nor any of them ever assented to the said Award; but that everyone of them, at the time when the Award was made, did make protestation in writing, that they could not, nor would assent to it for several reasons. And the earl of Kent, the said king's brother, the earls of Richmond, Pembroke, and Arundel, with the prelates, being before the king, said, the award was wrongful, and against law and right; and prayed him, as the prelates had done before, to null and make void the award: and the said earls affirmed, that for fear of the force, which the great men suddenly brought to the parl. in order to make the award, which was to them unknown and unexpected, they gave their assent to it, and also advised the king to suffer it to pass; for which offence and mistake they prayed his pardon."

Then immediately follows in the same record, a like petition delivered in parl. by Hugh le Despenser the father, being to the same effect with that of his son's; setting forth, "That the same great men before named, and other adherents and confederates, with force and arms, on the day of St. Barnaby, in the 14th year of the king, came to his manor of Fastern in Wiltshire, and 12 others in that shire, and in other counties, viz. 6 in Gloucester, 4 in Dorsetshire, 5 in Hampshire, 2 in Berkshire, 6 in Oxfordshire, 3 in Buckinghamshire, 4 in Surrey, 1 in Cambridgeshire, 2 in Huntingdonshire, 5 in Leicestershire, 1 in Yorkshire, 1 in Lincolnshire, 5 in Cheshire, and 5 in Warwickshire; in all 63 manors there named; which shews the vast estates the two lords Despensers had in those days. But as for the destruction and havock the barons made upon the lands of Hugh the father, they were much to the same effect with those that were done to the son, only greater; as 'the driving away of 23,000 sheep, 22,000 oxen, heifers and cows, besides the spoiling of two crops, one in the barn, and the other upon the ground; the taking away above 600 horses and mares, besides a vast quantity of provisions of all sorts, and armour for 200 men; and the destruction of his houses and goods to the value of above 30,000*l.* as also the taking away out of the king's castle at Marlborough, 36 sacks of wool, a chalice and cross of gold, divers rich vestments and other ornaments belonging to the chapel; besides other goods and furniture, to the damage of 5,000*l.* more."

Next follows the king's judgment in this form, "We afterwards at our parl. held at York 3 weeks after Easter, in the 15th year of our reign, caused to come before us the Process of the Award; as also the Petition of the said Hugh the son, and Hugh the father, in these words; to the honour of God, and holy church, &c. At which parl. at York, the said Hugh the son, and Hugh the father, being brought before us in court, prosecuted their complaints, and prayed us to do them right; when the said Hugh, the son, for himself alledged the errors in the process, as aforesaid; and also Hugh the father alledged the same errors, and prayed severally and jointly, that as the award was made erroneously and wrongfully, against the laws and usages of the realm, and against common right and reason, that we would annul and defeat the said award, and that they, the complainants, might be remitted and reconciled to our faith, and to such estate as they had, and were in before the awards. And hereupon hearing the reasons of the said Hugh and Hugh, we caused the process to be examined in full parl. in the presence of the prelates, earls, barons, knights of counties, and the people that were come by reason of the parl.; and we found the said award was made without calling them to answer, and without the assent of the prelates, who are peers of the realm in parl., and against the great charter of the franchises in England; which says, No freeman shall be banished, or otherwise destroyed, but by lawful judgment of his peers, or the law of the land; and for that they were not called in court, to make answer, &c. for these errors, and for that the causes of the said award were not duly proved: as also having regard to this, that we caused the parl. at Westm. to be summoned in due manner, and commanded by our writs the said great men, who made the said award, not to make assemblies and alliances, or come with armed men; yet they came with all their force to that parl., notwithstanding our command; and when they came to London in that manner, they held their councils and assemblies without coming to us at Westm. according to summons; and when we sent to them to come to the parl. at Westm., as they ought, they would not come, nor let us know their mind, nor the cause of the award, though we had begun and held the parl. for 15 days and more, and caused to come before us the prelates, and some earls and barons, knights of counties, and others, who came for the commons of the realm; and caused it to be published, that those that had petitions to promote, should deliver them: and after proclamation thus made, no petition was delivered, or complaint made against the said Hugh and Hugh, until they, the barons, came as aforesaid; and the contrivance of the said award they wholly concealed and kept from us, unto the very hour they came to Westm. with force and arms, and made their award against reason, as a thing treated and agreed on amongst themselves, by their own authority, in our absence; encroaching upon the regal power, jurisdiction and connusance, and judgment of those things which belong to our royal dignity: wherefore we could not at that time stop the said award, nor do right to the said Hugh and Hugh, as it belonged to us. And further taking notice, that those great men, after the award made, prayed our pardon and release for confederating themselves by oath, writing, or in other manner, without our leave; in pursuing the Despensers, and marching with our banners, and their own ensigns displayed; and taking and possessing castles, towns, manors, lands, tenements, goods and chattels; and also taking and imprisoning people of our allegiance, and others; some they wounded, and some they killed, and many other things they did in order to destroy the said Hugh and Hugh, in England, Wales, and other where: of which some might be called trespasses, and others felonies. Also it appeared, that those great men were enemies to, and hated them at the time of the award, and before; wherefore they ought not to be their judges, in their own prosecution of them, nor have record upon the causes of the said award. And we are bound by oath made at our coronation, and obliged to do right to all our subjects, and to redress and cause to be amended all wrongs done to them, when we are required; according to the great charter, by which we are not to sell or delay right and justice to any one: and at the pressing advice and request of the prelates, given us for the safety of our soul, and to avoid danger, and to take away an evil example for the time to come, of such undertakings and judgments in the like case, against reason: wherefore we seeing and knowing the said process and award, made in the manner aforesaid, to be as well to the prejudice of us, the blemish of our crown and royal dignity, against us and our heirs, as against the said Hugh and Hugh, and for other reasonable causes: We by our royal power, in a full parl. at York, by the advice and assent of the prelates, earls, and barons, knights of counties, and commons of the realm, and others, being at our parl. at York; do wholly annul and defeat the said award of the exile and disheritance of the said Hugh and Hugh, and all things in the award; and do fully remit and reconcile the said Hugh the son, and Hugh the father, to our faith and peace, and to the estate they had and were in, before the making that award in all points. And we adjudge, that they have again seisin of their lands and tenements, goods and chattels, &c. And we will and command, that wherever the said award is enrolled in any of our courts, it be cancelled and annulled for ever."—Accordingly the Roll was cancelled and remains so at this day, with this mem. written under the said award: 'These things above written are nulled and cancelled by the force of the Award, and decree made in the parl. at York, held 3 weeks after Easter, in the 15th king Edw.'

In this parl. also at York, the prelates, earls, barons, &c. there assembled, caused to be rehearsed and examined the Ordinances, dated the 5th of Oct. the 5th of Edw. II. and for that, by examination thereof, it was found in the said parl. "That by the things which were formerly ordained, the king's power was restrained in many things contrary to what was due to his seigniorial royal, and contrary to the state of the crown; and also for that in times past, by such ordinances and provisions made by subjects over the power royal of the ancestors of our lord the king, troubles and wars came upon the realm; by which the land or nation was in danger; it was accorded and established in the said parl. by our lord the king, the prelates, earls, barons, &c. at that parl. assembled, that all those things ordained by the former Ordainers, and contained in those ordinances from thence forth for the time to come, should cease and lose their force and effect for ever; and that from thence forward in no time, no manner of ordinances or provisions made by the subjects of our lord the king or his heirs, by any power or commission whatever, over or upon the power royal of our lord the king, or his heirs, or against the state of the crown, shall be of any value or force, but all things that shall be established for the estate of the king and his heirs, and for the state of the realm and people may be treated, accorded, and established in parl. by the king, with and by the assent of the prelates, earls, barons, and commonalty of the realm, as hath been accustomed."

About this time the king of France had summoned his brother of England by two ambassadors, to come over to him and do homage for the territories which the latter held in that kingdom. His two ministers, the Despensers, dissuaded Edw. from going in person; and after the time prefixed was elapsed, the French king seized upon all Guienna and Gascoigny, as forfeited to him by Edward's non-appearance. But before that could happen, the king thought proper to take the sense of his parliament about this embassy; and one was accordingly summoned to meet at London, the beginning of Lent in 1323. They were called together to treat of divers public affairs, but, particularly, what answer was to be given to the embassy, concerning the king's going over to do homage. The lords and others were unanimous in their opinions, 'that the king should not go in person, but should send certain ambassadors on purpose to excuse his coming over at all, or, at least, to delay it for a time.' Accordingly, two persons of great distinction, the earl of Kent, brother to the king, and the abp. of Dublin, were then nominated for that employ. At this parl. the king demanded a pecuniary aid from the clergy and laity, to discharge the ransom of John earl of Richmond, who had been taken prisoner by the Scots, at the battle of Byland, in Yorkshire. But this proposal was refused by the barons, for this reason, 'that no such tax ought to be raised, but only for the ransom of the king, queen, and their eldest son, if they should happen at any time to be taken prisoners.' And so that demand fell.—In this parl. Adam de Orleton, bp. of Hereford, was arrested of high treason, and was examined before the king and lords, on divers articles. It was laid to his charge, 'that he had entertained certain of the king's enemies, had appeared in the field with them, had furnished them with arms, and had given them his assistance, favour, and advice.' The bishop being a shrewd and learned man, said little at first to this accusation, but being further urged, he answered, 'my lord the king, saving all due reverence to your majesty, I being an humble minister of God's church, and a consecrated bishop, though unworthy, ought not to answer such high matters, without the licence and authority of my lord the abp. of Canterbury, who next to the pope is my proper judge; as also with the consent of the rest of my fellow-bishops.' The abp. of Canterbury with his suffragans, rising up, implored the king's mercy for him; and he was delivered to the custody of the abp. till the king should resolve when to summon him again, to answer to what might be farther laid to his charge. Soon after the king summoned him again to answer in his court of justice, which the abps. &c. hearing of, they came in great form, with their crosses, and took him away from the bar, threatening to excommunicate all that withstood them. Upon which Edw. caused a bill of indictment to be preferred against him to the grand jury of Herefordshire, which being found, the king immediately seized on all his temporal possessions.—In this parl. also, all the manors and possessions of the knights templars, were by the common consent of both clergy and laity granted to the knights hospitalers of st. John of Jerusalem, for ever; as appears by the statute, at large, made for that purpose, under this title, 'Statutum de Terris Templario:um.'

It was now that the king's domestic grievances began to appear. The queen had found means, under pretence of settling some differences, to get the king's leave to go into France, as also to take her only son the prince with her. She staid so long that the king began to be very uneasy at her absence, and wrote several letters to her to return, to which she always gave evasive answers. At last being much solicited, she said it was the fear she was in from the younger Despenser was the occasion of her delay. And whatever letters and mediators the king made use of to prevail on her to come to him, or to send the prince his son, they were all to no purpose. This lady had formed a scheme of a very scandalous and dangerous nature, and she deferred coming over till she could put it in execution. The discontented barons, who still hated the Despensers, had, by means of Adam bp. of Hereford, gained her to their interest. And Roger Mortimer, her favourite, having escaped out of the Tower into France, she had the less occasion for her husband's company. In short, she found means to raise an army of 2 or 3000 men, with whom she transported herself and her son, and landed at Harwich; where she was immediately joined by the earl mareschal, the earl of Leicester, and other barons and knights who had been rebels to the king; and, to give the greater sanction to her cause, with no less than 4 bps. and all their attendants. The king's affairs were now in a miserable way: he made some struggles, it is true, to withstand this tempest, but all proved too weak, and he soon found himself overborne by it. The two Despensers were taken and executed, without either hearing or trial, and the king himself made a prisoner in Kenelworth castle.

No sooner was the queen secure in her new got possession, than she thought to establish it by a parliamentary sanction. Accordingly a writ was issued out for proroguing a parl. which was to meet on the 15th of Dec. as summoned by the king (teste rege apud Lidbury) but this writ is not on record; and it is more likely that it was a trumped up writ for form sake, and to ground their prorogation upon; for both Tyrrel and Brady agree in this, that the unfortunate king could know nothing of the sealing this writ, since he had sent his great seal to the queen and prince some time before. The tenor of the queen's writ for that parl. was 'to be holden by Isabel, queen consort of England, and Edw. the king's eldest son, guardian of England, he being then out of the land, to be holden by the king, if personally present, or in his absence by the said consort and son, &c.' But, by what authority soever called, this parl. met at the time appointed, viz. Jan. 7, 1327, at Westm. The first thing that was moved there was by the aforesaid Adam de Orleton, bp. of Hereford, who put this memorable question, 'Whether king Edwrad the father, or his son Edward, should reign over them?' He was seconded by several other bps. and it was not long before they all agreed the son should have the government of the kingdom, and be crowned king; for the reasons following:—1st. That the person of the king was not sufficient to govern; for in all his time he was led and governed by others, who gave him evil counsel, to the dishonour of himself, and destruction of holy church and all his people, not considering or knowing whether it was good or evil; nor would remedy these things, when he was requested by the great and wise men of his realm, or suffer them to be amended.—2nd. That in all his time he would not give himself to good counsel, nor take it, nor to the good government of his kingdom; but always gave himself to works and employments not convenient, neglecting the business of his realm.—3rd. That for want of good govt. he lost Scotland, and other lands and dominions in Gascoigne and Ireland, which his father left him in peace and amity with the k. of France, and many other great persons.—4th. That by his pride and cruelty he destroyed holy church, and the persons of holy church, putting some in prison, and others in distress; and also, put to shameful death, and imprisoned, banished, and disherited many great and noble men of the land.—5th. That whereas he was bound by his oath to do right to all, he would not do it, through his own lucre and the covetousness of him and his evil counsellors which were with him; neither regarded the other points of the oath which he made at his coronation, as he was obliged.—6th. That he abandoned his realm, and did as much as he could to destroy it and his people; and what is worse, by his cruelty and the default of his person, he was found incorrigible without hopes of amendment. And that all these things were notorious beyond contradiction.

These articles were, by common consent of parl. sent to the king, then a prisoner at Kenelworth castle. The committee chosen for that purpose, had a power given them 'to resign their homage and fealty to the king, in the name of all the rest, to give him notice of the election of his son, and to procure his voluntary resignation of his crown; or, if he refused, to give up their homages and proceed as they thought fit. Sir Thomas More has informed us by what means this resignation was obtained. He writes that the bishops of Winchester and Lincoln came before the rest to the king to smooth the way; and that these prelates, along with the then earl of Lancaster his keeper, persuaded his majesty to resign his crown to his son. 'Promising him as much honour after his resignation as before; and, on the other hand, threatening him that if he would not, the people would yield up their homage and fealty, pass by his sons, and chuse a king out of the royal line.' After this deputation from the grand committee had softened and brought the king to their own temper, the whole body of them was introduced. No sooner had he heard their message, than he swooned away, and had fallen to the ground, had he not been supported by the earl of Lancaster and the bp. of Winchester. However, coming to himself, he answered, with tears in his eyes, 'That he was very sorry he had so misbehaved himself towards his people, and asked pardon for it of all that were present, but, seeing now it could not be otherwise, he returned them thanks for chusing his first-born son in his room.' He then made his resignation, by delivering up the royal ensigns of sovereignty, the crown and sceptre, which the commissioners had taken care to bring for that purpose; after which, one sir Wm. Trussel, chosen as procurator, was ordered, by the whole committee, to pronounce their resignation of homage to the king, which he did in this form:—

"I, Wm. Trussel, procurator of the prelates, earls, and barons, and other people in my procuracy named, having for this full and sufficient power, do surrender, and deliver up to you Edw. k. of England, before this time, the homage and fealty of the persons in my procuracy named, in the name of them, and every of them, for certain causes therein mentioned; and do return them up to you Edw. and acquit or discharge the persons aforesaid, in the best manner that the law and custom can give it; and do make this protestation in the name of all those that will not for the future be in your fealty, or allegiance, nor claim to hold any thing of you, as king; but account you as a private person, without any manner of royal dignity."—The ceremony ended with sir Tho. Blunt's, the high steward's, breaking his staff, declaring all the king's officers discharged from his service, in the same manner as if the king was actually dead. The commissioners returning to parl. with the king's answer and the royal ensigns, made the common people rejoice; and presently, the whole community of the kingdom admitted Edw. a youth of 14, to be their king. All this was done on the 20th of Jan. 1327, and which is called the first day of his reign; for from that time he acted as king, as appears by the writ to all the sheriffs of England to proclaim his peace, dated two days before his coronation.

In his first year the earls, barons, knights, and all others of the kingdom, granted a 20th of their moveables, except their armour, war-horses, jewels, robes, and vessels of gold and silver, of knights and other freemen, and of their wives. And the citizens, burgesses, and tenants of the ancient demesnes of the crown, granted a 15th of their moveables; as also did the clergy.—In his second year the laity granted a 25th of their moveables. In his 7th year the earls, barons, knights, freemen, and commons of counties, gave a 20th of their goods; and the citizens and burgesses, and communities of cities and boroughs, gave a 15th. In his 8th year he had a 20th of the moveables of the laity, granted by the commons of the counties of the kingdom assembled in parl. In his 9th year he had granted a 15th of the citizens, burgesses, and tenants in ancient demesnes, for his war with the Scots, in the parl. held at Lincoln; the same year, the community of the kingdom, or the military men, were then also summoned to do their service. In his 15th year the prelates and clergy of both provinces met in two synods or convocations, the one at Lincoln, the other at York; the former of which the abp. of Canterbury was immediately to summon, to treat of a competent aid to be granted to him towards his expedition against the Scots, who had then invaded England. In which writs, he recites that the prelates, earls, barons, noblemen, and the commons, granted him a 10th of the goods of the community or body of the kingdom, and a 6th of the goods of citizens, burgesses, and tenants of ancient demesnes. Mr. Tyrrel observes, 'that in this king's reign we find few or no complaints of any taxes imposed by colour of his prerogative, contrary to law, notwithstanding the exorbitant power of the two Despensers: but this might be owing to their policy, who having made themselves so obnoxious to the nobility, would do what they could to make the common people their friends. But towards the latter end of his reign, the confiscation of the estates of the earl of Lancaster, and the rest of the barons attainted, were so considerable, that though he gave away a great deal of lands to the Despensers and their adherents, yet that which still remained in the crown made him to have a greater revenue than any of his predecessors since Henry II.'s time.'

In 1309 wheat sold for 7s. 2d. a quarter; and malt for 6s. Wine at about 43s. 7d. a tun. Oats 4s. a quarter. A hog about 3s. 2d. A mutton about 3s. A goose about 3½d. A fowl about 3d. A pig 6d. A shield of brawn 4s. But these being for a prior's feast seem to be charged high. In 1314 a corn-fed ox for 1l. 4s. and a grass-fed ox for 16s. A fat mutton for 1s. 8d. And four pigeons for 1d. In 1315 wheat sold for 20s. a quarter; malt 13s. 4d. and salt for 1l. 15s. In 1316 wheat sold for 1l. 12s. the quarter. In 1317 wheat sold at Leicester for 2l. 4s. a quarter, being excessive scarce; and in the same year fell to 14s. But all these particulars will be found, drawn out with the utmost nicety, in bp. Fleetwood's Chronicon Pretiosum.

EDWARD III.

The young king being then but 14 years of age, his hands were thought too weak to manage the reins of govt. accordingly, the parl. assigned him 12 guardians, viz. 5 bishops, 2 earls, and 5 barons. Over all these, by general consent of the parl. and of the 12 guardians themselves, Henry earl of Lancaster, Lincoln, Leicester and Derby, the king's cousin, was deputed to have the chief care of his person. On the 3d of Feb. 1327, two days after the coronation, a petition was presented to the king and parl. from all those that had been any ways concerned in the quarrel of Tho. earl of Lancaster, 'praying to be restored to their estates with profits of them from the time they had been wrongfully disseised.' It was unanimously agreed by the assent of the whole parl. 'that all lands and tenements which had been seized, by reason of the said quarrel or contention, should be restored, as well in Ireland and Wales as England, together with their profits and arrears of rent, except those that had been received to the king's use.' And this quarrel was affirmed to be just by the whole body assembled. On the same day all those that came over with the queen and the prince her son, and those that joined with them after their arrival, were also pardoned and indem-nified. This parl. continued sitting for above a month after the king's coronation: in which time many acts of state were passed relating to different countries and affairs, for the greater security of the present possessors. As, also, several grants of money, &c. bestowed on the queen and her accomplices; besides pardons, and indemnifications, to a vast number of people, by name, who had been concerned in the late commotions, under the earl of Lancaster, and the other barons. In 1328 a parl. was summoned to appear at York, on Sunday after Candlemas-day, to treat of certain articles of peace, which had been propounded between Scotland and England at Newcastle. But nothing was done at it, because several bps. and other great men did not come to this meeting. Therefore writs were issued out for calling another 3 weeks after Easter to Northampton. In this parl. a scandalous peace was trumped up between the English and Scots, contrived and directed by the queen and Roger Mortimer. The articles were, 1st. 'that prince David, son and heir to Robert king of Scots should marry the princess Joanna, Edw.'s eldest sister; in consideration of which he was to grant the Scottish king a charter, to release all his claim to superiority, which Edw. or his ancestors had over Scotland; and to deliver up all charters and instruments concerning the same. In this parl. also the Despensers, father and son, Edmund late earl of Arundele, who had been executed by the queen's party, without any legal process made against them: Walter Stapleton, late bp. of Exeter, and sir Rd. Stapleton his brother, both beheaded in the insurrection at London, were attainted of high treason, by the direction, says Barnes, of the queen mother and the lord Mortimer. Whether this proceeding, adds he, was out of implacable malice which pursued them beyond the grave; or to cover their late unjustifiable actions against these persons by a parliamentary sanction; it is certain that in all the proceedings of this parl. the honour and profit of the king and realm was not so much regarded, as the enriching, security, and advancement of lord Mortimer.

Some matters of moment happening soon after this last parl., new writs were issued out, bearing date Aug. 28, for another to meet at Salisbury, the Sunday next after the 15th of st. Michael. The earl of Lancaster, the lord Wake and some other noblemen refused their attendance at this meeting; the earl giving for reason, 'That being appointed by parl. the king's chief counsellor and guardian of his person, the lord Mortimer had now taken to himself the regal power, and would not permit him to come near the king, so as to advise and protect him according to his trust. That though it had been decreed that no person whatsoever should presume to come armed to this parl., yet the lord Mortimer came with a great many armed men, by which he the said earl did not think his person in safety.' This being certified to the king and parl., it was thought very reasonable by several lords: and the king's two uncles, Tho. of Brotherton, and Edm. earl of Kent, went over to the earl of Lancaster's party. It was not long, however, before they deserted him, and the earl of Lancaster was reduced to such straits, that to make his peace he was obliged to ask pardon of the queen and Mortimer, at the head of his army.—The aforesaid lord Mortimer being now in the zenith of his power, sought to establish it by the basest means; and judging that Edm. earl of Kent, the king's uncle, stood in his way, he subtly drew him into a sham plot in order to destroy him. The particulars are given at large by Barnes, in his history of this king's reign; from which it appears, that Mortimer knowing he had proof enough against him, summoned a parl. to meet at Winchester, on the 13th of March 1329. Here the noble earl was attainted of high treason, and by the unanimous consent of his peers, adjudged to death.

The young king being now come to a more mature age, and being made a father by the birth of a son, which his queen brought him at Woodstock, afterwards called Edw. the black prince, began to look more about him; and endeavour to shake off the fetters which his mother and her minion had put upon him. To that end he, of his own accord, summoned a parl. to meet at Nottingham, on the 14th of Oct. 1330. It was here that the king's eyes were more open, and he was better informed about the practises of his mother and Mortimer; and that he himself was in so small danger if things continued in the same state. All which being represented to him, by some well affected lords, the king gave orders to them to seize Mortimer and bring him to public trial and justice. The manner how this arrest was executed is largely told by all our historians, but, particularly, by Mr. Barnes; the earl's person was seized, as well as all his adherents, in the castle and town of Nottingham, and sent prisoners to the Tower of London. After which, the king being at Leicester, adjourned the parl. from Nottingham to Westminster, there to sit on this extraordinary affair, the 26th of Nov. following. The writ for summoning a new parl., or adjourning the last, being in a form very unusual, dr. Brady has given us an abstract of it in his history. But a much more singular writ than this that was directed to the abp. of Canterbury, was sent to all the sheriffs in England; in which the evil designs of the late minister, in packing of parliaments to his purpose, is openly declared. A translation of which out of the Public Acts, vol. 4, p. 453, in old French, claims a place in our enquiries.

“The king to the sheriff of Lancashire, greeting.—Since we have been lately informed that several oppressions and hardships have been put upon many of the people of this realm, by some that were our ministers in diverse offices, aided by some of our nobility, as well privy counsellors as others, so that our affairs, by reason of the tenderness of our age, were managed by these people to our great damage and dishonour; which things we can no longer suffer; it is our greatest desire that all matters may be put in their due estate, and these wrongs and misprisions redressed.—We therefore charge and command you, on the faith which you owe us, that immediately without delay you proclaim in your jurisdiction, as well within liberties as without, that all those who can make complaint of any oppressions, hardships, or other grievances to them done, contrary to right, and the laws and usages of our realm, should appear at Westminster, at our ensuing parl. and make their complaints to us, or to our deputies, and we will see that they have as good and speedy relief as in reason they can desire.—And, because that, before this time, several knights, representatives for counties, were people of ill designs, and maintainers of false quarrels, and would not suffer that our good subjects should shew the grievances of the common people, nor the matters which ought to be redressed in parl., to the great damage of us and our subjects;—we, therefore, charge and command that you cause to be elected, with the common consent of your county, two, the most proper and most sufficient knights, or serjeants of the said county, that are the least suspected of ill designs, or common maintainers of parties, to be of our said parl. according to the form of our writ which you have with you. And this we expect you shall do, as you will eschue our anger and indignation. Given at Woodstock, Nov. 3rd. By the King.”

The parl. being assembled at Westm. on the day appointed, the young king, it is said, made a speech to them, complaining much against the conduct of the queen and Mortimer; and that with the consent of his subjects, he designed to assume to himself the reins of govt. though he was not yet arrived to the age prescribed by law. The parl. gladly consented; all the members being equally ready to second his designs. For this hint of a speech we have no better authority than M. Rapin; where he had his, the marginal notes do not declare; it is likely that the matter was proposed to the parl. by some of the ministry, it not being the custom in those days to speak from the throne, as the reader will find in the sequel.

The next thing we find done at this parl. was, the exhibiting the following Articles against the lord Mortimer, which we shall here give, translated from the French original, now on the rolls in the Tower:—

“These are the treasons, felonies, and mischiefs done to our lord the king, and his people, by Roger Mortimer, and others of his company.—1st. Whereas in the parl. holden at Westm. next after the king's coronation, it was ordained, that 4 bps. 4 earls, and 6 barons should remain with the king to advise him, and that 4 should still be with him, viz. 1 bishop, 1 earl, 2 barons at least, and that no great business should be done without their assent; after which parl. the said Roger not having regard to the said assent, usurped to himself royal power, and the govt. of the realm, above the state of the king, and put out and placed officers in the king's house, and other where throughout the kingdom, at his pleasure, such as were of his party, and set John Wyward and others about the king, to observe his actions and words; so as he was encompassed by his enemies, that he could do nothing as he would, but only as a man under guard or restraint.—2nd. Whereas the king's father was at Kenelworth, by order and assent of the peers of the land, to stay there for his ease, and to be served as such a great person ought to be; the said Roger by his usurped power, which he exercised over him at his pleasure, ordered that he should be sent to Berkley castle, where, by him and his confederates, he was traiterously, feloniously, and falsely murdered and killed.—3rd. The said Roger by his usurped royal power, forbad by the king's writ under the great seal, that any should come to the parl. at Salisbury with force and arms, under pain of forfeiting whatever they had to the king; yet thither he came with others of his party with force and arms to the said parliam. contrary to the prohibition aforesaid; wherefore divers peers of the land, as the earl of Lancaster and others, knowing the manner of his coming, would not be there: and whereas the prelates were assembled in one house, to consult about the business of the king and realm, the said Roger broke open the doors of the said house with armed men, upon the prelates, and threatened them with life and member, if any of them should be so hardy as to speak or do any thing contrary to his pleasure in any point. And in the same parl. by the said usurped power, he caused the king to make him earl of March, and to give him and his heirs several lands in disherison of the crown; and afterwards the said Roger, and those of his party, led the king armed against the said earl of Lancaster, and other peers of the land, as far as Winchester, when they were coming to the parl. at Salisbury, so that the earl and other peers, to avoid the evils that might have happened, out of regard to the king, departed and went toward their own countries, grieving that they could not speak with, or advise their liege lord as they ought to do.—4th. The said Roger, by the said usurped power, caused the king to march forcibly against the earl, and other peers of the land, who were appointed to be with the king, to advise him; and so prosecuted them with force, that the said earl and some others of his company, that wished well to the kingdom, submitted to the king's grace, saving to them life and member, and that they might not be disinherited, nor have too great a fine set upon them; yet he caused them to be fined so grievously, that half their lands, if sold outright, would only pay it; and others he caused to be driven out of the nation, and their lands to be seized, against the form of the great charter, and law of the land.

—5th. Whereas the said Roger knew well the king's father was dead and buried, he by others of his party in deceivable manner, informed the earl of Kent, that he was alive; wherefore the earl being desirous to know whether it was so or not, used all the good ways he could to discover the truth, and so long, till the said Roger by his usurped royal power, caused him to be apprehended in the parl. holden at Westm. and so pursued him, as in that parl. he procured his death.—6th. The said Roger, by his usurped royal power, caused the king to give to him and his children, and confederates, castles, towns, manors, and franchises in England, Ireland, and Wales, in decrease of the revenues of the crown.—7th. The said Roger in deceivable manner caused the knights of shires, at the parl. at Winchester, to grant to the king one man at arms out of every town of England, that answered in the court of the Eyre by 4 men, and the provost, (i. e. the rieve or bailiff of the lord of the manor) to serve at their own cost, for a year in his war in Gascoigne; which charge he contrived for the advantage of himself and party, in destruction of the people.—8th. The said Roger, by his said usurped royal power, caused summons to be sent to many great knights and others, that they should come to the king wherever he was; and when they came, he caused them to be charged to prepare themselves to go into Gascoigne, or fine at his pleasure; which fines were for the benefit of him and his party.—9th. The said Roger falsely and maliciously made discord between the king's father and his queen; and possessed her, that if she went to him, she should certainly be killed with a dagger, or otherwise murdered; and by this way, and his other subtleties, he so ordered it, that she would not come to her liege lord and king, to the great dishonour of her son and self, and great damage of the whole realm per chance in time to come, which God forbid.—10th. The said Roger by his said usurped royal power, had caused to be taken for him and his party, the king's treasure, as much as he pleased, without tale, in money and jewels, in destruction of the king, so that he had not wherewithal to pay for his victuals.—11th. The said Roger, by the said usurped power, caused to be shared between him and his confederates, the 20,000 marks which came out of Scotland, for the articles of peace, without any thing received by the king.—12th. The said Roger, by his above-mentioned royal power, received the king's duties and purveyance through the kingdom, as if he had been king; and he and his party had with them double the company of men and horse that were with the king, in destruction of the people, not paying for their quarters any more than they themselves pleased.—13th. The said Roger, by his said royal power caused the king to agree to the mounting of 200 Irish chevaliers, or horse, being of those that killed the great men of Ireland and others, who were in the king's faith; whereas the king ought immediately to have revenge their deaths, rather than pardoned them, contrary to the statute and assent of parl.—14th. The said Roger contrived to have destroyed the king's secret friends, in whom he had most confidence; and he surmised to the king, in the presence of the queen his mother, the bps. of Lincoln and Salisbury, and others of his council, that his said secret friends had excited him to combine with his (the said Roger's) enemies beyond sea, in destruction to the queen his mother, and of him the said Roger; and this he affirmed so impudently to the king, that he could not be believed against what he had said; and for these things, and many others, not as yet fit to be declared, he had been apprehended: wherefore the king charged the earls and barons, the peers of the land, as these things concerned himself, themselves, and all the people of the realm, to do right and true judgment upon him for the crimes above written, as being notorious and known to be true, to themselves, and all the people of the kingdom."

Then the earls, barons, and peers, having examined these articles, came into parl. before the king, and they all delivered their opinion, by one of their body, 'that all things contained in the said articles were notorious, and known to themselves, and all the people;' wherefore they, as judges in parl. by assent of the king, did award and judge the said Roger as a traitor and enemy to the king and kingdom, to be drawn and hanged, and commanded the earl mareschal to execute the judgment, and the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of London, with the constable of the Tower, and those who had the guard of him, to be aiding and assisting with the earl mareschal at the execution; which was performed accordingly on the 29th of Nov. at a place then called the Elms, and afterwards Tyburn.

The king in his parl. charged the earls, barons and peers, to give right and true judgment against Simon de Beresford, kt. who had been aiding and advising with Roger Mortimer in all the treasons, felonies, &c. for which he was afterwards adjudged to die, as was notoriously known to the said peers; whereupon they came before the king in parl. and said all with one voice, 'that the said Simon was not their peer, and therefore they were not bound to judge him as a peer of the land:' but since it was a thing so notorious and known to all, that he was advising, aiding and assisting the said Roger in all the felonies, &c. aforesaid; and that he was guilty of divers other felonies and robberies, and a principal maintainer of robbers and felons; they as peers and judges of parl. by assent of the king, do award and adjudge him, as a traitor and enemy to the king and realm, to be drawn and hanged; and the earl mareschal was commanded to do execution; which was done accordingly. But it appears by the same parl. roll, that it was then also declared, that though the lords and peers in parl. had for this time, in the king's presence, proceeded as judges to give judgment upon those that were no peers; yet hereafter this should be no precedent to draw them to give judgment on any other but their peers, in case of treason or felony.

Then the peers proceeded and passed judgment upon the principal actors in the murder of the late king Edw. and the death of Edm. earl of Kent; and for the latter of these, sir John Maltravers being found guilty in making him falsely to believe, that the said king was alive, the said John was sentenced to be drawn, hanged and beheaded as a traitor, when and wherever he should be found; and the peers prayed the king to issue forth his proclamation, that any one who could take him alive, and bring him to the king, should have 1000 marks; and if he could not be taken alive, he that should bring his head, should have 500*l.* of the king's gift. Further, the same judgment was given against Bogo de Bayons, and John Daveril, for the same cause, and he that could take Bogo alive, and bring him to the king, should have 100*l.*; or if he brought his head, he should have 100 marks; and he that could take John Daveril alive, and bring him to the king, should have 100 marks; or if he could bring his head, he should have 40*l.* The same judgment was given likewise against Thos. de Guerne, and Wm. de Ocle, for the death of king Edw. 'that they had falsely and traitorously murdered him;' and he that could take Thomas alive, was to have 100*l.*; or if he could bring his head, 100 marks: he that could bring Wm. de Ocle alive, was to have 100 marks, or his head, 40*l.* Likewise amongst the pleas of the crown of this parl. there is recorded the arraignment of the lord Thos. de Berkele, for the death of Edw. II. to this effect; for that the said king was committed to the keeping of the said Thos. and John Matravers, in the castle of the said sir Thos. at Berkele, when he was murdered; the said sir Thos. saith, 'that at the time of the death of the said king, he was sick at Bradelye, without the said castle, and knew not what was done there, nor was consenting thereunto; and thereupon put himself upon his trial by 12 knights, named in the record, who found him not guilty, nor that he fled, or withdrew himself upon it; but since he had placed under him Thos. de Gurney, and Wm. de Ocle to keep the king, by whom he was murdered, he had a day given him to hear his judgment in the next parl.; and in the mean time he was committed to sir Ralph Nevill, steward of the king's household.

In 1331 Edw. called a parl. at Westm. to meet the day after Michaelmas day; in which the bp. of Winchester, chancellor, declared the cause of the summons to be, 'concerning the dutchy of Aquitain, and the king's possessions beyond sea, whether peace should be made or other issue put to the dissensions between the kings of England and France, by reason of the said territories. As also about affairs in Ireland, concerning the king's going thither, to ordain how peace might be the best kept in that nation.' It was agreed that the king's business should be preferred before any other. Upon this, the chancellor applied himself to the prelates, earls, barons, &c. for their advice, 'Whether they thought it best for the king to proceed by way of process of war, or by an amicable treaty with the king of France, for the restitution of Aquitaine?' The parl. agreed to the last, as the least dangerous way of proceeding; and the bps. of Winchester, Worcester, and Norwich, with the lords Beaumont, Percy, and Montague, sir Jeffry le Scroop, and sir John de Shoreditch, were sent to the French king for that purpose. As to Ireland, it was resolved, 'that the king in person should go thither; but, to prepare his way, a certain number of forces, under able commanders, should be sent before him; and that those especially that held any lands there, should go speedily over for the defence of that kingdom.' Also it was ordained, 'that all learned men in the law, who should be appointed as justices, should by no means be excused on any pretence whatsoever.' And further it was ordered, 'that search should be made into his Majesty's records, to see what methods had been formerly taken for the civilizing and well governing the people of Ireland.' In this parl. it was agreed that all feats of arms should be defended, as well by the justices as others, until the king and his council should otherwise appoint. Also that Isabel, the queen mother, should have yearly 3000*l.* in rents and lands, allowed her for her maintenance. And that none of the estates in parl. should retain, sustain or avow any felon, or other common breaker of the law. Lastly, it was enacted, that no purveyance of victual should be made, but for the king, queen, and royal family, and that by good warrant and ready payment.—See Barnes's Edw. III. p. 63.

Another parl. was summoned to meet at Westm. March 12, 1332; reciting in the summons the king's reasons for calling them. Where, that we may see, says Joshua Barnes, what prudent care was then taken, by these august assemblies, that their debates should not be awed by fear, or disturbed by tumults; it was first by the king's order proclaimed, 'that no man, upon pain of forfeiting all his substance, should presume to use or wear any coat of metal, or other weapon offensive or defensive in London, Westm. or the suburbs of the same. And also, that during the time of this session, no games or other plays of men, women, or children, should be used in Westm. to the disturbance of the parl.' Here also, adds he, we shall mention the laudable custom of parl. in those days, whereby certain committees were appointed not only to be receivers, but also tryers of petitions, who were to enquire of the matter of fact, expressed in the petition; that so it might be cleared and rightly stated before it came to be debated in full parl. The chancellor opened the session with a speech, more fully declaring the king's reasons for calling them. The purport of it was to acquaint them, 'that his maj. had received a message, that the k. of France, with many other kings and princes, having appointed to go to the Holy Land, in the present month of March, they much desired the company of the king of England, for the better strengthening themselves against the common enemy of Christendom. The king therefore desired the advice of this parl. whether it was proper to accompany them in this expedition or not.' Then sir Jeffry Scroop of Masham, in the king's presence, and at his command, declared further, 'that this meeting was called, as well to redress the breaches of the laws and his peace, as for the voyage to the Holy Land. That the king was informed, and it was notorious to all, that divers people defying the law, were gathered together in great companies, to the destruction of the king's subjects, the people of holy church, and the king's justices; taking and detaining some of them in prison, until, to save their lives, they had received great fines and ransoms, at the pleasure of the evil doers; putting some to death, robbing others of their goods and chattels, and doing other mischiefs and felonies.' Therefore he the said sir Jeffry, on behalf of the king, charged the prelates, earls, barons, and others there assembled, on their faith and allegiance, 'that they should advise him concerning his voyage to the Holy Land, which he very much desired to undertake; as also how the peace might be kept, and how these rioters might be chastised and restrained from their wickedness.' After these speeches were ended, the abp. of Canterbury stood up and said, 'that it did not properly belong to their function to be present at criminal debates;' and with a proviso of reserving their rights still to themselves and successors, withdrew, with the proctors of the clergy, to consult by themselves. The earls, barons, and other grandees, consulted also apart; and the representatives of the commons apart; they at that time having no particular speaker. The result of these separate consultations was, that the lords and great men returned into the king's presence, and by the mouth of sir Henry Beaumont, whom they had chosen for their speaker, declared that their advice to the king was, 'that he should ordain justices in every county of the kingdom, for the conservation of the peace against offenders, with power to punish and repress them. And further, that certain officers should be appointed for apprehending malefactors, and levying the hue and cry.' Accordingly commissions were issued out to the sheriffs, and best men of every county, to apprehend and imprison, and raise the posse-comitatus against them; and cause them to be indicted and punished according to their deserts.

After settling their domestic concerns, this parl. went upon the consideration of foreign affairs; and it was unanimously agreed, that the time mentioned by the French king for Edw. to join with him in the crusade was too little for that purpose. Then sir Jeffry Scroop, by the king's command, told them, 'That whereas in the last parl. at Westm. it had been agreed that the differences on foot between the kings of England and France, concerning the territories beyond sea, should be reconciled by treaty, by way of marriage, or by some other amicable manner; that thereupon the king had sent his commissioners to the French king, who had treated with them, and reported back, that his maj. of France told them, that if it pleased their master to come over in person, he would shew more favour to him than to any other. Wherefore it was necessary to send speedily to the said king, and for this end the advice of the parl. was demanded; whether the king should go over in person or not.' The parl. consented to his going, in hopes that all obstacles towards an agreement between them might be thereby removed, and much advantage accrue to the realm. They advised also, that the Irish expedition might be postponed for this year, but that an army should be sent over into that country.

It is worthy of remark that this is the first time that we can find that the Commons ever separated from the Lords and made a distinct house by themselves, though without a Speaker. Also that the lower clergy were present at this parl. represented by their proctors, sat by themselves, the bishops included, and not with the lay-commons, as some writers, without any just grounds, have asserted. It seems here likewise, that Justices of Peace, such as we have at this day in power, were first appointed. And lastly, that though this parl. did not sit a whole week, yet it shews how much business was dispatched in a few days, when all things were drawn up and ready prepared by the king and his council beforehand.

Edw. called another parl. to meet on the 9th of Sept. 1332, at Westm., where the bp. of Winchester, lord chancellor, declared, 'That the cause of their meeting was about the affairs of France, and the king's expedition thither, to put a stop to the success his enemies gained in those parts.' The parl. being adjourned to Thursday following, they were alarmed with some sudden news out of the north, which made them fear an invasion from the Scots; whereupon the lords and commons did each by their several petitions advise the king not to go into France, or Ireland, but to send to the latter a sufficient supply of men and money, whilst himself marched a strong army towards the north, in order to watch the motions of the Scots. For this expedition the king had granted him a 15th of all the personal estates of the prelates, lords, and knights of shires; and a 10th of the cities and boroughs: but they desired, 'That the king would please to live of his own, without grieving his subjects by outrageous prizes, or such like illegal taxations.' Hereupon the king revoked the late new commission for raising of certain tallages or customs, and promised from henceforth to settle the same according to the old rates.

king removed his court to York, where he received the speedier account of the posture of affairs in Scotland. Here he summoned a new parl. to meet, a few days before the feast of st. Michael; but they did not meet until the 2d of Dec. following. We find that sir Jeffry Scroop was again the king's prolocutor on this occasion; and declared the reason of that meeting was, 'That the king having lately understood that the lord Baliol had caused himself to be proclaimed k. of Scotland, and the truce with David Bruce was newly expired, he demanded their advice whether he should fall upon Scotland, in his own name, and claim the dominion thereof as his own right; or else, by joining with king Baliol, should take the advantage of recovering the homage and services his ancestors had enjoyed.' But because great part of the prelates and clergy were absent, nothing was then resolved on, but the parl. was adjourned to the 5th of Jan. following; the king being obliged to send out fresh summons, strictly enjoining all persons to attend, and to delay no longer or hinder the king's weighty affairs on any pretence whatsoever.—At the time of adjournment, all appeared; and on the 1st day of their sitting commandment was given to the mayor of York, in presence of the king and all his parl., to see the king's peace kept in the said city and suburbs thereof, and to arrest all that offended against it. Also, proclamation was made against weapons and plays, by the steward and marshal, before the house where the parl. sat, and by the mayor and bailiffs in the city. After all this formality, our records are short as to any notable transactions of this parl. Some Chronicles tell us, that the lord Beaumont, the earl of Athole, with several other lords, who had been engaged with k. Baliol in the Scotch affair, appeared at it; being sent by the said king to use all their interest to engage Edw. and the parl. to declare in his favour. At the same time came certain envoys from king David Bruce, 'To beseech the king that he would give no assistance to his enemy, but rather to aid him who was his brother-in-law, and ally, with whom also he was then at amity.'—It does not appear that any direct answer was given to either of these petitions; it is only said that the king was advised, 'Not to act against his own subjects, who had lost all their estates in Scotland, by the late articles of peace, and who had taken up arms only to regain them.'—It may readily be imagined by the consequences of affairs, that the politics of those times inclined the king to take this advice. For though he religiously kept the late treaty with Scotland, on his own part; yet, no sooner was the 4 years truce expired, but he sent ambassadors to David the young king, demanding a restitution of Berwick, and that he should come and do his homage to the k. of England. This being utterly denied by David and his nobility, they declared war against them, and, according to their instructions, defied their king.

For the more effectual carrying on of this war, Edw. had summoned a parl. to meet at York, in March, 1333. Here he acquainted them with his design of marching directly into Scotland, in person, to assist k. Baliol, and reduce Berwick to his obedience; which the whole assembly readily agreed to. They gave their opinion, 'That the king could no longer, with honour, put up the wrongs and injuries daily done to him and his subjects by the Scots; and therefore they humbly advised his maj. to provide such force of men and arms, as might not only reduce Berwick to his obedience, but also compel the king of Scots to seek his peace, by rendering unto him the accustomed homage for that kingdom: and in this enterprise they all promised to assist him in purse and person.'

—To this parl. k. Baliol had been summoned, as holding of Edw.; but he understanding that his enemies had laid wait for him in his journey, durst not come; but sent a sufficient excuse by the lord Beaumont and others, declaring the reasons of his non-appearance at that time: which apology was accepted by the king and parl.—We refer the reader to Mr. Barnes's history of this king's reign, and to the more general English historians, for the progress of this war. We need only say, that Edw. surpassed his grandfather in the rapidity of his conquests: for in a very short time he had over-run all Scotland; and soon after received Baliol's homage to him, in a parl. at Edinburgh, as sovereign lord of that kingdom.

Edw. on his return into England, held another parl. at York, which had been summoned to meet Feb. 21, 1334. The chief matters there enacted were, "That the Great Charter and the Forest Liberties, and other good statutes, should be duly observed; and what clauses therein were obscure should by good advice be explained." There were also several other acts made in this parl., for which see Statutes at Large, and Cotton's Abridgment of Records.

In the same year, after a great council held at Nottingham, a parl. was summoned to meet at Westm. on the 14th of Sept. The choice of this festival almost declared the occasion of the summons; which was, 'That the king being thereunto invited by his cousin the duke of Bretagne, who came lately on an embassy from France, had formed a resolution to take a voyage with his brother of France and other christian princes to the Holy Land. He told them the reason he had not answered k. Philip before, when he applied to him for this expedition, was, that he had learned the French king had fitted out ten great ships, designed to assist k. David's party in Scotland. Yet, as these ships had been miserably shattered at sea, and were forced to return home without any effect; and also that Scotland seemed pretty well settled, under the govt. of k. Baliol, he was the more willing to partake with the rest of the princes, in this pious and honourable enterprise; though he had set no time for the doing of it.'—We cannot learn what answer the parl. gave to the king on this declaration; but whether they agreed to this project, or not, it was frustrated by advices out of Scotland which came at that time, intimating that the Scots had again rebelled against k. Baliol, had taken some English lords prisoners, and defeated their forces. Upon this news the parl. granted the king a 15th from the lords and knights of shires, a 10th from the clergy, and the like from the citizens and burgesses.

The king soon turned all his thoughts towards Scotland, and coming to Nottingham, issued out writs for calling a parl. to meet at York about Whitsuntide, 1335; there to treat how to carry on the war against the Scots. What was done in that affair we know not; for at the intercession of a bp., sent by the French king for that purpose, a truce was granted for 6 weeks. At this parl. several more statutes were enacted, very serviceable to the peace and welfare of the realm.—The time of the truce, being concluded the Scotch war began again, and continued with great fury and various success till the next year. When at a parl. called at Northampton, June 25, 1336, the king received advice that the French king had so far espoused the Scotch quarrel, as to engage himself to protect and assist them; and to that purpose, had sent over several eminent commanders, with considerable supplies of men, money, and ammunition. Edw. was not at all displeased with the news, because it gave him now a just occasion to turn his arms against France; and he hoped also that as soon as ever the French and Scotch were joined they would give him battle, which the latter had hitherto industriously avoided. Flushed with these martial thoughts, Edw. privately stole away from his parl. whom he left at their debates; and with wonderful expedition arrived at st. John's-Town in Scotland, where he found k. Baliol ready at the head of the forces of both nations. Having again ravaged all Scotland over, from sea to sea, and finding nothing to resist him, he returned into England, to a parl. which met at Nottingham, Sept. 25, this year. Here Edw. obtained a new grant to carry on his wars in Scotland and Gascoigny, of a 20th from the nobility and gentry, a 10th from the citizens and burgesses, and a 6th from the clergy. Besides, the merchants of England were taxed to pay 40s. a sack for all wool transported; and foreigners 3/.

The next year another parl. was summoned to Westm. about the middle of March, 1337. It was here enacted, 'that no wool of English growth should be transported beyond the seas; and that all cloth-workers should be received from whatever foreign parts they should come, and fit places should be assigned them, with divers liberties and privileges, and that they should have a certain allowance from the king, till they might be fixed in a way of living by their trade.' It was also ordained, 'that none should wear any cloaths wrought beyond sea, or hereafter to be imported, except the king, queen, and their children:’ also, ‘that none should wear foreign furs or silks, unless he was worth 100*l.* annual rent.’ Besides taking care of the great interest of the nation, in the aforesaid particulars, the king was minded to reward past services, and therefore several new honours and liberal grants were conferred on those noblemen who had served him faithfully to that time. Accordingly, in full parl. the king created his eldest son prince Edw. duke of Cornwall, being the first that ever wore that coronet in England. And 6 earls, Hy. of Lancaster, earl of Derby; Wm. Montacute, earl of Salisbury; Hugh de Audley, earl of Gloucester; Wm. Clinton, earl of Lincoln; Wm. Bohun, earl of Northampton, and Rob. Ufford, earl of Suffolk. All these creations, with the grants of several lordships, castles, rents, &c. for the better support of these new dignities, are largely treated of in Barnes’s Edw. III. p. 112, 113.

A parl. was summoned to meet Sept. 27, 1337, at Westm. where the king’s intention of going over into France was declared. The whole nation was then very hearty in the cause, and their representatives cheerfully contributed towards it. The laity granted a 10th penny from the community, and a 15th from the citizens and burgesses. The clergy were not backward in the matter, for the abp. of Canterbury and his convocation gave a 10th of their temporalities for 3 years. Some further regulations were made in this parl. for the encouragement of the woollen manufactory; where it was enacted, that all Flemish weavers, and those of other countries, should have free liberty to come over, and inhabit in England, and exercise their trade.

The last parliamentary aids granted to the king being not thought sufficient for the mighty affair he was about to undertake; another was called, which met at Westm. Feb. 3, 1338. Here the laity granted to the king $\frac{1}{2}$ of their wools, throughout the whole realm, for the next summer. He also levied of the clergy the whole 10th, causing them to pay 9 marks for every pack of the best wool; but one half he took of all persons, whether merchants or others, according to the aforesaid grant. And he took, also, a 15th of all the commonalty in the realm, in wool, the price of every stone, at 14*lbs.* the stone, being rated at 2*s.* The king, also, issued out a commission for seizing upon the estates of the Lombard merchants, then in London, who by reason of their extortion in usury, were become odious and a public grievance to the nation. All their jewels, ready-money, &c. were to be delivered to the constable of the Tower, to be kept for the king’s use. About the same time he seized into his hands the goods and revenues of all alien and foreign priories, especially of the Cluniac and Cistercian orders, which were immediately let out to farm to those monks, who paid a sufficient rent for them during these wars. The wools which were gathered for the king’s use, were sent into Brabant, amounting to 10,000 sacks, under the direction of two noble merchants, the earls of Northampton and Suffolk, who sold the same in Upper Germany for 40*l.* a sack, amounting in all to 400,000*l.* By these means the king became exceeding strong in the sinews of war, but the country was thereby so exhausted of money, that victuals and other commodities became exceeding cheap. A qr. of wheat was sold at London for 2*s.* a fat ox for 6*s.* 8*d.* a fat goose for 2*d.* and 6 pigeons for a 1*d.*—On the 16th of July Edw. embarked at Harwich, with a royal navy of 500 sail, accompanied with many earls, barons, &c. to the number of 20 of the chief nobility of the kingdom, and in a short time after arrived at Antwerp, belonging then to the duke of Brabant.

Whilst the king was absent in Flanders, the young prince Edw. duke of Cornwall, as guardian of the kingdom, by commission from his father, called a parl. to meet at Northampton. The writs were dated, Aug. 25, 1338, and the meeting was appointed to be 15 days after Michaelmas following. Here was granted such an aid as never had been given to any king before; and shews how well this king, and the cause he was engaged in, was relished at that time by his subjects. Upon every town a tax was laid of a 20th of their goods, where the value amounted to 20*s.* He had, also, granted him all the wool in the kingdom, to be bought at a low price; which must have amounted to a vast proportion, since only the 3 counties of Leicester, Lincoln, and Northampton, afforded no less than 1211 sacks of wool. The bps. abbots, priors, rectors, vicars, justices, and the noblemen, &c. who held of him, in capite, and went not with him to the wars, were taxed, some 100, others 200*l.* a-piece, according to their estates and abilities. At a convocation, also, held the 1st of Oct. a 10th was granted from the clergy for 2 years to come.

The next year the young prince, being but then 10 years of age, called another parl. to meet at Westm. having received an express commission for it from his father. On the 13th of Oct. they met, and a further aid was demanded to carry on this important and expensive war. The abp. of Canterbury, the bp. of Durham, and sir M. de la Pole, were sent by the king, then in France, to shew the lords and commons, ‘what he had done beyond sea, with his condition there, and the mischiefs that had befallen him and his followers, for want of supplies from England. That he and others who were with him were entered into obligations for 300,000*l.* ster. and more, towards the charge of his auxiliaries, and that he could not handsomely march from thence without giving his creditors satisfaction. Lastly, for this cause, and for the maintenance of him and his quarrel, which was undertaken by the common consent of them all, and that the business he came about might be the more effectually done, he ought to be supplied with a very large sum.—This remonstrance was answered effectually, for the aid granted by this parl. was as large as the king's demand. The nobility immediately gave him every 10th sheaf, fleece, and lamb of their demesnes, except of their bond-tenants, to be paid for two years; desiring, at the same time, that the illegal duties set upon wool should be revoked, and that this grant should not turn into a custom. The commons, though they declared themselves very forward and willing to assist the king, yet prayed the regent, 'that he would summon another parl. in a convenient space, and in the mean time they would take the sense of their constituents about it, desiring likewise that two knights of the best estates, in their several counties, should be chosen in that parl.'—Accordingly writs were issued out, dated Nov. 16, for another parl. to meet the 20th of Jan. following.

Prince Edw. being called over by his father to Antwerp, 6 commissioners were appointed to hold the ensuing parl. in his stead. The proceedings of this parl. are so accurately described by Mr. Barnes, that we think it proper to give them in his own words:—"When the time of the next session of parl. approached, there were appointed to preside in it John Stratford, abp. of Canterbury, lord chancellor, and Wm. de la Zouch, abp. of York, lord treasurer, with the dean of York, and sir John Willoughby, deputy lord chief justice, sir John Stonore, justice of the king's bench, and sir John St Paul, any 4, 3, or 2 of these, were by the king's letters patents appointed to begin, continue, and end the parl. for, and in the name of the king, and the lord warden of England, and there to do all things, which the said guardian should do, until his, or the king his father's coming. The commission began Edvardus, D. Gr. &c. and ended, Teste Edvardo, Duce Cornubiæ & Com. Cestr. Filio nostro charissimo, Gardiano de Angl.—These commissioners aforesaid caused sundry of the lords and commons to assemble in the presence chamber, before whom, because several of both houses were not yet come, they continued the parl. from day to day, till the 20th of Jan. during which time, merchants, owners of ships, and mariners, did attend. The causes of assembling the parl. were declared to be for granting the king an aid, for keeping of the sea, and for defence of the north Marches: hereupon the commons required time to consider thereof till the 19th of Feb.; and then they unanimously offered to the king for aid 30,000 sacks of wool, on certain conditions. But for the better expedition, after some debate, they yielded to give the king presently 2500 sacks of wool; so, as if the king liked the conditions aforesaid, the same should go in part of payment, if not, they were freely offered unto him. The lords promised to send unto the king to know his pleasure, and in the mean time, they also for their parts, grant, that such of them, or of their peers, as held by a barony, should give to the king the 10th of their grain, wool, and lambs, and of all their own demesnes."

No sooner had king Edw. carried his conquests so far as to assume unto himself the style and arms of that kingdom, but he caused his great seal to be changed, and added the Fleurs-de-Lis of France to the Lions of England. Finding it necessary for his affairs to return into his own country, to raise more money on his subjects, he called a parl. immediately after, when the writs of summons, directed to all the sheriffs in England, were sealed with his new broad seal; they were dated at Harwich, Feb. 21, 1340, being the very day of his landing. On the 29th of March the king met his parl. at Westm. and it appears by the date of the writs that, in case of absolute necessity, a parl. might be then called within less than 40 days, though the usage is otherwise now. The cause of their summons was declared to be, "for granting him a great aid or else he should be for ever dishonoured, and his lands, as well on this side as beyond the sea in great danger, if he should lose his allies. That he was in his own proper person obliged to return to Brussels, and stay there as a pledge, until the sum he was engaged for was all paid. But, in case he might have a sufficient aid, all these mischiefs would be prevented; and his design, by the help of God, have a good issue." Wherefore, at the king's request, the parl. having regard to his declaration, granted him the 9th sheaf, fleece, and lamb, and the citizens and burgesses the 9th of all their goods and chattels, according to the true value, for two years next coming. They, also, granted a 15th on all foreign merchants that did not reside in cities and towns; likewise upon those people that dwelt in forests and wastes; and upon all those that lived by labouring at husbandry; beggars, cottagers, and slaves, only excepted: upon condition that the king would consent to enact and establish, that from thenceforth no custom should be taken for one sack of wool but half a mark; and of lead, tin, hides, leather, or wools, nothing but the ancient custom. Yet, notwithstanding they made this request to the king, this parl. unanimously granted him, of every sack of wool 40s. of every last of leather 4l. of every 300 of wool-fells 40s. and of every other sort of merchandize, to be exported, according to their weight or measure; to commence at Easter this year, being the 14th of the king's reign, to Whitsuntide in the year ensuing. From which last date, and forwards, the king granted that neither he nor his successors should desire, take, nor permit to be taken, more than two marks for custom on a sack of wool, belonging to the English; and of skins, leather, and other merchandizes, according to ancient custom. Knyghton, who is very expressive in these taxations, goes on and writes, that a sack of wool ought to weigh 26 stone, every stone being 14lb.; and that every Englishman or foreigner, going out of England into foreign parts, should find good and sufficient security for the payment of these customs, before his going abroad, viz. That he should bring back with him a piece of silver or gold plate, to the value of two marks for each sack of wool, and so for other merchandize, as aforesaid, at his return. The same piece of plate to be carried to the king's exchange, there to receive the overplus of it in coined money. For this extraordinary grant to the crown, the king on his part, granted many things for the ease of the public; as pardoning offenders in forest laws, giving felons goods, and many other matters as are contained in a charter made for that purpose.

Edw. having stiled himself king of France and altered his arms, his English subjects thought themselves in danger of becoming a province to France, as being the greater kingdom. The lords and commons therefore besought him, 'that they might be bound to obey him, only as king of England; and that this nation should not be put in subjection to him as k. of France.' The king to give his subjects entire satisfaction in that matter, and to remove that jealousy, gave the parl. his letters patents of indemnity; which will be found in the Statutes at Large, an. 1340. There was little else material done in this parl. except that the marquis of Juliers, who had done Edw. great service in France, was created earl of Cambridge, with a pension of 1000*l.* a year.

In a short time after this parl. the king went abroad again; and whilst he lay at the siege of Tournay, another parl. was held, by commission, on the 7th of July, in the same year, at Westm. The reasons of their meeting being declared by the abp. of Canterbury, then chancellor, to be, '1st. To consult what further course was best for the king and his allies to take against France. 2nd. To provide for the common peace, and how to keep good order at home. 3rd. To take care for the defence of the northern parts. 4th. For the dominion at sea. 5th. How to answer to the king the subsidy last granted him.' On the next day, being Thursday, the great victory which the king had lately obtained at sea was openly declared in parl. and it was moved by the chancellor, 'that to go on so as to perfect these happy beginnings, he must be further enabled with great supplies of money: that the king desired their advice how it might be raised with the least grievance to the people.' The answer to this was postponed till Saturday; at which time the lords and commons granted the king, as in the last parl. the 9th of their corn, wool, and lamb, and many other useful provisos were made for answering the same. The same day came the earls of Arundele and Gloucester, with sir Win. Trussel, from the king with letters signed with the privy seal, and directed to the lords and commons in parl. assembled; purporting his great naval victory near the port of Swyne; and pressing for a speedy supply of money to carry on the war this summer. In obedience to these demands, the parl. went immediately upon ways and means to supply him; and John Stratford, abp. of Canterbury, Ralph Stratford bp. of London, with other bps. abbots and knights, freely undertook, on their own credit, to raise the king 20,000 sacks of wool. So that for every sack, of the best sort, the king should receive 6*l.* for other 5, and for the worst 4 marks; besides his custom of 40*s.* on every sack; and of all this money a speedy return to be made to the king. It was stipulated, however, that the subsidy of next year should be employed for the payment of this loan, and this to be confirmed by the king's letters patents. Mr. Barnes has given us an account of a large quantity of provisions, which were ordered for the use of the king's army by this parl. viz. 2000 qrs. of wheat, 500 of beans and pease, 800 fitches of bacon, 2 tun weight of cheese, and 100 tuns of wine. Two persons there named were appointed purveyors general of the ports of Sandwich and Southampton; and 4400*l.* were assigned out of the aids of the counties of Essex and Oxford for the king's butler. The further proceedings of this session we shall give in the words of Mr. Tyrrel: "Then it was further agreed in parl. that for the speedy sale of this wool, and turning it into money, as also the 9th fleece which had been given in the last parl. the sheriffs should be commanded to send up from all cities and boroughs of their several counties, certain merchants, to appear before the king's council at Westm. on the 15th of Aug.; to treat with them about the buying the said wool in all counties. Where the abp. of Canterbury, with some other bps. earls, and barons of the king's council, there named, treated with them, and contracted for a great number of sacks of wool; the money to be paid at Bruges within 3 weeks after, or upon the 8th of Sept. or else upon the feast of st. Michael next ensuing at the farthest. The merchants of Bardenon and Prussia contracted for a great deal of this wool, and engaged to pay the money to those of Louvain and Malines; and several particular persons are there named, both Germans and others, that had been retained by king Edw. The lords of the council sent for divers persons to account before them, and ordered them to return this money to the king beyond the sea: but what the reason was that these returns were not made to the king accordingly, is hard to determine; for some of our writers lay the fault upon the merchants that were to return the money; and others, upon the knavery or negligence of the king's officers, who having got these wools into their hands, did not deliver them to the merchants according to agreement.

Pursuant to what Mr. Tyrrel relates, the king, finding himself pinched for want of remittances, and having contracted great debts abroad, in order to carry on the war this last campaign; he determined, within himself, to go privately back into England to find out the defaulters, and punish them according to their deserts. Accordingly, he took shipping in Zealand, with only his queen and 8 more persons of quality; and, after riding out a furious storm, which held them for 3 days together, he landed safe at the tower, about two o'clock in the morning, Nov. 30, in the year 1340. Upon the king's entering the tower, he found no guard there upon duty, and only his children and a few servants that waited on them; for which he presently sent for the constable and committed him to close confinement in his own prison. In the same manner he served the mayor of London, the keeper of the great seal, the lord chief justice of the king's-bench, three clerks of the chancery and one of the exchequer, who having all been concerned in raising or receiving the late subsidies, soon found lodgings in the same prison. The bps. of Chichester, and Litchfield and Coventry, the one his chancellor, the other lord treasurer, he turned out of their offices and imprisoned for a time; but durst not detain them, for fear the Clementine Constitutions, forbidding bps. to be imprisoned, should affect him. But the greatest ecclesiastical person he had to deal with, in this affair, was the abp. of Canterbury who he well knew was as culpable as any. Many severe messages were sent from the king to the prelate, who had retired to his own palace at Canterbury; and some as haughty answers were returned. At last the king resolved to lay the whole before his parl. and to take their opinions how he ought to proceed.

Accordingly, a parliament was summoned to meet at Westm. Ap. 23, 1341, the causes whereof was declared to be, 'how the king might be speedily supplied with the grants given him last year, upon his going over in person against his enemy Philip of Valois, great part of which was detained from him by evil officers; and how a sufficient sum of money might be raised for the king's present necessities.' After which a declaration was made in the king's name, 'that whoever of his subjects should think themselves hardly dealt with, either by himself or any of his officers, upon complaint and proof made thereof, should have redress. To this parl. the abp. of Canterbury came, though he had no writ of summons; attended with a great company of his clergy and many knights. Upon his entrance into the house, the high steward and chamberlain met him, who in the king's name forbad him to enter the parl. until he had undergone a trial in the exchequer, for divers things laid to his charge. The abp. lest he should move the king too much, vouchsafed to go into that court, and there took a copy of the articles, of which his accusation consisted, and to these he promised to return an answer. Upon which he was suffered by the king to come into parl. and there, before the whole assembly, he declared the cause of his coming to be, 'for the honour, rights and liberties of the church, for the profit and commodity of the realm, and for the interest and honour of the king: and, lastly, that he might clear himself in parl. of several crimes laid to his charge, and published all over England to his prejudice.' This occasioned a great debate amongst the lords on this question, 'whether the nobility of the land should be put to answer, except before their peers in open parl.?' A committee of 12 peers was appointed to draw up a representation to his majesty; and they were, also, to enquire concerning the crimes laid to the abp's charge, and fairly to represent how far they thought him blameable. Joshua Barnes is so particular in the sequel of the controversy, betwixt the king and the prelate, that we cannot do better than give it in his own words.

"Whereupon are named 4 bps. 4 earls, and 4 barons, to draw up the platform for the king's view. These being also to enquire concerning the crimes laid against the abp. and to prepare them for the king, among other things determined, that the ld. chan. the lord treasurer, and other high officers of state, should be included under the names of peers; and set down a request, that all conditions and estates might enjoy their proper and peculiar liberties. By that time these things were thus forwarded, the abp. came again to the parl. but was forbid by the captain of the king's guard, sir Wm. Attewood, to enter: whereupon he spake thus to the people that flocked about him. 'My friends, the king by his writ of summons hath called me to this parl. and I, who am the chief peer of the realm, and who next the king have the first voice in parl. claim the rights of my church of Canterbury, and therefore require entrance into parl.' Tyrrel says, the abp. was not summoned to this parl. But when for all this being kept out by the guard, he could not enter, he took his cross in his own hands, and solemnly protested that he would not stir from that place, till the king gave him leave to come into parl. or a sufficient reason why he should not: while he stood there in this manner, some that were by, began to revile him, telling him, that he was a traitor, and he deceived the king, and betrayed the realm. To whom the abp. said, 'the curse of Almighty God, and of his blessed mother, and of st. Thomas and mine also, be upon the heads of them that inform the king so. Amen. Amen.' In this hurry certain noblemen chancing to come out, he besought them to request the king in his behalf, and for the right of his church of Canterbury; this they kindly promised him to do. And accordingly by the intercession and favour of the lords, the king gave leave for his admission into the house, where he offered to purge himself lawfully in parl. of the crimes objected against him: but he was referred to the consideration of the 12 peers, who had his cause in hand at that time. On the 19th of April, being Thursday, the king came into st. Edw's. chamber, commonly called the painted chamber, before whom, in sight of the lords and commons, the abp. humbled himself, and required his gracious pardon; which upon the whole parl's. general suit and entreaty his maj. granted. After which the abp. desired, that whereas he was publicly defamed through the realm, he might now be arraigned in open parl. before his peers: but the king answered, he would first attend to the common affairs, and after that examine lighter matters. However, a little after, without any more accusation, or answer, the king of his own accord declared him legally purged and excused; his maj. having no mind to destroy so able a minister, but only to humble him and break his high prelatical obstinacy, which for a while seemed ready to cope with the regal power."

The further proceedings of this parl. require somewhat more attention than the former; a matter of great moment being the consequence thereof. The better to clear the way before us, we shall subjoin another extract from Barnes; "Upon occasion of the late contest between the king and the prelate, the clergy of England in this parl. made their requests to the king, that the liberties of holy church may be kept, and the great charter be newly proclaimed, and by oath confirmed. The king answered, 'that it was his desire that magna charta should be observed; but that it seemed to him sufficient, for either that, or other their liberties, to be exemplified under the great seal; and that more oaths were not necessary; especially since already too many were forsworn throughout the land.' Then they shewed, how several of the clergy were imprisoned by the king's officers without due process, and that therefore they may be delivered: to which the king answered, 'that he intended not any clergyman should be attached against law; and that he would be ready to hear, if any was in that manner imprisoned, either against magna charta, or the statute of Northampton.' They complained further, that several of the king's officers had entered divers religious houses, and having by oath extorted a confession of goods there deposited, carried them away. The king answered, 'that he would not his officers should do thus: but that if laymen to defraud him, did conceal their goods in such places, then the privilege should not avail: for so the king is wronged.' On Saturday following the lords petitioned, that magna charta might in all points be observed so as such persons, who are neither appealed, nor indicted, nor presented at the suit of any, and yet have their goods, lands, or possessions taken away, may be restored thereto again. "In answer to this the king granted for him and his heirs for ever, that if any person commit any act contrary to the form of magna charta, or any other good law, he shall be liable to answer it in parl. or else where he ought by law." The following are the Petitions of the Commons, with their respective Answers:—

"Commons. That the chancellor and other officers of state, there named in the records, may upon their entrance into the said offices be sworn to observe the laws of the land and magna charta. King. The king willeth the same.—C. That every man, for debts due to the king's ancestors, may have therefore charters of pardon, of course out of the chancery. K. The king granteth.—C. That certain by commission may hear the accounts of those who have received wools, monies, or other aid for the king, and that the same may be enrolled in the chancery. K. It pleaseth the king, so as the treasurer and lord chief baron may be joined in the commission.—C. That the ordinance made at Northampton, 'that men of evil life and conversation should be attached,' may be repealed; because on pretence thereof many honest men have been arrested. K. The king doth revoke it.—C. That many commissions, whereby sundry men have been fined outrageously by the commissioners, may be revoked, and new ones granted to others. K. The king is pleased, that the same shall be done in the presence of him, of the lords, and certain of the commons.—C. That the chancellor and all other officers, there named, may be chosen in open parl. they at the same time to be openly sworn to observe the laws aforesaid. K. The king yieldeth only thus much, that if any such office, by the death or other failure of the incumbent become void, the choice to remain solely in the king; he taking therein the assent of his council: but that every such officer shall be sworn at the next parl. according to the petition; and that every parl. following, the king shall resume into his hands all such offices; so as the said officers shall be left liable to answer all objections. Hereupon at the request of the whole 3 estates made unto the king, these articles were declared Statutes, as on the back of the roll doth appear: which, with the conditions, were afterward read before the king, his officers being present, all which officers were sworn on the cross of Canterbury to perform the same; only the chancellor, treasurer, and certain of the justices refused the said oath, as being repugnant to their former oath and the laws of the realm. However for that time the statutes and conditions aforesaid, together with the commissions to enquire after oppressions, were exemplified under the great seal, and delivered to the lords and commons."

This extraordinary concession from the crown being thus ratified and passed into a Statute, the king soon after sought to revoke, by a method more extraordinary than the grant; and which was a stretch of the royal prerogative greater than we have yet met with, since the three estates of the realm were established. For, shortly after, the king, by advice of his council, only, and without any parl., did abrogate what he before was, as he says, forced into, and had suffered to pass into a law. This was done by special writs, directed to all the peers, and to all the sheriffs in England, commanding the latter to proclaim it throughout their several divisions. The writ to the sheriff of Lincolnshire is still extant in the Public Acts, and in the Statutes at Large. The whole writ is translated by Barnes, for the rarity of it, as he says; but dr. Brady has given us a translation of another, directed to the abp. of Can-

"The king to the venerable father in Christ, John abp. of Canterbury, primate of all England, greeting;—"Whereas some time since in our parl. at Westm. assembled in the quindene of Easter last past, there were certain petitions made, expressly contrary to the laws and customs of England, and not only very prejudicial, but reproachful also to our royal dignity; which, if we had not permitted to have been drawn into a statute, the said parl. had been without success, and dissolved in discord, and so our wars with France and Scotland, which we principally undertook by your advice, had very likely been (which God forbid) in ruin: and we, to avoid such dangers, permitting protestations of revoking those things, when we could conveniently, that had so been extorted from us against our will, yet permitted them to be sealed with our seal at that time: and afterward by the advice and assent of the earls, barons, and other wise men, for lawful causes, because our consent was wanting" [or as it is in the revocation, directed to the sheriff of Lincoln, 'Because we never consented to the making of the statute; but as then it behoved us, we dissembled in the premisses, &c.'] "we have declared it null, and that it ought not to have the name and force of a statute. And we understand, you have commanded a provincial council to meet at London, on the morrow of st. Luke next coming; in which you intend to excite the bps. of your province against us, and to ordain and declare some things prejudicial to us, about confirming the said pretended statute, and for the enervation, depression, and diminution of our royal jurisdiction, rights and prerogatives, for the preservation whereof we are bound by oath; also concerning the process depending between us and you for certain matters charged upon you by us; and that you intend to promulge grievous censures concerning these things: we willing to prevent so great mischief, do strictly forbid, that in that council you dare to propound, or any ways attempt, or cause to be attempted any thing in derogation, or diminution of our royal dignity, power, or rights of the crown, or of the laws and customs of our kingdom, or in prejudice of the process aforesaid, or in confirmation of the pretended statute, or otherwise in contumely of our name and honour, or to the grievance or disadvantage of our counsellors or servants; know ye, that if ye do these things, we will prosecute you, as our enemy and violator of our rights, with as much severity as lawfully we may. Witness the king at Westm. the 1st day of Oct."

On the 23d of April 1343, Edw. summoned a parl. to meet at Westm. The causes for so doing expressed in the writ itself, 'being to treat and advise with his great men what was best to be done in his present affairs; particularly, concerning the truce lately made with his enemy of France, and about the good govt. and safety of his realm and people.'

The parl. being met, the lord chanc. sent for sir Barth. Burghersh to come into the house; who, having been with the king at the making of the late truce, was to declare what he knew concerning it. Whereupon the knight spoke to this purport, 'That after the king had begun the war with France, by assent of the prelates, great men, and commons, to obtain his rights and inheritance there, he had divers times passed the sea with his army, and after his last going over, had taken several towns, castles, and forts in Bretagne; but that whilst he lay at the siege of Vannes, he was desired by the pope, for the honour of God and holy church, to accept of the mediation of two cardinals whom he should send to him, to mediate a truce, until a peace could be treated of: and then concluded, that the king, perceiving the truce to be honourable, and advantageous to him and his allies, assented to it: that, during the continuance thereof, a treaty of peace might be had, before the pope, as a mediator and friend, but not as a judge; which peace, if good and honourable, the king would accept of; if not, he would pursue his quarrel. And sir Barth. further said, that because the war was begun by the common advice of the prelates, great men, and commons, the king would not treat of, or make peace without the like assent.' Wherefore the prelates and great men were charged to assemble on the 1st of May, to treat, advise, and agree among themselves, whether the king ought to send any envoys to the court of Rome, to propound his right before the pope, or not? and in the same manner, the knights of counties, and commons, were charged to assemble in the Painted Chamber, to treat, and advise in like manner, and to report their answer and agreement, in full parl. at the same time. On the day appointed, the prelates and great men answered, their advice was, "That the truce was honourable, and advantageous to the king and all his friends; and that every christian ought to wish, that the war, which was so great and hurtful to all christians, might soon end in a peace: wherefore they agreed to the truce; and that the king should send messengers to Rome, to lay before the pope, as a mediator and friend, (but not as a judge) his rights and demands, in order to a treaty of peace, according to the form of the truce. And then the knights of counties came in, and the commons, and answered by sir Wm. Trussel, in the white chamber, who in the presence of the king, prelates, and great men, proposed on behalf of the knights and commons, that they were fully agreed, the truce should be kept, to the end a good and hon. peace might be made: and further, the said commons prayed the king, to send express envoys, or messengers, to treat of peace, as abovesaid; and in case he could have an hon. and advantageous peace for himself and his friends, that he would accept of it; but if not, the said commons declared, that they would aid and assist him, and maintain his quarrel with all their power."

In this parl. the king created his eldest son prince of Wales, investing him with a coronet, a gold ring and a silver rod. He also gave him several more lands and revenues than he enjoyed before, the better to support this new dignity.—It was here also enacted, that the Statute made at Westm. the 15th of this king, and which the king had soon after revoked, as has been mentioned, should accordingly be utterly repealed and lose the name of a statute, as contrary to the laws of the king's prerogative. But, since the articles there made were thought reasonable, it was enacted that such articles, with some others agreed on in this parl. should, by the advice of the judges, be made into a statute.

“In this parl. (says Joshua Barnes) it is recorded, that the commons of England made great complaint of the provisions and reservations coming from the court of Rome; whereby the pope took up beforehand the future vacancies of ecclesiastical dignities for aliens, and such as had nothing to do within this realm. They remonstrated to the king the manifold inconveniences ensuing thereby; as the decay of hospitality, the transporting of the treasure of the realm to the maintenance of the king's mortal enemies; the discovering of the secrets of the kingdom, and the utter discouraging, disabling, and impoverishing of scholars, natives of the land. Among other instances, they also shewed how the pope had secretly granted unto two new cardinals sundry livings within the realm of England, and particularly to the cardinal of Perigord above 10,000 marks, yearly collections. Whereupon they humbly require the king and his lords to find a remedy for these intolerable encroachments; for that they neither could nor would any longer bear these heavy oppressions; or else they desired, that his maj. and the lords would help them forcibly to expel the papal power out of the realm. The king in consideration of the premises, willeth, that the lords and commons among themselves, consult of the most decent and fitting way, promising his consent to any reasonable remedy. Hereupon the king, lords, and commons presently sent for an act made at Carlisle in the 35th of Edw. I. upon the like complaint; which utterly forbad to bring, or attempt to bring any thing into his realm, which should tend to the diminution of the king's prerogative, or the prejudice of his lords and commons. And so at this time the famous Act of Provision was made, prohibiting the bringing in of any Bull, or the like trinkets from the court of Rome, or the using, allowing, or enjoying of any such bull, process, or any other instrument obtained from thence, as there at large doth appear. This act, however, as one observes, could not be agreed to by the bps. and the rest of the clergy, but they rather seemed resolved to protest against it, till the king peremptorily commanded them to surcease such presumption. However the lords temporal only, and the commons by themselves, wrote a letter to his holiness, the

“To the most holy father in God, the lord Clement, by Divine Providence, of the holy Roman and catholic church the chief bp.; his humble and devout children the princes, dukes, earls, barons, knights, citizens, burgeses, and all the commonalty of the realm of England, assembled in parl. at Westm. devoutly kiss his holy feet:—The pious discretion, prudence, and equity, which seem, and ought, indeed, to be in you, most holy father, who are so holy and so high a prelate, head of the holy church, by whom the catholic church and people of God should, as by the sun-beams be enlightened, do give us good hope, that the just petitions hereunder by us declared, to the honour of Jesus Christ, of his holy church and of your holiness also, shall be of you graciously considered, and that all errors and injustice shall be quite removed; instead whereof fruitful amendment and necessary remedies, through the grace of the holy spirit, which you in so eminent a degree have received, may be by you graciously ordained and applied. Wherefore, most holy father, after great deliberation, we all with one assent come unto your holiness, shewing and declaring, that the most noble kings of England, progenitors to his maj. that now is, as also our ancestors and ourselves too, according to the grace of the holy ghost to them and to us given, every one of his own devotion have established, founded, and endowed within the realm of England, cathedrals and other churches, colleges, abbeyes, priories, and divers other religious houses; and to the prelates and governors of the same have given and granted lands, possessions, patrimonies, franchises, advowsons, and patronages of dignities, revenues, offices, churches, with many and divers other advantages and emoluments: whereby the service of God and the faith of Christ might be honoured and had in reverence; hospitals and alms-houses, with all other edifices, churches, and colleges, might be honestly kept and maintained, and devout prayers in the same places made for the souls of the founders; and the poor also of the several parishes conveniently aided and nourished: of all which such only were to have the cure, who were able to take confessions, and were otherwise meet in their own mother tongue of England effectually to teach and inform their flock. And forasmuch, most holy father, as you cannot well attain the knowledge of divers such errors and abuses, as are crept in among us; nor yet be able to understand the conditions and customs of places, being yourself so far distant, unless your holiness be of others duly informed and instructed: we therefore having full and perfect notice and intelligence of all the errors and abuses of the said places within the said realm, have thought fit to signify the same unto your holiness, namely, that divers reservations, provisions, and collations by your apostolic predecessors of the church of Rome, and by you also in your time, most holy father, have been granted, and now more illegally than heretofore, unto divers persons, as well strangers and of other nations, as unto some who are our professed enemies, and who have little or no understanding at all of our language, and of the conditions and customs of those of whom they have the government and cure: whereby a great number of souls are in peril, many of the parishioners in danger, the service of God neglected, the alms and devotion of all men diminished, the hospitals brought to decay, the churches with their appurtenances ruined and dilapidated; charity waxeth cold, the good and honest natives of our own country unadvanced, the charge and cure of souls unregarded, the pious zeal of the people restrained, many poor scholars of our own unpreferred, and the treasure of the realm exported, against the mind and intention of the founders. All which errors, abuses, and slanders, most holy father, we neither can nor ought any longer to suffer or endure: wherefore we most humbly require your holiness, that the slanders, abuses, and errors, which we have declared unto you, may of your own great prudence be thoroughly considered; and that it may please you, that such reservations, provisions, and collations may be utterly repealed; that the same from henceforth be no more used among us; and that such order and remedy be forthwith taken therein, that the said benefices, edifices, offices and rights, with their appurtenances, may by our countrymen to the honour of God be supplied, occupied and governed. And that it may further please your holiness, by your letters to signify unto us without delay, or further protracting of time, what your pleasure is touching this lawful request and demand; that we may diligently do our duty herein for the remedy, correction, and amendment of the enormities above specified. In witness whereof unto these letters patents we have set our hands and seals. Given in full parl. at Westm. the 18th of May, 1343."

Mr. Barnes proceeds and tells us what reception this extraordinary letter met with from the pope, which was delivered to him by sir John Shoreditch, sent on purpose to Avignon. He gives us also the answer the holy father returned to king Edw. about it; as, also, the king's reply to the pope; which last, that author calls "a most famous epistle, in defence of the church of England, against papal encroachments; which was of such force, that neither the pope nor his cardinals, could tell how to answer, and they were obliged to comply with the terms of it for that time."

On the 7th of June, 1344, the king called a parl. to meet at Westm. The next day after their meeting, the names of the lords were read over and examined before the king in parl. to see who appeared and who failed, and the names of such as did not come were given to the king in writing. On the Thursday after, the lord chan. in full parl. the king and the young prince of Wales being present, declared the cause of this summons to be, 'concerning the late truce with France, and the breach of it by the French king, of which he gave 7 particular instances. He desired the 3 estates of the realm to consider of those things, and that they would give him such advice and assistance as was necessary for the saving of his and their own rights and honours.' The whole assembly prayed that they might have time to deliberate of these matters till the Monday next; and upon another petition they were again respited to the Wednesday following. On that day a select committee of the whole body, consisting of the abp. and 10 bps. 5 abbots, 2 priors, 8 earls, and 6 barons, being all named in the record, with the commons of the realm, waited on the king in the white chamber at Westm. and declared in his presence, 'that having regard to the great mischiefs and dangers that might affect his maj. and all his subjects and allies, if the malice of his adversary was not stopped; and considering the heavy charges which the lords and commons of England had been at, and suffered, by reason of the war continuing so long, by false truces of sufferances; and seeing that an end of the war, or an honourable peace, was not to be obtained without great power and force, they therefore pray the king, with one accord, and every particular peer by himself, that he would make a speedy end of this war, either by battle, or a proper peace, if such might be had. And that when the king should be ready to cross the seas, to take what God should allot him, upon the issue of this affair, he should not for the letters or command of the pope, or any other, lay aside his voyage, until he had made an end one way or another.' To all which prayer the king readily assented. But the parl. rightly judging that this could not be brought about without a large and sufficient aid, the whole body of the clergy, for the province of Canterbury, by their prelates and proctors, taxed themselves in a triennial 10th. The commons granted the king, for the same cause, two 15th's of the commonalty of the land, and two 10th's of the cities and boroughs. Soon after the commons gave another 15th. The lay-lords granted to pass over seas, and adventure themselves with the king, and are therefore not found upon the rolls as taxed.

It was nearly two years, from the date of the last meeting, before we find another parl. all which time was taken up by battles, sieges, and other martial exploits, performed by this warlike king, in person, or his generals, during the course of these French wars, with various success. In the spring of 1346, Edw. being informed that the duke of Normandy had invaded Guienne, and driven the earl of Lancaster, his lieut. in those parts, to great distress; he resolved to go over in person to relieve him, and save his territories on that side from utter ruin. But before he embarked the king thought necessary to settle and reform what was amiss in his own kingdom. To that end he called, says Barnes, his high court of parl. to meet at Westm. in the Lent season this year. It was here however, that the king by their advice thought fit to take into his own hands all the profits, revenues and emoluments, which the cardinals of the French faction and other foreign clergymen held within the realm. Here, also, it was ordained, 'that all the king's justices, throughout his dominions, should renounce and utterly forbear taking any pensions, fees, or any sort of gratuities, which before they used to receive, as well from lords temporal and spiritual as others, that so their hands being free from corruption, justice might be more impartially and uprightly administered.' Some complaints having been made to the king and parl. against the purveyors of victuals for his household, who, under colour of their commissions, had abused the same, taking up without ready-money all manner of provisions, or ever paying for them; he caused a strict enquiry to be made of this matter, and some of the most notorious offenders were hanged, and others condemned to pay great fines; whereby that grievance was redressed, and the rest of the king's officers were made, at least, more wary, if not more honest, for the future. See Hollingshead's Chron. from Adam Myrimuth, p. 369.

Having provided thus for the settlement of justice during his absence, and left the regency to his 2nd son prince Lionel, appointing the abp. of Canterbury and others of his council to assist him, he took leave of his queen, and, accompanied by his son the prince of Wales, together with most of the chief earls and barons of England, besides many knights and gentlemen, who were bound by their tenures to attend him, went to Southampton; where mustering up all his officers, he made a short speech to them, which was afterwards communicated to the whole army, to this purport, 'he set forth his title to the crown of France, and the justice of his arms, desiring them upon their landing to behave themselves like men; and that since he resolved to send back his fleet as soon as he arrived in France, if any man's heart failed him, he might stay in England.' To which they all answered with one consent, 'that they were all ready to follow him, even to death itself.'

During the absence of Edw. a parl. was called to meet at Westm. on the third day of the new year, 1347. It was opened with the usual formalities at that time. A time was appointed for all such as had any petitions to exhibit; the receivers also, and tryers were constituted to consider the contents of them, referring to England, Ireland, Wales, Scotland, Gascoigny and other foreign countries and islands. Sir Thos. Drayton was appointed clerk to this parl.; but, because several of the lords and commons were not yet come up, they adjourned to the day following. At which time the house being further informed that sir Barth. Burghersh, sir John Darcy, lord chamberlain, Mr. J. Thoresby and Mr. John Charle-ton, were arrived, as messengers from the king then lying before Calais, and since they could not be ready to make their appearance before the Wednesday next, the house adjourned again to that day. The day being come, a declaration was made in open parl. that the reasons of their present meeting, were, 'because the king, since his passing the sea, and his attempts in France, was now uncertain of his condition; and that according to the issue or exigence of affairs abroad, matters might be concerted at home, for the safety of his maj. and the common peace and wealth of his kingdom; which last was visibly damnified by the sufferance of false money to go current in it.' Then was produced the king's letters patents, as credentials, in which the aforesaid declaration was, verbatim, expressed, dated at the siege of Calais; which being read in open parl. sir Barth. Burghersh, for, and in the name of himself and the rest of his colleagues, in the presence of the regent and the three estates of the kingdom, declared the good success of the king since his arrival at La Hogue in Normandy, as in surprising and taking many towns and castles of war, as well at Caen, as elsewhere, and also of the great victory obtained at Cressy, where the whole power of France was discomfited; and how the king was now come before Calais, from whence he intended not to depart, till, by the help of God, he had won the same; after which he intended to pursue the enemy without return, till the war should be fully ended. This done, he produced the copy of an order, made by the k. of France, in reference to his son the duke of Normandy, and others, nobles of that country; which was particularly recited, being called the Ordinance of Normandy, and was to this effect; 'that the duke of Normandy should pass as chief, with other nobles of that province, into England, with 40,000 men of arms, knights, esquires, and persons of good estate, and 40,000 footmen, methods being there prescribed for keeping the sea; and an order also added, that the said duke should remain in England with the said forces, for the space of ten weeks. And in case the realm of England should in this expedition be conquered, that then the conquest should solely be to the name, honour, and advantage of the said duke, and all whatsoever the k. of England at that time had there, should remain entirely to the said duke, and the knights and lords with him. That all that which belonged to the nobles, and secular persons of England, should be bestowed on the churches, and famous towns in Normandy, only of the revenues of the church of England, the French king shall receive yearly 20,000l. st. saving the rights of his holiness. And that hereupon surrender be made unto the Scots, of whatsoever hath at any time been taken from them, and annexed unto the crown of England.'—This being read, the said messengers required to know, what aid they thought fit to grant the king, towards the furtherance of his enterprises, and the defence of the realm: in answer to which, the commons, having desired respite for their answer, till the Thursday next ensuing, declared on the said Thursday, by a shewale at large, the sundry, particular, former aids, the imposition of 40s. custom of wool, extorted of them against law, besides the arraying of men, and common taking of purveyors: notwithstanding which, they freely granted the king two 15ths in two years, so as that, if within two years the wars should cease, then the latter 15th to cease also.

After this follow the Petitions of the Commons with their Answers, made by prince Lionel, by commission from the king, in the king's name in manner following, viz.—Pet. That all acts of parl. not repealed, may be fully and entirely observed; so as there pass forth no commissions of array. Ans. The first point the king grants; of the rest he will be advised.

—Pet. That such as were fined for not arraying of men, may be discharged. Ans. The king will take advice.—Pet. That all within 6 miles of the sea may have a supersedeas for arraying of men. Ans. Only such as keep the sea-coasts shall have a supersedeas. It is enacted, that the coinage in all places shall be open, as heretofore; item, that those who import false money into the realm, shall forfeit life and limb, and that the justice of assize, and of the peace, shall enquire thereafter.—

Pet. That the king's receivers may receive as well gold, as silver, and that the changes thereof be not without parl. Ans. The first is granted; the other respited.—Pet. That the 40s. subsidy of every sack of wool may cease. Ans. The king's mind must be known first.—Pet. That payment may be made for the last taking up of victuals. Ans. Order shall be taken for that.—Pet. That the chief of every county may be justices of peace, and that they may determine all felonies. Ans. The 1st is granted; for the 2nd the king will appoint justices learned in the laws.—Pet. That the keeping of the sea be at the king's charge thenceforward. Ans. The sea shall be kept, as it hath been heretofore.—Pet. That sheriffs in every county may have sufficient in their counties; and that none of those offices be granted for life, or in fee: item, that purveyors, who have not the constables with them, according to the statute of Westm. may be looked on as thieves; and that justices of assize, and of the peace, may enquire of the same. Ans. The statute made shall be observed.—Pet. That the 15ths in towns, and ancient demesnes be levied, as in the bodies of counties, without encrease.

Ans. They shall be levied after the accustomed manner.—Pet. That all justices of the inquest may be sworn, as justices of the bench; and that the chief of them may have power to swear the rest. Ans. Such justices shall be sworn, as ought to be; so as they take nothing, but meat and drink, and that of small value: and the chief shall be impowered to swear the rest.—Pet. That the 15ths beyond the Trent be employed only for defence of the North.

Ans. The king will provide for defence of those parts.—Pet. That strangers, enemies of the realm, who remain now in Newgate, may be adjudged, during the parl. Ans. They shall remain there till further order.—Pet. That no charter of pardon be granted since the king's last expedition. Ans. Advice shall be taken. It is enacted, that Lombards, and other merchants, shall receive gold for their ware, without any compact, on pain of fine and imprisonment.—

Pet. That all alien monks do avoid the realm by Michaelmas, and that their livings be disposed of to young English scholars: and that such aliens, enemies, as are advanced to livings (they being in their own countries, but shoemakers, taylors, or chamberlains of cardinals) may depart the realm before Michaelmas, and their livings be bestowed on poor English scholars. Ans. To these two petitions, this one answer was given: that the persons being spiritual were not to be tried by parl.; and that their livings being in the king's hands, were not without him to be disposed of.—Pet.

That the king may take the profits of all other strangers' livings, as cardinals, and others, during their lives. Ans. The king doth take their profits, and the council have sent their petition to his majesty.—Pet. That no payment be made to any cardinals, living in France, to treat either of war or peace. Ans. This is granted, as reasonable.—Pet. That foreign provisors, or aliens buying provisions, do quit the realm by Michaelmas, on peril of being outlawed. Ans. The statute heretofore made shall be observed; and the king shall signify the same to the pope.—Pet. That the annual advancement of 2000 marks, granted out of the province of Canterbury, may be restrained, and that those, who sue for recovery thereof, may be outlawed. Ans. The lords think the same reasonable; and it is further commanded, that no such be from henceforth received. It is enacted, that whosoever shall bring into the realm any aliens, the vessel wherein they are brought shall be forfeited to the king, and the body of the bringer shall lie at the king's discretion. It is enacted, that during the wars no person do send or transport any money to the pope, or to any bp. or other alien whatsoever, for any duty whatsoever.—Pet. That no Englishman do farm any thing of any alien religious, nor buy any of their goods, nor be of their counsel, or pain of perpetual imprisonment. Ans. This is against the king's profit, who reaps benefit by such farmers.—Pet. That all friars, aliens, should depart the realm, never to return hither again. Ans. Order shall be taken with every general of all the houses of friars, so to look to all friars, aliens, under their several charges, as that they shall not be able to disclose the secrets of the realm.—Pet. That the annual pension of 7s. which sir Raimond Peligrue received of every religious house within the realm, may henceforward cease. Ans. The said sir R. is the king's liegeman, born in Gascoigne, and sworn of the king's council, by whose command he receiveth the same.—Pet.

That the annual pension of 2000l. paid to the abbot of Clugny, may cease for ever. Ans. The same is paid there.—Pet. That the statute made, that the king should present unto any church of his gift, falling void, at any time within 3 years; so as if the parson had continued therein for 3 years, that he should not be turned out, may stand. Ans. The king will be advised.—It is enacted, that no person bring into the realm to any bp. or other, any bull, or other letters from the court of Rome, or from any alien; unless he first shew the same to the ld. chancellor or to the warden, of the cinque ports, on loss of all that he hath. It is enacted, that all religious persons, for lands purchased since the 20th of Edw. III. and paying no demesne therefore amongst the clergy, shall pay 15ths.

After this, Mr. John Charleton, one of the messengers aforesaid, produced letters from the bp. of Durham, from the earls of Northampton, Arundele, Warwick, Oxford, and Suffolk, and from sir Hugh le Despenser, lord of Glamorgan, directed to the whole parl. purporting, that whereas the king at his arrival at La Hogue st. Vast in Normandy, had knighted his eldest son, the prince of Wales, whereby he ought to have an aid of the realm, viz. 40s. of every knight's fee, they would now consider thereof: hereupon the parl. agreed thereto immediately, and took order for the speedy levying the same. The letter which Barnes mentions to have come from the lords about the person of the king at Calais, to desire the parl. to grant him the aid for the knighthood of his eldest son, will be found in Rymer, p. 527. It was also ordered in full parl. at the request of the commons, that the benefices of all aliens be seized into the king's hands, and he to take the profit of the same; and that in order thereto, all bps. should, before the next convocation, certify into the chancery the names of all aliens, their benefices, and the value thereof: also, that no alien do send letters out of the realm, that shall not be first perused by the ld. chan. or the warden of the cinque-ports, on pain of losing all he hath.

Shortly after the king's return to England, he issued out writs, dated Nov. 13, 1348, for a parl. to meet on the 14th of Jan. at Westm. Sir Wm. Thorp, lord chief justice, by the king's command, opened the cause of the summons, in his presence; and in full parl. declared that it was on two accounts: '1st. concerning the war with the consent of the parl. next, how the peace of the nation might be better kept.' The lords and commons debated earnestly on these matters for some time; when on the 4th day the commons declared, 'that they were not able to advise any thing concerning the war, and therefore desired to be excused as to that point; and that the king will be advised by his nobles and council, and what shall be by them determined, they would consent unto, confirm, and establish.' For the second, they answered, that whereas they were charged to advise the king how the peace of the land might be better kept; their advice was that in every county there should be 6 persons, of whom 2 to be the greatest men in it, 2 knights, and 2 men of the law, or more or less as need shall be, and they to have power and commission out of the chancery, to hear and determine matters concerning the peace. And then because they had been so long in parl. to their great cost and damage, they might have a speedy answer to their petitions, in order to get soon back to their own homes.

It is probable the king received not the satisfaction he desired from this parl. for on the 17th of March he called another. Sir Wm. Thorp declared the cause of it to be, 'that the king had, according to the truce agreed to at Calais, sent commissioners to the pope, from whom he had long since expected some satisfactory answer, but as yet had received none. Also, that sundry articles of the truce, touching both the kings and their allies, were not duly performed; and further, that the French were preparing a puissant army, wherewith to invade the realm. From all which it appeared that the truce was but fickle, and that it was neither safe nor prudent to rely upon it, but rather to be armed betimes against the worst that might happen; that this war which was undertaken by the advice and consent of parl. might have a prosperous ending, and be carried on with the least charge to his people. He added, that the conservation of the public peace at home was another main point for their considerations, and that this must be done by wholesome laws duly and impartially administered.'

Debates arose again amongst them, and continued for some days; when, at last, the commons agreed upon the following

Petition, or Representation, to the King on the present State of the Nation:

"To their most hon. and most redoubted liege lord, his poor commons shew, that at his last parl. he sent the noble earls of Lancaster and Northampton, and other great men, to tell them, that he intended not to take any thing more of them, or to charge them farther; which they had published to the whole land, for which they had also thanked him, according to their knowledge, as much as they could, and prayed for him night and day: and yet at this present parl. upon certain news now arrived, he demanded a very great charge of his poor commons. Wherefore they desire his nobleness and most high ldp. would be pleased to understand the mischiefs and burdens of the commons; that is to say, the reasonable aid which had been pardoned in his 14th year, that is, a grant was then made it should not be paid all his reign; to wit, 40s. upon every knight's fee, to make his eldest son knight; whereas by statute there was but 20s. due upon every fee; besides the 15ths of the commons, and 10ths of cities and boroughs; men at arms, hobelors, archers taking of victuals without paying for them; guarding the sea; and also the subsidy of wool, by reason whereof every sort of wool, that was the treasure of the land, was sold for 40s. less than its value. And as it would be a great trouble to the commons to bear any charge, that therefore, if the aid now to be granted might not be turned into wool, neither by way of loan or value, nor in any other manner, nor levied too hastily, but in the form it was wont to be granted; and that the eyres of justices in the mean time might cease, as well of the forest as of the common pleas, and general enquiry in the whole land. That when this aid should be levied, that then for the future no subsidy upon wool may be granted by the merchants; and that no imposition, loan, or other taillage, shall be put upon them (the commons) by the privy council, without their grant and consent in parl.; and that 2 prelates, 2 lords, and 2 justices might be assigned to hear and dispatch their petitions, which were not answered in the last parl.; and that their petitions in this parl. might also be answered according to reason, and the answers to remain in force, without being changed or altered. That the justices do inquire of false money, which ruins the people. That David Bruce, Wm. Douglas, and other chief men of Scotland may in no manner be released, neither by ransom, nor upon their faith. That the king would restore the 20,000 sacks of wool taken of the commons by way of loan. That an aid to marry his daughter might not be taken in the mean time; and that there might be no marshalsea in England, except that of the king, or the guardian of England, when he was out of the kingdom.—Upon these conditions, and not otherwise, as also that they may be entered in the parl. roll, as matter of record, by which they might have remedy, if any thing should be done to the contrary in time to come; the said poor commonalty, to their very great mischief, grant to the king 3-15ths. to be levied in 3 years, to begin at Michaelmas next coming, so as every year 1-15th. may be levied, and no more, at 2 terms in the year, viz. st. Mich. and Easter, by even portions; and that this aid may be assigned and reserved only for the war, and not to pay debts; and if the war should cease, or a truce be made, then the 15th of the last year not to be levied. That of these conditions, and the manner of this grant, letters patent should be made, and sent into all counties, without paying any thing for them, wherein should be mentioned the great necessity the king was in after the last parl.; and in case the war should break out towards Scotland, the aid granted beyond Trent, should be employed for the defence of those parts, as it had been formerly."

Towards the latter end of 1350, the king having occasion for the advice of parl. issued out his writs of summons, dated Nov. 25, for one to meet on the 13th Jan. following. On which day being met, it was further adjourned to the 15th of Feb.; that none might plead for excuse they had not time enough given them to appear. Upon the day appointed the king's commission was read, authorizing pr. Lionel to hold a parl. during the king's absence. But being prorogued for some days, in the meantime the king returned. Being again assembled, Sir W. de Shareshal, the lord chief justice, in the presence of the king, lords and commons, declared, "that the cause of their summons was, first, because the king in the 22d of his reign had held a parl. which he was hindered from continuing; as, also, from calling another, by reason of the late dreadful plague, to this time. That the business of the wars now required their concurrence, because the peace was not punctually observed; and several domestic affairs wanted to be taken into consideration by them, particularly, that labourers refused to do their work at reasonable and usual rates: and lastly, because the treasure of the realm was exported." The cause of the meeting being thus opened, the king, by the said chief justice, commanded the commons to consider and advise what was best to be done to redress these evils. In obedience to which, and for the remedying the excessive wages of labourers, there was then enacted that remarkable statute de Servientibus, the 25th of this king; which, though now obsolete, will be found in the Statutes at Large. It was, also, enacted, that every man that purchased any provisions of abbies or priories, in the court of Rome, both he and his executors, which did sue and make executions of such provisions, should be out of the king's protection; and dealt with as enemies to the king and kingdom. This statute is called the 2d statute of provisors. See Hawkins's Statutes at Large, 25 Ed. III. p. 450, and Collier's Eccles. Hist. p. 554. The declaration of what offences shall be judged treason was now passed into an act; which has ever since been the great barrier betwixt the kings of England and their subjects.

On the 13th of Jan. 1352 the parl. met, but was adjourned for 5 days, on account of the absentees, when being all assembled, the parl. was opened by a speech from sir Wm. Shareshal the lord chief justice, declaring the occasion of the summons to be, for setting forth the king's title to the crown of France, telling them, "that Philip of Valois had usurped it all his life, and not only so, but moved war against him in Gascoigny and other places, seizing upon his rights and possessions, and doing all the mischiefs to him, both by sea and land, that was in his power, which they well knew, in subversion of him and his realm of England. That in former parlts. this matter had been propounded in behalf of the king; and their advice requested, what was best to be done; and that it had been declared, after good deliberation, they knew no other way to advise the king, than to procure allies to go against his adversary by main force, and to do this they had promised to aid him with body and goods. Whereupon the king made alliances with several foreign princes and powers, and by the help of the good people of England he made war upon him because he could not bring him to a reasonable peace. That the king and his adversary had often assented to truces; but his enemy, during those truces, imagining to deceive the king, broke them every way, continuing his malice against him and his friends. That now, after Philip's decease, John his son, continuing the same wrongs his father had maintained, possessed the kingdom of France; and contrary to the last truce, confirmed and sworn to by both, had broken it both in Gascoigny and Britany, and also upon the sea; and had, actually, sent to Scotland to renew the antient alliance made between them, wholly tending to the subversion and destruction of his people of England. Wherefore, the king much thanked his commons for the aids they have already given him, and for the good will he had always found in them; and prays them that they would take time to consult about this until the next day; and that at sun-rise in the morning they would come to the painted chamber in Westm. to deliberate, and to hear if the king would say any thing further to them; and to shew the king their grievances, if they had any, that relief might be given them at this meeting." He concluded his speech with charging the commons, in the king's name, to shorten their stay in town; and, for the quicker dispatch of business, that they would immediately make choice of 24 or 30 persons, out of their whole number, to be in the morning at the painted chamber, and the king would send a number of lords to them to confer about the business of the nation. After this declaration from the chief justice, and another from sir Barth. Burghersh, the king's chamberlain, to the same purpose; the commons chose a committee, as directed, who had several long conferences with the lords, as well to raise a necessary aid for the king, as to draw up petitions concerning the rights of their constituents. When all was ready, the commons in their whole body came before the king in full parl. and represented to him, "that the common people of the land was much impoverished by the late mortal pestilence, as well as by other burthens, taxes, tallages, and many other payments laid upon them; yet, notwithstanding all these damages, having a due regard to the national interest and defence, against the malice of their enemies, they delivered the king a Roll, containing both the aid which they had unanimously granted him, and their petitions concerning the commons of England, to which they prayed the king to give a good and speedy answer." The king granted their request, thanked them for the great aids given before, and for this now granted; and for the good will and kindness he had always found in his commons, as well in this as in former affairs. Then follows the grant of 3-10ths, and 3-15ths to the king, by the lords and the whole commons of the land, in order to supply his great necessities. This tax was to be raised as the last 10ths and 15ths were, within 3 years, upon the conditions following: "that all fines, profits, amer-ciements and imposts, levied or to be levied, upon labourers, artificers, regrators, &c. who were for taking more wages, were to be paid towards raising the subsidy." But this statute, together with the answer to it, is now obsolete, "That hereafter no tax, tallage, aids or charges be demanded, or levied on the commons; and that all the reasonable petitions, prayed by the commons, may be granted, confirmed and sealed before the dissolution of this parl." To which the king's answer was, "that as to the tax and tallage, tis not the intention of the king, or the lords, that they should ever be charged without the consent of the commons; and as to granting their other reasonable petitions the king is pleased it should be done." The commons pray, also, "that the loans which were granted to the king by many of that body, may be released; and none compelled to make such loans for the future against his will, for that it was against reason and the franchise of the land; and that restitution might be given to those who had made the loans." The king's answer was, "that it should be done." Also, that whereas the king's justices, assigned to several counties, had judged many men that were arraigned before them as traitors, for divers causes not known to the commons to be treason; therefore it was desired that the king and his council, and the great and wise men of the land, would please to declare the points of treason." The answer was, "that a statute was made in the last parl. setting forth and declaring what crimes shall be treason for the future." This we shall have often occasion to mention in the sequel. It may not be amiss to add, that lord John Maltravers, who was thought to be one of the murderers of Edw. II. having some years before come in and submitted himself to the king's mercy, and lately received his pardon, now petitioned to have it confirmed in parl. which, in consideration of his late faithful service to the king in Flanders, was granted accordingly; and he was again restored to his honour and estate.

On or about Michaelmas, 1353, the king met his parl. again at Westm. which had been summoned by writ, dated July 15, before. The following is a

It was not, however, till the 7th of Oct. that this parl. sat to business; when being all assembled, in the White Hall, or chamber, of Westm. the lord chamberlain, Burghersh, delivered the king's mind to them as follows, "that the king, considering how he might best ease his people, that had been often charged with impositions and great aids, by reason of the war with his adversary of France, who detained his right of heritage to that crown from him; had sent lately some of the most noble lords of his realm, viz. the abp. of Canterbury and the duke of Lancaster, with other prelates and noblemen, to Guisnes, to treat with his adversary, in presence of a cardinal whom the pope had sent thither as a mediator; and that after the treaty he had sent his confessor to the pope to acquaint him, that considering the many people that had been killed in this war, and desiring to spend the rest of his time in another more holy one, to the honour of God, if his adversary would make resitution of the dutchy of Guyenne to him, as entirely as any of his ancestors had enjoyed it, to hold it freely without any homage or service, he was willing, when the war was ended, to resign his title to the crown of France. That the pope had moreover been desired to sound his French adversary's inclinations to a farther treaty; yet, with protestation, that if he should not accept it, all his rights should be entirely saved to him as if no such offer had been made. To which message the king not having received any answer from the pope, he had sent another by the archdeacon of Huntingdon, to know what had been done in this affair, who brought back nothing worth reporting. Wherefore, it seemed necessary to the king and the lords of his council, that he should prepare himself for the war against his adversary, as well for the defence of England, as to recover his rights, for which he ought to have a great sum of money granted to him." The said chamberlain shewed further, "that the late tax or subsidy on wool, leather and wool-fels, ending at Michaelmas last, it was not the king's intentions to lay any new tax or other charge upon his people, yet, he requested the parl. to grant him the said subsidy for some time longer." This request being considered by the three estates, they all unanimously agreed to grant the king this subsidy of wool, &c. to receive it, as before, from Michaelmas last for 3 years to come, if the war should continue so long; upon condition that the money arising from this subsidy, should be kept solely for the war, and not applied to any other use. There were, likewise, several excellent laws made in this parl. as, particularly, that of the Staple; whereby it was enacted that the great markets for wool, wool-fels, leather and lead, should be held in London, Wesm. York, Bristol, and divers other cities and towns therein mentioned; with several rules and restrictions for well regulating the same. There was, also, another statute enacted of Provisors against Appeals to Rome; together with some Petitions from the commons, and other matters, all which will be found in the Statutes at Large, or in Cotton's Abridgment of the records.

On the 15th of March, 1354, the king sent out his writs of summons to call a parl. to meet at Westminster on the 28th of April following. Being accordingly assembled, the aforesaid lord chief justice declared in the presence of the king, lords and commons in the Painted Chamber, "That the cause of this parl.'s being called was for three things: 1st. For establishing the Staple within the realm, and for confirmation of the Ordinances made last parl. about it. 2dly, How they might treat of a peace with France; for that by war the king saw his subjects greatly wasted. And 3dly, For receiving of petitions and redressing of grievances; all which without a parl. could not be effectually done."—A day or two after, the lord chamberlain informed them, "That there was great hopes of bringing about a peace between England and France, by means of certain commissioners appointed, on both parts, for that purpose; yet the king would not conclude any thing without the consent of his lords and commons. Wherefore he demanded of them, in the king's name, whether they would assent and agree to a peace, if it might be had by treaty." To which the commons answered with one accord, "That what should be agreeable to the king and his council in making of this treaty, would be so to them." But the commons being asked again, "If they consented to a perpetual peace if it might be had," they all unanimously cried out, yea, yea. Upon which dr. Mich. Northburg, keeper of the privy seal, commanded dr. John de Swinley, the pope's notary, to enter this in a public instrument, which was to be laid before the pope at Avignon.

In this parl. it was that the lord Roger Mortimer, grandson to the famous Roger Mortimer, who was attainted and executed 23 years before, was restored to blood, and the judgment against his said grandfather reversed, as being contrary to law. The like favour, also, R. Fitz-Alan, son to Edm. earl of Arundele, who had been attainted in the beginning of this reign, obtained on behalf of himself and his said father.

From Cotton's Abridgment of the Records, we have selected the following Petitions from the commons for redress of grievances, presented during this parliament.

The Commons' Petitions, with the King's Answers thereto.

C. That the surplusage of the fines of the Statute of Labourers may be entirely distributed among the poor of the whole county, and not to poor towns only. K. It shall be parted among the poor towns only.—C. That the writ of Estreat may lie in every action, where the party shall recover damages of Estreats after the writ purchased. K. The old law shall be continued.—C. That remedy may be had in such cases, where the king receiveth the profits of the ward's lands, as well of Soccage, as otherwise, where no part of the same is holden of him. K. The law heretofore used shall continue.—C. That it may be ordered, whether the tenants of such as hold by barony, and are summoned to parl. shall contribute to the payment of knights' fees coming to parl. K. As heretofore, so the same shall be.—C. That present pay be made of all purveyances, being under 20s. and of greater within 1-4th of a year, and that purveyance be made without malice. K. It is good to make payment according to the first point, and to redress the second.—C. That all sheriffs be charged to make present payment for all purveyances for Calais. K. The demand is reasonable.—C. That any one attainted upon a writ of Oyer and Terminer, may bring his attain, pending his suit against the other. K. The lords will not alter the order of the law.—C. That the lords, marchers of Wales, do suffer no distresses to be made on any Englishman coming into Wales, for any other men's debts, if he be no debtor, trespasser, or surety. K. As heretofore, so the law shall be.—C. That no inquest upon conspiracy, confederacy, maintenance, or such like be returned, but by the sheriff, of the most lawful men, and nighest in that part of the country, where such acts are laid; that all evidences therein be given openly at the bar, and that no man speak with the jury after they depart therefrom. K. This last petition is agreed to.—C. That the king will appoint a time when the coin shall be made finer. (a) K. With opportunity the king mean-eth the same.—C. That the king have the forfeitures of his widow's dowagers; but not of such as hold jointly with their husbands. K. The old law shall stand.—C. That the Writ of Appeal brought pending another may abate the other. K. The common law therein used shall continue.—C. That weights and measures may henceforth be made in the city of London, so as all counties do conform themselves according thereto. K. There is a Standard in the treasury, where every man readily may have the same.—C. That the writs of chancery may be at reasonable prices; and that the clerks of the crown, and others for commission and such like, do content themselves with the king's allowance. K. As heretofore the same shall be.—C. That fines for writs may be reasonably made in every of the king's courts. K. The chancellor shall do as heretofore.—C. The commons beyond the Trent require, that the justices of the one bench or of the other, may yearly come twice amongst them, for taking cognisance of fines and letters of attorney of the unable. K. The king will be advised.—C. That labourers may take corn for their wages. K. The statute made shall be observed.—C. That the Staple may always continue in England. K. The same shall so continue till the next parl. not to be altered without the assent of the parl.—C. The merchants strangers require, that the Ordinances of the Staple may be executed speedily. K. The king willeth the same.

Then the lord chamberlain Burghersh, sen. and one of those who had been at the treaty of Calais the last year, declared to the whole house, "That there was a treaty of peace between the king and the French, and a good hope of a final accord;" whereto in the king's name he demanded of the commons, whether they would agree. To which demand they answered, "That therein they wholly submitted themselves to the order of the king and his nobles."

chester, the lord treas. of England, had caused groats and half-groats to be coined to the people's great disadvantage; seeing that they wanted something of the just sterling weight. This occasioned the price of all things to be very much enhanced; whereupon at the commons complaint now in parl. the king promised to redress their grievance the first opportunity. Yet, however, many times after those days the like practice had been used, insomuch, that now 5s. scarcely contain so much silver as 5 groats had 3 or 400 years ago; so that it is no wonder, if things be sold at treble the price which they held at that time. For hereby also it comes to pass, that the prince and nobility cannot possibly maintain their estates with their ancient rents and revenues; because though they bring them in the old tale and number, yet they fall far short in the due weight and quantity of metal. (a) For the better understanding of this petition, it is necessary to observe, that, about 4 years before this, W. Edindon, bp. of Win-

Before the king went over to France in 1355 he sent out his writs of summons for a parl. to meet on the 12th of Nov. following; about which time, Edw. being at Calais, heard of the loss of Berwick, and prepared himself not only to meet his parl. but to recover that town. However, it was not till the 25th of that month that he could get to Westm. to which time the parl. had been adjourned. Being at length all assembled, the lord chief justice Shareshall told them, that it was his maj.'s pleasure that sir Walter Manny should declare to them the present state of the king's affairs, being best able to do it, and he accordingly delivered himself to this effect:—"He first gave them an account of the late treaty before the pope, and how it had been broke off by the obstinacy of the French commissioners. That in order to conclude a peace he had sent the duke of Lancaster, with others, to the pope's court at Avignon; and that during his stay there the king of Navarre had complained to the said duke of sundry damages done to him by the French, and affirmed upon oath that he would willingly enter into a league with the English against them; and for assurance of the same engaged himself to meet his maj. at the island of Jersey with as great power as he could raise. That the king, upon the return of the said duke, and knowledge of the affair, with a great army and navy, set sail from the river Thames towards Jersey; but being beat back by contrary winds, he was driven with much hazard into Portsmouth, where he staid till he was credibly informed that the said king of Navarre had actually made his peace with the enemy of France. Upon hearing, also, that the French were marching a strong army towards Calais, the king went over thither, in hopes they would give him battle, accompanied with his own army, and joined there by the forces of his German allies. That on All-Soul's day last past the king marched towards the enemy and offered them battle, which the enemy took all possible ways to avoid; whereupon, the king wasted and spoiled the country, but finding his army to languish for want of provisions, was obliged to return back to Calais, where he paid off his mercenary troops, and came hither to meet his parl."—After this speech was ended, the lord chief justice addressed himself to the commons to this purpose:—"He required them to weigh and consider well the king's unwearied constancy in labouring for their defence. That he was now ready, also, to repel the insolence of the Scots, who had surprised, in his absence, the town of Berwick, as he had been informed; he desired them therefore how he might be enabled not only to subdue entirely that stubborn people, but, also, how to attain an advantageous peace with France, which he much desired, to his own honour and their quiet and benefit."—He concluded with giving them time till Friday following to bring in their answer, and in the mean while to prepare their bills and petitions to be laid before the king in parliament.

On the day appointed, the commons came into the White Chamber, at Westm. and having had a short conference with the lords, in the king's presence, they unanimously granted the king the subsidy on leather, wool and wool-fels, for 6 years to come; provided that no other imposition or charge be laid upon them during that term. This tax was no less than 50s. on each sack of wool that should be exported; by which sole grant the king was able to expend a 1000 marks a day on a just calculation, there being no less than 100,000 sacks yearly exported by the English merchants in those days.—See Hollingshead's Chron. p. 383.

Pet. That the Great Charter, and the Charter of the Forest in all points shall be kept: that the statute, that the staples shall always be kept within the realm, shall be observed: that the statute made for yearly removing sheriffs be observed: and that the statute made for purveyors be kept. Ans. The king willeth the same.—P. That whereas the commons have granted to the king 40s. of every knight's fee in aid to make his son a knight, the exchequer demandeth the same, as well of mesne lords, as of the tenants in demesne, against reason: wherefore they pray remedy. A. The right use of the exchequer is to be kept.—P. That no man's land, being bought in the time of Henry III. which was before the statute of Prerogative, may be seized into the king's hands by escheators. A. Let this be more particularly declared to the king.—P. That the justices of the peace may determine weights and measures. A. The statute made shall be observed. Such justices shall make no deputies, neither shall the sheriff, coroner, or such like, be a justice.—P. That the points of confederacy may be declared, considering how the judges judge rashly thereof. A. None shall be punished for confederacy, but where the statute speaketh expressly upon the point contained in the same statute.—P. That the justices of gaol-delivery, on an indictment of the coroner coming before them, may award the exigent. A. The old law shall stand.—P. That such persons of the far North countries, as upon appeals join issue on good or evil, may try the same by Nisi Prius; considering that the jury will not appear in the king's bench. A. The old law used shall be kept.—P. That remedy may be had against such, as to defraud their creditors before judgment, do convey away their lands and goods. A. The statute therefore made shall be observed.—P. That writs of attaints may be had of verdicts given in other courts.—The old law shall be observed.

When the parl. had thus dispatched the king's business and their own, they broke up, and the king marched immediately for Scotland, where he soon retook Berwick, and performed several other martial exploits in that kingdom. Whether it was stipulated by this last parl. that there should not be another called in such a time, or that the grant of the last subsidy, on wools, &c. for 6 years was sufficient for the national expence for that term, we know not; but we meet with no other parliament during that whole time.

On the 25th of Jan. 1361, Edw. met his parl. at Westm. Here the articles of peace, concluded between John k. of France and the king of England, were communicated to the whole assembly; and both lords and commons were highly satisfied with the king's conduct in the affair. These articles, 40 in number, are to be found in Brady, Tyrrel, and other historians.

The king called another parl. to meet at Westm. on the 13th of Oct. 1362, where all the peers were expressly commanded to appear in person, and not one proxy permitted. The causes of this assembly were declared by the lord chief justice, sir H. Green, to be "for the redress of matters relating to the church; for observation of the peace; for settling affairs with Scotland; and for enhancing the price of wool." All which were then very well ordered, as may be seen in the records and printed statutes of this year. The Staple of Wools was appointed, though not by express statute, yet with the consent of both houses, to be removed from London to Calais. For we find by the records, that when the lords were commanded to speak, "what they thought of the merchants removing to Calais?" they all agreed, "that it seemed to them to be a matter very profitable to the realm." The commons, indeed, demurred a little at the first, till they had consulted with some merchants about it, but, at last, they complied with the lords also. Whereupon, the king sent over 26 of the ablest and most considerable merchants in the kingdom, to hold the Staple there for 3 years. These merchants were, also, ordered to keep and defend the town, every man having a guard of 6 men at arms and 4 archers, at the king's charge. Besides the mayor of the town, the king by his charter constituted another, called the mayor of the Staple of Calais; the king being to receive 20s. and the aforesaid merchants, wardens of the town, 40d. more, as custom, on every sack of wool there bought.

In this parl. also was passed that remarkable statute, "that all pleadings and judgments in the courts of Westm. should be for the future in English," whereas before they were wont to be in the French language, ever since the time of the conqueror. It was, also, ordained, that all school-masters should teach their scholars to construe in English, and not in French, as they had hitherto used. Here also, it was enacted that neither gold nor silver should be used in apparel, knives, girdles, chains, rings, or other bodily ornaments, by any man who could not spend 10l. a year. And that none who could not spend 100l. a year, should presume to wear silks, furs, or other precious garments. On the last day of the parl's. sitting, the commons unanimously gave the king 26s. 8d. on every sack of wool, for 3 years; besides the former subsidy on wool-fels and skins. And now, business of that kind being concluded, the aforesaid sir Hy. Green declared to both houses, "that the king being then arrived at the 50th year of his age, intended to keep it as a jubilee; and to pass several acts of grace and mercy to his people. He therefore granted a general and special pardon for all crimes, treason itself not excepted, without any fine, or paying of fees for the seal; and set all debtors to the crown, and prisoners for criminal matters, at liberty." The king also confirmed Magna Charta; which was confirmed no less than 10 several times in this reign.

In 1363 the king issued out his writs of summons, dated June 10, for a parl. to meet at Westm. on the 6th of Oct. following; when, there not being a full attendance of members, the houses were adjourned to Friday following. At which time Simon Langham, bp. of Ely, and chancellor of England, declared before the lords the king's reasons for calling this parl. He said, "that the king was desirous to know the grievances of his subjects; and, particularly, that he might by their advice redress any wrongs that had been done to holy church; also, to reform all enormities, especially about the manner of exhibiting petitions in parl." Then the commons gave the king their most humble thanks for the great goodness he had shewed and confirmed unto them in the last parl. and humbly prayed "that the king would enjoin the abps. and all other of the clergy, that they would put up their joint prayers to Almighty God for the prosperity of his maj. in order to the peace and good govt. of the land, and for the continuance of his maj's. good affections towards his commons." This parl. continued by prorogations till the 3d of Nov. when the lord chanc. in presence of the king and both houses declared, "that the king was now resolved to execute the Statute of Apparel, and therefore charged them all to promote the same." He then demanded of both houses, "whether they would have such matters as they agreed on to be by way of Ordinance or of Statute?" They answered, "by way of Ordinance, that they might amend the same at their pleasure." In this parl. it was enacted, that poultry should be sold in the following manner; a young capon for 3d. an old one for 4d. a hen for 2d. a goose for 4d. For the Statute appointing Apparel, see Statutes at Large. A. 1363.

On the 4th of Dec. 1364, Edw. sent forth his summons for a parl. to meet him at Westm. on the 21st of Jan. following. On which day being met, they were by proclamation adjourned to the next morning in the painted chamber, there to hear the king's pleasure. At which time, bp. Langham, lord chanc. of England, began a long and formal harangue, taking for his text that of the royal prophet; 'Faithful judgment doth adorn the king's seat.' "From whence he took occasion to extol the great valour of the king his master, and the many victories which by God's assistance he had gained in his youth; not forgetting the constant and dutiful good will and ready concurrence of the king's loyal subjects, towards the furtherance of those his important undertakings. For all which, as the king did now by him, return them his hearty thanks, so he let them know that for his part he was resolved to seek the common peace and tranquillity of all his people: especially, by enforcing a due observance of all good and wholesome laws, and amending such of them as should be thought defective; as also by establishing new ones as necessity should require." They then proceeded to appoint receivers and tryers of petitions for England, Ireland, Wales, &c. as also for Aquitaine, and other foreign countries. Which done, the king himself spoke to the whole assembly to this effect: "That citations and false suggestions were daily made to the pope, for matters determinable in his own courts of this realm; that provisions were procured from Rome for ecclesiastical dignities, at the great scandal of the antient laws, and the derogation of his crown. That the treasure of the land was by these means conveyed away, to the diminution of church livings, the withdrawing of divine service, alms, hospitality, with other good and acceptable works, and the daily increase of all mischiefs." Therefore he required them, "That whereas a former statute had been made; another act, to the same purpose, but more strict, should also be prepared against the pope's provisions of bishopricks, and other ecclesiastical dignities and benefices: and also against all those who have obtained or should obtain any such benefices, by virtue of such provisions; or should serve any process, or citations, to the court of Rome for that purpose." An act was made accordingly, and passed this session; which may be found in our printed statute books, agreeing with the record. The petitions of the commons, with the king's answer to them, come next in the proceedings of this parl. the most remarkable of which are these; "the commons pray, that 8s. 4d. laid upon every sack of wool at Calais, and all other unreasonable impositions, may cease." Answer: "the king willeth that unreasonable impositions may cease." It was also then agreed, that the Staple being removed from Calais, one should be held at Melcomb-Regis, and another at Ipswich; and that all merchants and others might ship wools at Lewes, for their ease, or in other places.

On the 30th of March 1366, Edw. held another parl. at Westm. at the opening of which, in the painted chamber, bp. Langham, ld. chanc. declared, in presence of the lords and commons, the reasons why this parl. was called, which in effect were these, "that since the king had sent his eldest son, the prince of Wales, to govern the country of Aquitaine; as also, the duke of Clarence, his next son, to be his lieut. in Ireland; his chief care now was how he might govern his people at home in the best manner." After which both houses proceeded to nominate receivers and tryers of petitions as usual, and adjourned to the next day, when the chan. in the presence of the king, lords, and commons, spoke again and told them, "that he had the day before informed them in general, of the occasion of their meeting, and that now they should know it more particularly; the king having a matter of great importance to communicate to them. His maj. had lately received notice, that the pope, in consideration of the homage which John k. of England, had formerly paid to the see of Rome, and of the tribute by him granted to the said see, intended by process to cite his maj. to appear at his cour, at Avignon, to answer for his defaults, in not performing what the said king, his predecessor, had so undertaken for him and his heirs, kings of England. Whereupon, the king required the advice of his parl, what course he had best take if any such process should come out against him." The bps. lords and commons, desired until the following day, to give in their answer; when, being again assembled, after full deliberation, they declared as follows, "that neither king John nor any other king could bring himself, his realm and people, under such subjection, without their assent; and if it was done, it was without consent of parl. and contrary to his coronation oath; that he was notoriously compelled to it by the necessity of his affairs and the iniquity of the times; wherefore the said estates enacted, that in case the pope should attempt any thing by process, or any other way, to constrain the king and his subjects, to perform what he says he lays claim to, in this respect, they would resist and withstand him to the utmost of their power." This parl. continued to sit till the 11th of May, when the ld. chanc. notified to them, "The marriage of the princess Isabella to the lord Ingelram de Coucy, who had a large estate both in France and England, and that it would be for the king's honour to create him a peer of this realm:" which the lords finding convenient, readily agreed to. Whereupon the king, by his letters patent, created him earl of Bedford, with a grant of 1000 marks per ann. out of the exchequer, and 30 marks more out of the issues of the county of Bedford, to be paid by the sheriff of that county.

On the 24th of Feb. 1368, the king issued out his writs, for summoning a parl. to meet at Westm. the 1st of May following. When being met, dr. Langham, then abp. of Canterbury, was the king's prolocutor, and declared to the assembly, that it was his maj.'s pleasure that they should be adjourned for 3 days; and at the time appointed the said abp. opened the cause of their meeting to this effect, "That the king yielded unto God Almighty most hearty thanks for having given him the victory over all his enemies; as, also, for the peaceable and flourishing condition of his realm, and for the great loyalty of his subjects, and their constant readiness to serve him, both in body and goods; all which blessings he desired, as much as in him lay, to continue or rather to increase. And, that he might the better succeed in that resolution, he had at this time called his parl. to confer with them concerning matters relating to the premisses." Then the receivers and tryers of petitions were appointed, which took up all the rest of that day.—On the day following being assembled again in the Painted Chamber, the said abp. farther declared the substance of a treaty between the king's commissioners and David Bruce, king of Scotland, who had lately made this offer. "That he was willing to preserve a perpetual peace with England, provided he might quietly enjoy the kingdom of Scotland, free and discharged from all homage to that crown; since to hold it otherwise would be a constant reproach to him and his kingdom." Concerning which terms of peace the lords and commons, being asked their advice, gave in their answers, severally, to one and the same effect, "That they could not assent to any such peace, upon any account, without a disherison of the king, his heirs and crown, which they themselves were sworn to preserve, and therefore must advise him not to hearken to any such propositions." After which the abp. in the king's name, gave thanks to the estates in parl. "For their ready compliance in assisting the king's wants by aids and subsidies; and shewed them further how at that time the king stood in as great need as ever of a considerable supply to discharge his debts." Upon which the lords and commons granted the king, for 2 years, of every wool-pack 36 s. 8 d.; for every 12 score of fells, as much; and 13 s. 4 d. for every last of skins, over and above the old customs. Then certain new statutes were prepared for the royal assent, and some old ones were explained and confirmed, which may be seen in the printed statute-books under this year.

About this time another war with France seeming unavoidable, the French king having, by treaties and embassies, deluded Edw. till he had taken an opportunity to seize on the greater part of his dominions abroad, he called a parl. in order to lay this affair and the state of the nation before them. They were summoned to meet at Westm. May 27, 1369; at which time the king, prelates, dukes, earls, barons, knights, citizens and burgesses, assembled in the Painted Chamber, the celebrated Wm. of Wickham, bp. of Winchester, then ld. chanc. being prolocutor. This prelate told the assembly, "That the king, always, in his greatest affairs had used their advice and counsel; in which he ever found them truly loyal, and for which he thanked them. And not being willing any thing should be unknown to them, he laid before them the peace, which by their advice he had concluded with his adversary of France, some time ago. The conditions of which were, that by such a day he should surrender up to him certain countries beyond seas; should pay unto him certain sums of money, at stated times; and that for the future he should never pretend to any jurisdiction or sovereignty over Gascoigny or its neighbouring parts. In consideration thereof, the English k. was to give up the stile and title of the k. of France for ever, which he had accordingly done. But his said adversary had not only failed to make delivery of the lands and countries agreed upon; had made no payments of the money; but had, also, summoned certain lords of that country, under his jurisdiction, and even the pr. of Wales himself, to appear before him, on a day prefixed, at Paris, to answer their appeals, which was contrary to the form and tenor of the peace. Besides all this, he had sent a great number of men at arms, and others, into Gascoigny; and there by force had taken towns, castles, and other places; killed some of the king's liege people, taken others and imprisoned them in hopes of great ransoms; the same he had also done in Ponthieu. That because of these doings, especially in the principality of Aquitaine, against the form of the peace, the prince had sent special messengers to inform the king that he had called to him the wisest men of the said principality, and treated with, and propounded to them, whether, by reason of these things, his father might not by right retake upon him and use the name of k. of France." Who all answered and affirmed, "That the king might do it by right and good faith." Upon which point the abp. of Canterbury and the other prelates were charged by the king to treat and shew their best advice and counsel.—The prelates took 2 or 3 days to deliberate upon this knotty case of conscience: "Whether the king was released from his oath or not?" When the whole assembly being again met, the abp. and bps. with one accord, answered, "That the king, for the causes above-said, might justly re-assume and use the name of k. of France by right and good conscience." To which sentence, the dukes, earls, barons, knights and commons, unanimously agreed.

The parl. having thus agreed to renew the war, the next thing to be thought of was the sinews of it. Accordingly the king ordered, "the state of the nation to be laid before them; and because he should be at great charge to maintain his forces both by sea and land, which he could not support without their assistance; he requested them, therefore, to consult and advice how it might best be done with the least charge and damage to his people." On which, the lords, by themselves, and the commons, of one accord, granted to the king a subsidy on wools; that is 43s. 4d. on every sack, and on every 12 score of wool-fells as much; on every last of leather 4 l. that should be exported, besides the ancient customs for 3 years, to commence at Michaelmas next. On strangers was laid, for every sack of wool 4 marks, and every 12 score of fells as much; and on every last of leather the same rate.—Some other matters were transacted in this parl. of less notice; as that all the king's forts, ports and fortresses should be surveyed, repaired and edified; that no religious aliens should be left in a capacity to discover the secrets of the realm, as well as all their possessions to be seized into the king's hands; that remedy may be had against the excessive price on armour, and against the unreasonable demands of dealers in horses. Lastly, the king on the 12th of June came to the house, and gave them thanks, from his own mouth, "For the great pains they had taken, and the aid they had given him; and, in some sort of recompence, promised to all those lords, and others, of whatsoever degree, estate, condition or nation they were, who would maintain his cause and quarrel against his enemies of France, that they should hold and enjoy, for ever, all they should there recover and conquer; whether duchies, earldoms, viscounties, cities, towns, castles or lordships, persons, names, arms and honours, to hold the said possessions of him, as k. of France, by the accustomed dues and services. Reserving only to himself and his heirs all demesnes, royalties, services, homages, dues, resorts and sovereignties, belonging to the crown of France; and excepting all church-lands, and the lands of all such, who, without force or difficulty would obey, adhere to, and remain in obedience to him; and of their own good-will, would assist him in his quarrel against his said adversary. Likewise, the king commanded that not only all the bps. should muster their own tenants and servants; but that all parsons, vicars, monks, fryars, and other religious persons of the clergy, should be in readiness, in case of an invasion, to resist the common enemy." After which he dissolved this parliament.

On the 8th of Jan. 1371, writs of summons were issued out for a parl. to meet on the 24th of Feb. that year. Being all assembled, in the Painted Chamber at Westm. the lord chan. Wickham opened the cause of the summons to be for this purpose, "that since by the assent of the last parl. the king did retake upon him the title of king of France, because his adversary had broke the peace, and claimed the superiority over Aquitain, which had formerly belonged to his father; he had for this and several other causes been at great expences, and sent some men of quality and others, to a mighty number, to conquer and recover his right. That the king had received news from his friends and allies that his adversary had made himself stronger than he had done before; and ordered so great an army to be brought together, that in all probability he would be able to get possession of all his lands and territories beyond seas, as well in Gascony, as at Calais, Guisnes, Ponthieu, and other places. Further, that his said adversary had such a fleet ready as seemed sufficient to destroy the whole English navy; and that he purposed, to send over such a land-army into this kingdom, as might be equally able to conquer and subject it to his own power. Wherefore, the king earnestly desired the lords and commons to consult about these points; and advise him which way the kingdom might be safely guarded, the navy preserved from the malice of his enemies, his lands beyond sea kept, the war maintained, and the reduction of the French effected.

These high matters being thus laid before the parl. many Ways and Means were proposed for raising an aid, which were freely debated betwixt the lords and commons. At last, in consideration of the great costs and charges which the king had been at, and was to bear, for the reasons given, both houses consented, March 28, to grant a subsidy of 50,000 l. to be levied on every parish at 22s. 3d.; and those of greater value to contribute, by rate, to those of less. The clergy, here also, granted the king a separate aid of 50,000 l. more for one year, towards carrying on the French war; for the raising of which extraordinary sum, from that body, the very chantry-priests were taxed according to their annual stipends; as likewise all other small benefices which had never been taxed before. A great council of the estates sat at Winchester on the 8th day after Trinity Sunday this year; and was, probably, a committee appointed by this last parl. to meet and settle the aforesaid Tax on Parishes. The king, immediately on the granting this subsidy, had sent out his writs to the sheriffs of every county in England, to cause them to return to him the number of the parish-churches in each shire. After which the chancellor acquainted this committee, "that the number of parishes in England would not answer the said tax of 50,000 l. as might appear by the certificates of all the abps. bps. and sheriffs, made and returned into chancery, by the king's warrant." These certificates were examined by the committee, and many treaties and conferences had upon the matter; at last, to complete the sum of 50,000 l. the said committee of lords and commons granted out of every parish in the kingdom, the sum of 110 s. the former sum of 22s. 3d. being included; except the county of Chester, which was a county palatine, and the church-lands, which were taxed to a 10th; and, as before, parishes of greater extent and value were to be contributory to the less. Stowe has preserved the list of the several counties of England, in which the number of parishes are mentioned and their several taxations fixed; which, since it is the first tax of that kind, that we have yet met with, well deserves our notice.

The sum, says Stowe, of all the shires in England, without the city of London, and the bishoprick of Durham be 37, and of parish churches 8600, and all the money amounted unto 50,181*l.* 8*s.* &c. Of the which was withdrawn 181*l.* 8*s.* by the reason that parishes in the county of Suffolk paid but 112*s.* 7*d.* And the parishes in the county of Devonshire paid but 112*s.* 10*d.* for their great poverty, and so was the king answered 50,000*l.*

The Petitions of the Commons, which were not answered in the preceding parl. were answered at this council. Amongst which the following is very remarkable:—"For that it had been declared to the king in the late parl. by all the earls, barons and commons of England, 'That the govt. of the kingdom had for a long time been managed by men of the church, whereby many mischiefs and damages had happened in time heretofore, to the disherison of the crown, and to the great prejudice of the kingdom:' that it would therefore please the king, that laymen of sufficient abilities, and no others, might for the future be made chanc. treasurer, clerk of the privy seal, barons of the exchequer, comptroller, or other great officers, and governors of the kingdom; and that this matter might be so established, that it should never be defeated, or any thing done to the contrary in time to come, saving to the king the removal and choice of such officers, yet so as they should be laymen.' The king's answer was, "He would do in this point what seemed best to him by advice of his council." Though the king was, as usual, very concise in his answer to this petition, yet we find that he thought of it afterwards; for in a little time, Wm. of Wickham, bp. of Winchester, and ld. chanc. of England, delivered up the great seal to the king at Westm. which was immediately given to sir Rob. Thorp, one of the king's judges in the law. At the same time Tho. Brentingham, bp. of Exeter, was removed from being lord treasurer; and was succeeded by Rd. lord Scroop of Bolton.

Before the king set out on his last expedition to France, he left his grandchild Richard, now only son to the black prince, a youth scarce seven years old, guardian of the realm; appointing him a council for the management of all public affairs. On the 1st of Sep. 1372, writs of summons were issued out, in the name of this young guardian, for a parl. to meet 15 days after Michaelmas. But before that time the king was returned into England, so that new writs were sent out, dated at Winchelsea, the 6th of Oct. by which he adjourned the said parl. to the 3d of Nov. following. The lords and commons being assembled in the white chamber at Westm. on the day appointed, sir Hy. Bryan acquainted them, "That the prince of Wales, having by a grant from his father enjoyed Guienne, he had often by letters, &c. signified to the king, that the revenues and profits, arising from that principality, did not, nor could suffice to maintain him and support the govt. and wars against the French their enemies, and other necessary charges, without a great assistance from the king; and that the prince having made these things appear to the king and council, when first he came into England, had therefore surrendered into the king's hands the said principality, and all he could claim there by virtue of his grant, in the presence of the king and lords of his council." The next day the said sir Henry, in the same place, and before the said assembly, more expressly declared the cause of their summons to this effect; "That the king, by advice of his parl. had ordered several commanders of note to go over, some into Gascoigny and others to Calais, to oppose the designs of his enemies, and to make war upon them by all the ways they could: but, that afterwards, upon the sudden news that came to the king of their march, he went himself to sea with the rest of his forces; yet by reason of the winds being contrary, and other unavoidable accidents, he was forced to return without doing any thing. That, after having summoned this present parl. he adjourned the same, in order that the lords who were with him at sea might be also there, that by the good advice and council of them all he might do the best he could for the safety of the nation; and resist and oppose the malice of his enemies, who had made themselves, by land and sea, much stronger than ever they were before. He desired therefore the prince, prelates, dukes, earls, barons and commons, on the king's behalf, that they would consult about this matter, and give him such council and aid, as should seem to them most profitable to the nation, and sufficient to reduce the power of his enemies." The prince, and all the rest of the estates, considering the great expence the king was to be at for the defence of the nation, and maintaining the war against his enemies, granted him the former subsidies on wool, leather and wool-fells, for 2 years longer, to begin at Michaelmas last past, viz. of every sack of wool that was shipped out of England, 2l. 3s. 4d. of every 12 score of wool-fells as much; of every last of leather 4l. of denizens, besides the old custom: of foreigners 4 marks on every sack besides the old custom; as much on every 12 score of wool-fells, and 5l. 6s. 8d. on every last of leather. But, whereas the said subsidy and custom so granted could not be sufficient for the great expence and charge the king was to be at, for the causes aforesaid; the said estates granted a 15th for one year, to be levied as the last. Then on the 23d of Nov. the said lords and commons again assembled in the white chamber, when the chanc. declared to the king, "How kind the parl. had been to him in granting him the said subsidies and 15th," who very heartily thanked them for their great aid: and then the petitions of the commons were read and answered according to custom. After which, the knights of shires had leave to depart, and sue out writs for their wages and expences, but the citizens and burgesses were commanded to stay. Whereupon, they being again assembled the same day before the prince, prelates, and lords, granted for the safe convoying of their ships and goods, a custom of 2s. on every tun of wine, imported or exported out of the kingdom, and 6d. in the pound on all their goods of Merchandize for one year. See Rot. Parl. 46. Ed. III. N. 1. 2. 3. 9.

On the 21st of Nov. 1373, another parl. met by summons at Westm. In the writs to the sheriffs were these unusual clauses, viz. "To cause to be chosen two dubbed knights, or the most worthy, honest, and discreet esquires of that county, the most expert in feats of arms, and no others; and of every city two citizens, of every borough two burgesses, discreet and sufficient, and such who had the greatest skill in shipping and merchandizing."—The king, prince, prelates, earls, barons, great men and commons, being assembled in the Painted Chamber, sir John Knivet, then ld. chanc. declared the cause of the summons, telling the lords and commons, "They knew very well that after the peace between the king and his adversaries of France, had been apparently broken by them, the king had many times sent great armies abroad to recover his rights, and to restrain the malice of his enemies; and, lately, had sent his son, the k. of Castile and Leon and d. of Lancaster, with many lords and others, to oppose the attempts of the French, who by their good and noble conduct, and feats of arms, had done great damages and destruction to his adversaries, as they well knew; to the no small honour of the king, and the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom. That besides the sum granted by the last parl. to the king in aid of these wars, great and heavy as it was upon the people, he had expended a great sum of his own more than that subsidy. Further, the lords and others who had ventured their lives and fortunes to defend them from their enemies, ought to be well refreshed and comforted with force and aid, and that with as much speed as possible, as was well known to many of this assembly who had been in the same condition themselves: also, that their enemy of France made himself as strong as he could, not only by his own people and allies, but by strangers of different countries, and by all the ways he was able, both by land and sea. Wherefore the king charged and besought them, considering the dangers that might happen to the kingdom for these causes, that they would speedily consult upon the matter, and give the king such advice as might be for the safety of him, the nation, and themselves. Lastly, the king told them by him, that this business required a very speedy dispatch; and that he desired that all manner of petitions, and other particular affairs, might be postponed until this had a good issue." After which, he commanded the commons to consider and give their advice, upon the points abovesaid; telling them, they might depart for that day, and come again in the morning.

During this consultation a committee of commons was sent to the lords, to desire they might have some bps. earls and barons, with whom they might confer, for the better issue of the matter enjoined them. They named the bps. of London, Winchester, and Bath and Wells, the earls of Arundele, March and Salisbury, and the lords Guy Brian and H. le Scroop; and it was agreed that they should go to the commons, and treat with them in the chamberlain's chamber. This consultation lasted till the 29th of Nov.; on which day the king, bps. lords and commons being again assembled, in the White-Chamber, the commons delivered to the king a schedule, containing an aid granted, which was read, beginning thus, "The lords and commons of England have granted to the king, in this present parl. a 15th &c." the substance of which grant was 2 15ths to be levied in 2 years; and if the war ended the 1st year, the 2d 15th not to be paid. Also, 6d. upon every pound value of merchandize going out of the kingdom, execept upon wool, leather, wool-fells, and wine; of every tun of wine 2s. for 2 years, on the same condition; likewise the subsidy on wool to be received after Michaelmas, without condition for the 1st year, but under the same condition for the 2d. These subsidies were granted on proviso, that no other charge or imposition should be laid upon the people for those 2 years. Lastly, the commons prayed, that what was granted might be spent in maintaining the wars; and that no 'knights of shires or esqrs. citizens or burgesses, returned for this parliament, might be collectors for this tax.'—See

Rot. Parl. 47 Edw. III. No. 4, 5. Cotton's Abridg. p. 116.

This schedule being delivered to the king was read before him, after which the commons requested an answer to their Petitions, which was promised; the chief whereof were these:—
P. That the great charter and charters of the forest be kept. A. It pleaseth the king.—
P. That the city of London, and all other cities and towns may enjoy their liberties, any statute notwithstanding. A. Let any shew the breaches in particular, and they shall be answered.—
P. That the Staple be kept in Calais, and no patent or grant be made to the contrary. A. The king will appoint the staple as to him and his council shall seem best.—
P. Certain counties there named do pray, that for their easier carriage of wools, a Staple may be at Lynn. A. The king granteth thereto, so that still the Staple at Yarmouth shall continue.—
P. That as for the tythe of wood above 20 years growth, it may be enacted, that no tythe shall be due, and that in all such cases a prohibition may be granted. A. Such prohibition shall be granted, as hath heretofore been used.—
P. That remedy may be had against the chirographer, because he will not engross any fine within the term, until the foot of the fine be fretted, unless he may have 3s. 4d. or 4s. more than his due fee of 4s. A. Let the aggrieved come to the common-pleas and he shall have right.—
P. That the Statute of Labourers may be executed 4 times in the year, and that the justices may be removed for not doing their duty. A. The king granteth thereto.—
P. That villenage may be only tried where it is laid, and no where else. A. The king meaneth not to alter the law as to this point.—
P. That masters of ships shall be paid their wages for them and their mariners, from the day of their being appointed to serve the king. A. The taking up of ships shall not be but upon necessity, and the payment shall be reasonable as heretofore.—
P. The said masters of ships request, that they may have allowance for the tackling of their ships worn out in the king's service. A. Such allowance hath not been made heretofore.—
P. The commons request remedy against the provisions of the pope, whereby he reaps the first fruits of ecclesiastical dignities; the treasure of the realm being thereby conveyed away, which they cannot bear. A. The king hath already honourable ambassadors at the court of Rome, touching these grievances, before whose return he cannot well answer as to that point.—
P. The burgesses of Bristol in this parl. require, that the said town, with the suburbs thereof, may be a county of itself; and that the perambulation of the same, with the bounds thereof returned into the chancery, with all the liberties and charters thereto granted, may be confirmed by act of parl. A. The king is content to grant, that the charters, liberties and perambulation aforesaid may be confirmed under the great seal.—
P. That remedy may be had, that men be not called into the exchequer upon suggestion without process, contrary to the statute made in the 42d of the king. A. Let any particular man complain and he shall find remedy.

After this, we meet with no parl. for near 4 years; when a truce, and treaty of peace upon it, obliged the king to call one, to have their advice on several important affairs. The writs of summons were dated Sept. 20th, to meet on the 12th Feb. following. But by other writs dated Jan. 20th, the king thought fit to prorogue this parl. to the latter end of April, 1376; at which time it met in the painted chamber, before the king, where sir John Knivet lord chanc. opened the sessions; which he declared was for the causes following; "The first, and principal, was to advise about the good government and peace of the realm. For the defence and safety of the king as well by sea as land. To take order for the maintenance of the war with France, and elsewhere; and how and in what manner it might be done, for the best profit, quickest dispatch, and greatest honour of the king and kingdom." He then expressly told them, that what the king had hitherto done was always with their advice and assistance, for which his maj. entirely thanked them; and desired that they would diligently consult about these matters, the prelates and lords by themselves, and the commons by themselves, and give in their answers as soon as they conveniently could.

The commons, upon this, went to their wonted place, the Chapter-house of the abbey of Westm. the prelates and lords went, also, by themselves, and there were assigned a committee of lords to go to the commons, to treat and confer about the king's declaration. The lords who were of this committee, were the bps. of London, Carlisle, and st. David's; the earls of March, Warwick, Stafford, and Suffolk; the lords Peirce, sir Guy de Brian, sir Hy. le Scrope and sir Rd. Stafford; who after due consultation with the commons, agreed upon a grant for a subsidy, the preamble to which ran as follows;

"The lords and commons assembled in parl. having consideration of the very great charges and expences the king hath, and must be at, for the maintaining of his wars, and his noble estate; grant him the subsidy of wool, leather and wool-fells, as it was granted him in the parl. holden at Westm. in the 47th of his reign, from the feast of st. Michael next coming, when the subsidy then granted ended, to the end of 3 years: and the commons humbly pray the king to excuse them, that they have given him no other subsidy or aid for his wars, for that they were brought so low, and so disabled by the pestilence, the murrain among their beasts, and destruction of their grain and other fruits by bad weather, that they could not do more at present; but promised if any extraordinary case should happen, they would aid him to the utmost of their power, as they had done before, beyond all the commons of the world, to their liege-lord."

After this, the commons, considering the great injury the nation had sustained by this long and expensive war, represented to the king and lords, in this parl. "That it would be for his honour and profit, as, also, that of the whole realm, which was grieved in divers manners by many adversaries, by the wars in France, Spain, Ireland, Brittainy and elsewhere; that the king's council may be augmented with some lords, prelates, and others, to the number of 10 or 12, who should be continually near the king; so as no great business might pass, without the advice and assent of 6, or 4 of them at least, as the case required." To this request the king provided, always, that the chan. treasurer, and privy-seal, might execute their offices, without the presence of any of the said counsellors; whom the king was to assign, from time to time, of such as he pleased, who were to be sworn to keep this Ordinance, to do right to every one according to their power, without receiving any reward for so doing. The rest of the king's officers were, also, to be sworn to receive no gifts, fees or rewards, other than their salaries, liveries, and travelling charges.

The commons then made Protestation, "That they now were and always have been, and will be ready to aid the king with their bodies and goods, to the utmost of their power; yet if the king had always had about him loyal counsellors and good officers, he had been now rich in treasure, so that he should not have needed so much to have charged his subjects with so great subsidies, or taillages, considering the vast sums of gold which were brought into the kingdom for the ransom of the kings of France and Scotland, and other prisoners." It further seemed to them, "That for the particular profit and advantage of some private persons about the king, and their confederates, the realm was much impoverished, and many of the merchants undone; wherefore they thought it very profitable to the king and his whole kingdom, to have all these things duly amended, so soon as might be." And farther the commons promised the king, "That if he would do justice and speedy execution, upon such as should be found culpable, and proceed with them as law and reason required, they would undertake he should be so rich as to be able to maintain his wars, and support his other affairs for a long time, without any great charge to the commons." They then propounded 3 especial points to be enquired into and amended: 1st. "Whereas the staple of wool, and other staple merchandises and bullion, was lately ordained in parl. to be at Calais, and no where else, for the great profit of the king and kingdom, the advantage and amendment of the town, for the concourse of merchants, and their continual residence there; the said staple, bullion and trade was removed from thence, and like to be lost by the procurement and council of the said particular persons about the king, and their confederates, for their own profit, to the great damage and prejudice of the king and his realm, and the destruction of the town of Calais. 2nd, Whereas the king had need of divers sums of money for his wars and otherwise; some persons by consent and contrivance of the said particular persons about him, made agreement for divers sums to the use of the king upon usury, taking more from him for interest than they bargained for, to the deceit and grievous damage of the king. 3rd. Whereas the king was debtor to divers people upon record in great sums, several had by assent and contrivance of the said persons bargained with his creditors for the 10th, 20th, or 100th penny; and procured the king to pay the whole debt, in deceit of the king and his creditors, for the particular profit of themselves and confederates." Upon these articles several were impeached by the commons; as Rd. Lyon, merchant of London and farmer of the king's subsidy, and the lord Latimer his confederate, who were imprisoned, and disfranchised, and rendered incapable of bearing any office under the king, or to approach his council or court, besides their goods and chattels being seized into the king's hands. The commons farther petitioned, "That justices of the peace might be named in every county by the lords and knights of the said county in parl. and sworn before the king's council, and not to be removed without consent of parl. and that they might be allowed wages." The king's answer was, "They should be named by him and his continual council; and as to wages, he would consider of it."

About this time, Alice Peirce, the king's mistress, had such an ascendancy over him, that she had the assurance not only to intermeddle with public affairs; but also to appear and sit in the courts of judicature, both civil and ecclesiastical, and publicly defend those causes she had undertaken to promote: and therefore for the great scandal and reproach it cast upon the king and his govt. in foreign countries, the commons had particularly petitioned for her removal from the king's person: though it seems this petition had no great effect, for not long after the dissolution of this parl. she was again restored to the king's favour, and to that degree, as to be revenged upon her enemies; for she procured sir Peter de la Mare to be committed close prisoner to Nottingham castle, where he lay till the beginning of the next reign; and that for no other reason, but because he had spoken too freely against this Alice Pierce in the late parl.

The king issued out writs for a parl. to meet the 27th of Jan. 1377, at Westm. But Edw. was then so old and infirm, as not to be able to appear; and a commission was granted to Rd. prince of Wales, who was then about 10 years of age, to hold the parl. in his stead. At the day of their meeting, in the painted chamber, the young prince sitting in the king's own seat, dr. Houghton, bp. of st. David's, ld. chanc. made a speech to the assembly, in the nature of a sermon, upon this text; "Ye suffer fools gladly, seeing that ye yourselves are wise." The application he made of his subject was, that, "They being wise desired to hear him who was the contrary." He proceeded with scripture, and said, "That as a messenger who bringeth joyful tidings is welcome, so ought he to be now, since he brought them the joyful news of the king's happy recovery from a dangerous sickness." From hence he took occasion to argue, That God loved the king and the realm; the king because, quos diligit castigat, whom the lord loveth he chasteneth; and further, from that of the psalmist, Uxor tua sicut vitis abundans in lateribus, thy wife shall be as the fruitful vine, &c. and from thence he shewed that no christian prince could be so happy; which happiness he exaggerated from another quotation, ut videas filios filiorum, thou shalt see thy children's children, which the king now had the pleasure to see. That God loved the realm he proved from the recovery of so renowned a prince; the said recovery happening in the 15th year of his reign; the year of Jubilee, the year of joy for his said recovery; of joy, because he would thereby impart unto his subjects blessings, as well spiritual as temporal, all bodily comforts. Then from a similitude, that although the head be sound, if some particular member of the body be diseased, the same infected part can receive no virtue, benefit, or remedy from the head; so he inferred that the king being now the sound head, and willing to shew grace and favour to his subjects, they ought to qualify themselves a-right by approving their loyalty sound and uncorrupted; and therefore he persuaded such, as would be partakers thereof, to conform themselves, by having love and charity, without which he proved, by st. Paul, nothing would avail." After the prelate had thus preached up loyalty to the whole audience, he addressed himself, particularly, to the lords, and told them, "what reason they had to think the king loved them dearly, since amongst other gracious tokens of his goodwill, he had, upon their requests, since the last parl. advanced the lord Richard, there present, to be prince of Wales. Then he proceeded to shew what cause they had to cherish the said prince, by offering unto him, as the wise men did to Christ, all honour, by presenting him gold, in token of riches and renown, and Myrrh in token of his honourable sceptre; since even the Pagans were used to throw abroad money at the approach of any of their princes." He insisted, "That the said prince should, without all rancour, be embraced with their hands and hearts, even as Simeon embraced Christ, because their eyes had now seen that which their hearts had much longed for; that they ought to obey him as the vicar and legate of God, that they might see the true peace of Israel, viz. here in England, the inheritance of God; of which many victories had assured him there was no small hope." Lastly, he declared the cause of summoning this present parl. to be,

"For that the French king, under colour of the truce, granted by the king at the mediation of the pope, yet enduring, had allied himself both to the Spaniards and Scots, the king's enemies, and had prepared great quantities of arms and powerful armies, thereby conspiring to blot out the English tongue and name from under heaven. In which case the king required their faithful council, and he prayed them to consult together for that purpose, that the king might have their answer as soon as possible. See Cotton's Abridgment, 51. Edw. III. 144, &c.

After the ld. chanc. had ended his harangue, he was seconded by sir Rob. Ashton, the king's chamberlain, and lord high treasurer of England, who said, "That he had a particular charge to move to them from the king, for the profit of the realm; that because divers usurpations were by the see of Rome made upon the king, his crown and realm, as by particular bill in this parl. should be declared, he required them to seek redress. Yet the king at the same time protested, that he was ready to do all that he ought, to satisfy his holiness about it." The commons were then desired to repair to the chapter-house of Westm. abbey, there to treat and advise how a fitting resistance might be made against the enemies of the nation, for the safety of the kingdom; and how money might be most speedily raised with the least grievance of the people. Certain lords, as before, were also named, from time to time, to confer with the commons, for their better direction and information.

The result of these consultations was, that to maintain the king's wars, and the great charge he would be at for them, and the necessary defence of the kingdom, the lords and commons granted him 4d. by way of poll from every person of the kingdom, male and female, above 14 years of age, except mere beggars; and most humbly prayed their liege lord, "That he would please to excuse them that they could grant him no greater subsidy, being most willing to have done it; but that they were so impoverished of late by great losses, at sea, and otherwise, that they were not able at present to do more." And the commons prayed the king, "That he would please to name 2 earls and 2 barons for his treasurers, as well of this subsidy, as of that the clergy was yet to grant; and also of the late subsidy of wool, pells, and leather, granted the last parl. and that they might be sworn in their presence, that what was received by them, should wholly be expended upon the wars, and not otherwise; and that the high treasurer of England should receive nothing, or any ways meddle therein. But afterwards, when they had considered what sum the wages of such 4 treasurers would amount unto by the year, the commons departed from this request, and prayed, "That the high treasurer might be receiver to the use of the war, in manner accustomed."

The commons in this parl. farther besought

the king, "That a charter lately granted in the great council, to the mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, upon the article, "That no foreign merchant ought to sell to another strange merchant any goods or merchandise, to sell again, in manner as in the said patent is more fully contained," might be renewed and granted, as well to other cities and boroughs, as to them, with a charter, or clause of confirmation." The answer to which was, that, "The king will be farther informed."

At the same time the commons, with the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of the city of London, petitioned the king, "That whereas divers mischiefs often happened in the said city, by reason the coroner was not punishable by the mayor, aldermen, and other officers; that they might chuse a coroner of themselves, and remove him when they pleased, as it was practised in divers cities and towns of the land, they answering to the king in manner as appertained to the said office." The king's answer was, "The king will not depart from his ancient rights." And they farther petitioned in this case, "That all provisors of benefices from Rome, with their officers or servants, may be put out of the king's protection, if they sue, prosecute, or any ways disturb, or cause to be excommunicated the true patrons." The answer was, "The pope had promised redress, and if he makes it not, the laws in this case shall be in force."

Mr. Prynne, the publisher of sir Rob. Cotton's "Abridgment," has added a remark of his own, with which we shall conclude our account of this parl. "The prelates, dukes, earls, barons, commons, citizens, burgesses, and merchants of England, in this parl. petition the king, not only "for a pardon in general, and of all fines and amerciements before the justices of the peace, not yet levied in special;" which this "Abridgment" only toucheth, but they likewise subjoin thereto this memorable request (totally omitted by the abridger) which I thought meet here to supply, "That in time to come your said prelates, earls, barons, commons, citizens, and burgesses of your realm of England, may not be henceforth charged, molested, nor grieved to make any common aid, or sustain any charge, unless it be by common assent of the prelates, dukes, lords and barons, and other people of the commons of your realm of England, and that in full parl.; nor no imposition put upon their wools, wool-fells, and leather, or any the ancient custom; that is to say, of one sack of wool half a mark, and of 300 wool-fells half a mark; and of one last of skins one mark of custom only, according to the statute made the 14th year of your reign; saving to you the subsidy granted unto you the last parl. for a certain time, and not yet levied." To which last clause the king then gave this answer, "As to the clause, that no charge be laid upon the people without the commons assent; the king is not at all willing to do it, without great necessity, and for the defence of the realm, and where he may do it with reason. And as to the clause, that impositions be not laid upon their wools without assent of the prelates, dukes, earls, barons, and other people of the commons of this realm; there is a statute already made, which the king wills that it should stand in force."

Taxes in the Reign of Edward III.

In his 6th year he had granted him a 15th by the counties, and a 10th by the cities and burghs for one year. In his 8th year he had the same, and a 10th granted by the clergy. In his 10th year he had the same tax from laity and clergy. In his 11th year he had a 3-years 10th given him by the clergy in convocation, a 3-years 10th given him by the citizens and burgesses in parl.; and also a 3-years 15th to maintain the war then begun with France, and to pay the Germans, Brabanters, and other confederates on the borders of Germany, against the king of France. In his 13th year the Great Men gave him the 10th sheaf of all manner of grain of their demesne lands, except of their bond tenants, with the 10th fleece and the 10th lamb. Then a parl. was summoned to meet 8 days after st. Hilary, or 20th of Jan. in which the commons gave the king 30,000 sacks of wool. In his 14th year, the prelates, earls, barons, for themselves and their tenants, the knights of counties for themselves and the commons of the land, granted to the king the 9th sheaf, fleece, and lamb; but the citizens and burgesses gave the 9th of all their goods, according to the true value, for two years next coming; and those that lived not in cities and boroughs, nor lived upon tillage or shop-trades, paid the 15th of all their goods, according to the true value. Upon the king's writing to the parl. for speedy supply, seeing the 9ths could not be levied time enough for his service, the lords and commons agreed to have 20,000 sacks of wool speedily provided. In his 15th year the 9ths were revoked, in respect of this grant of 20,000 sacks of wool. In his 18th year, the clergy of the province of Canterbury granted a 3-years 10th, and the knights of counties gave two 15ths and two 10ths of cities and boroughs; and afterwards the commons granted another 15th. The lords promised to go with the king in person, and therefore gave nothing. In his 21st year, the commons granted two 15ths, to be levied in two years in cities, boroughs, and ancient demesnes, as also of the commons of the counties. In his 22nd year, the commons granted three 15ths, to be levied in 3 years; so as one 15th was to be levied in each year, and no more. In his 26th year the Great Men of the realm and the commonalty granted the king three 10ths, to be paid in 3 years. In his 27th year the king made it his request, that the prelates, great men, and commons would grant him the subsidy of wool-fells and leather for some time; to which prayer they unanimously consented, and granted that subsidy in manner as it had been received before that time for 3 years. In his 29th year the commons came into the presence of the king, prelates, and great men, assembled in the White-Chamber; and having there a short conference with the great men, granted unanimously the subsidy of wool, leather, and wool-fells for 6 years next coming; so as during that time no other impositions or charges be put upon the said commons. In his 36th year the great men and commons granted unto the king, of every sack of wool transported 20s. of every 300 wool-fells 20s. and of every last of leather 40s. besides the ancient custom of half a mark a sack of all denizens, and 10s. of strangers; and one mark for every last of leather of denizens, and 20s. of strangers, for 3 years. In his 42nd year the prelates and great men, having had full deliberation with the commons, granted the subsidy of wool, wool-fells, and leather for 2 years; of every sack of wool, and every twelve score wool-fells, 36s. 8d. of every last of leather 4 pounds, besides the ancient custom as before. In his 43d year the lords and commons granted to him the subsidy as above for 3 years; of every sack of wool 43s. 4d. which passed beyond sea; of every twelvescore wool-fells as much, and of every last of leather 4 pounds, besides the ancient custom; of strangers, for every sack of wool 4 marks, of every twelvescore wool-fells 4 marks, and of every last of leather 8 marks, besides the ancient custom. In his 45th year the great men and commons granted a subsidy of 50,000l. to be levied of every parish of the land 22s. 3d. so as the parishes of greater value should contribute rateably to those of less value. This 22s. 3d. answered not the sum of 50,000l. and therefore not long after at Winchester, the great men and commons granted 110s. out of every parish, the 22s. 3d. being comprised in it; so as the parishes of greater value should contribute to those of less. In his 46th year the lords and commons granted for 2 years the subsidy on wool, leather, and wool-fells, as it was granted in the 43rd year. And for that this subsidy proved not sufficient for the king's expences, they granted a 15th for one year, to be levied as the last was. Besides this, the citizens and burgesses in this parl. for the safe convoying of their ships and goods, granted 2s. upon every tun of wine, and 6d. in the pound of all goods for a year. In his 47th year the lords and commons granted a 15th, as it had been in ancient manner levied for 2 years; they also gave tonnage and poundage for 2 years, as it was given the last year, of all merchandises exported and imported, except of wool, wool-fells, and leather, and then granted the subsidy of them for the next year coming. In his 50th year the lords and commons granted the subsidy of wool, leather, and wool-fells, for 3 years, as it had been granted in his 47th year. In his 51st year the lords and commons granted him 4d. of every person of the kingdom, males and females, above the age of 14, except very beggars; and then they desired to be excused that they could give no greater subsidy, because of their present grievous necessities. See Rot. Parl. and T. Wykes.

Towards forming some idea of the amount of these subsidies, we shall exhibit the following account of the Price of provisions in this King's reign.

In 1326, at Tunbridge, in Kent, 70 acres of arable land was worth 35s. per an.; 12 hens at 1s. 6d.; 1 cock and 13 hens, at 1s. 7d.; 8 porkers and a half, at 15s.; 80 acres of arable, at 20s. or 3d. per acre; 20 acres of pasture, each at 1d.; 14 acres of meadow, each at 4d.; 18 acres of arable, each at 3d.; 27 acres of arable, each at 4d.; 2 acres of meadow, each at 10d.; a cock 1d.; 3 hens, 4½d. From hence we may see, that we can make no certain computation from the rate of acres, because of the difference of the grounds. (See Lambard's Perambulation of Kent, p. 541.) In 1336, there was such plenty of corn, and scarcity of money, says Knyghton, that wheat was sold at London, by the qr. at 2s.; a fat ox, at 6s. 8d.; and Fabian adds, for a fat sheep, 6d.; and at most 8d.; 6 pigeons, 1d.; a fat goose, at 2d.; a pig, 1d.; and all other victuals after the same rate; occasioned by the king's gathering up all the money he could get, to carry on his wars in France and Scotland. In 1338, wheat sold per qr. at 3s. 4d.; barley, at 10d.; pease and beans, the qr. at 1s.; oats, the qr. at 10d. In 1339, several undertakers promised to deliver at the town of Berwick, and in Leith Road, 10,000 qrs. of wheat and malt, each qr. at 9s.; oats, beans, and pease, each qr. at 5s. This was a high price. (See Collin's Abridgement.)—In 1343, two oxen, price of each 8s. In 1344, one cow sold at 5s. (See Kennet's Paroch. Antiq.)—In 1348, in the time of the pestilence, things were sold almost for nothing. A horse worth 40s. was sold for 6s. 8d.; a good fat ox, at 4s.; a cow, at 1s.; an heifer, or steer, at 6d.; a fat mutton, at 4d.; an ewe, at 3d.; a lamb, at 2d.; a hog, at 5d.; a stone of wool, at 9d. The historian says, they were not only afraid of the cattle's dying, but of their own, for, otherwise, wool need not have been so cheap. (See Knyghton, Col. 2599.)—In 1349, corn was so plentiful, and other provisons, that wheat was sold, by the qr. at 2s.; a fat ox, at London, for 6s. 8d.—In 1359, wheat was very dear, a qr. says Fabian, was sold at 1l. 6s. 8d.—In 1361, wheat was so cheap, that a qr. was sold at 2s.; 2 hens, for 1d.—In 1363, a widow paid 4 hens, or in money 4d.; 12 hogs, at 18s. each hog, at 1s. 6d. Yet wheat was so dear, says Walsingham, that a qr. was sold at 15s.—In 1369, Walsingham says, there was such a dearth, that wheat was sold at 1l. 4s.; and, according to Stow, at 1l.; barley, at 16s. 4d.; oats, at 8s.

The cause of the summons was declared by the abp. of Canterbury, in a speech beginning with this text, Rex tuus venit tibi. Which subject, he divided into three parts, saying, "That for three causes every friend ought to be welcome to another: 1st. if he came to rejoice or be merry with his friend for any singular benefit or good hap that had befallen him; and therefore made use of this odd expression, for a male friend, Et exultavit infans in utero ejus. The next was, if the said friend came to comfort another in adversity, as is mentioned in the book of Job. And the last, for trying his friend in the time of adversity, according to the scripture, In necessitate probabiter amicus."—To this preface he applied, "That the king, their undoubted liege lord was now come unto them, not for one, but for all the three causes. For the 1st, to rejoice with them in the great Providence and grace of God, by sending his person amongst them; not by any collateral means, or election, but by special descent of inheritance; and for their good wills towards him, he was therefore come to give them thanks." For the 2nd, "To visit and comfort them in their necessities and adversities, he was also come, not only for the death of the noble king Edw. and the prince his son, but also for the great losses which they had sustained on the sea coasts, and elsewhere within the realm by their enemies. Whereunto, he now was come, not only to proffer himself in aid, but to confirm all their liberties; to maintain the laws and peace of the kingdom, and to redress all that was to the contrary." Thirdly, "To try or assay them, he was also come to advise and council with them for suppressing the enemy; and to require an aid of them, without which he could not perform the same. For all which reasons he desired them to consult together."

The next day, being again assembled, sir Rd. le Scroop, steward of the king's household, by the king's command, told the commons, "That he desired they would advise him which way his and the kingdom's enemies might be resisted, and how the expences of such resistance was to be born, with the greatest ease to the people, profit, and honour to the kingdom."—The commons, hereupon, prayed the king, "That for the great importance of the charge given them, in these declarations, and for the weakness of their abilities to advise the best, he would be pleased to let certain prelates and lords be joined with them in consultation on such weighty affairs, for the more speedy and happy dispatch of the business, wherewith they were charged." And named the duke of Lancaster, the bps. of London, Ely, Rochester and Carlisle; the earls of March, Arundel, Warwick and Angus; the lord Nevile, sir Hy. de Scroop, sir Rd. le Scroop, and sir Rd. de Stafford; which was accordingly granted by the king in parliament.

[Duke of Lancaster complains of the Commons.]

Upon this, the duke of Lancaster immediately arose from his place, and falling upon his knees before the king, humbly prayed his maj. to hear him a little in a weighty cause which greatly concerned himself, and said, "That though the commons had chosen him for one of the lords to commune with them on the matters in the charge, yet he desired his maj. to excuse him, for that the commons had spoken ill of him; urging, that he had committed manifest treason, if their report, which God forbid, was true. That he had been always careful to guard himself against any such imputations, as it was notoriously known that none of his ancestors, of one side or other, was ever a traitor, but always firm and loyal; and it was a marvellous thing he should deviate from the line, since he had more to lose than any other man in the kingdom. That if any man, of what estate and condition soever he was, should be so bold as to lay treason, or other disloyalty to his charge, or any other thing done by him prejudicial to the kingdom, he was ready to defend himself by his body, or otherwise, as the king and lords should award, as if he was the poorest knight batchelor of the realm."—The duke having ended his speech, the bps. and all the lords stood up, and with one voice prayed him, that he would leave off such discourses, for they thought no man living would say any such things of him. The commons also said, in their own defence, "That it was apparent and notorious they thought him free from all blame and defamation, and had given an evident proof of it in chusing him to be their principal aider, comforter, and counsellor in this parl. praying with one voice, to have themselves cleared from such reports."—The duke replied again, "That the words had been long, though falsely, spread about the kingdom; and that he wondered much how any man could or would begin, or continue such slanders, for the disgrace and danger that might from thence ensue. Because, the first inventor of such speeches, by which debate might arise between the king and the peers of the land, was a manifest traitor; since such debates might turn to the destruction of the whole kingdom. He therefore prayed that a good act, or ordinance, might be provided in this parl. and a just and speedy punishment assigned to all the inventors of such evil reports, for the preventing the danger of them for the time to come: and as to himself, he declared that for what was past all should be forgiven."

[A Speaker chosen.] After these altercations were thus ended, the commons proceeded to business; and sir Peter de la Mare, knight of the shire for Herefordshire, being chosen Speaker of the commons, and the first upon record, (see Cotton's Abridgment, p. 155), made a protestation and said, "That what he had to declare was from their whole body; and therefore required that if he should happen to speak any thing, without their consents, that it ought to be amended before his departure from the said place. He commended the feats of chivalry heretofore practised, for which this nation was so renowned; and said, that by the decay of the same, the honour of the realm did and would daily decrease. That whereas merchants were masters of their own ships, and had the free disposition of them, yet, formerly, one town had more good ships than the whole nation at this time." He therefore prayed that, "Because the king was of tender age, for the amendment of several errors in the government, and the preservation of the realm, which was at that time in greater danger than ever, the king and lords of parl. would consider, more especially, of three things:—1st. That they would in that parl. name and appoint 9 persons, of the different estates, to be continual counsellors to the king for the affairs of the realm, along with the king's other state officers; and that they might be such persons as best knew how to avert impending dangers, and would diligently attend to their charge, for the good govt. and preservation of the realm; and that the commons might have the names of those counsellors, who also might be the agents and directors of what money was to be given for the wars:—2nd. That they would please to name and appoint those that were to be about the king's person, who were to be men of virtuous and honest conversation, that they might educate him accordingly; and that the charge of the king's household might be borne by the revenues of the crown, so that what was granted to the wars might be expended that way only:—3rd. That the common law and other statutes and ordinances of the land might be observed, ratified, and confirmed, and the people governed by them; and that they might not be defeated by the singularity of any about the king, saving, however, in all things the regalities and dignity of the king, to which the commons would have no prejudice done any way by their demands."—The answer which was given to these petitions was, "That the prelates and lords would advise together," commanding the commons, in the mean while, to return to their place.

The 1st request of the commons being recited before the king and lords, was by them granted; yet so as the chancellor, treasurer, and keeper of the privy seal, justices of one bench and the other, and all others officers of the realm, might execute their offices, without the presence of those counsellors, who by advice of the lords were then appointed, being 9 in number, viz. the bps. of London, Carlisle, and Salisbury, the earls of March and Stafford, sir Rd. de Stafford, and sir H. Le Scroop, bants. sir John D'Evereux, and sir Hugh Segrave, knights bachelors; who being thus chosen in council for this year, were sworn before the king himself, to do what they were chosen for, in the presence of divers lords in parl. As to the 2nd request, the lords of parliament answered, "That it seemed to them for many causes too heavy and hard a request to place any person about the king, that should not be acceptable to him; or to remove any officer, or servant, if it were not by his express will, and for some notable fault to be proved against such officers and servants; wherefore the lords would not willingly meddle with these matters."—To the other part of this request, the lords answered, "That they would take good deliberation, and speak with the great officers of the king's household about it, and if by their advise it could be done, saving the state and honour of the king, what they desired should be performed."—As for the 3rd petition it seemed reasonable to all the lords that it should be granted.

[A Subsidy granted.] Then the lords and commons granted the king two 15ths without cities and boroughs, and two 10ths within cities and boroughs for two years; praying the king, that as well the money of the said 10ths and 15ths, as the 10ths granted by the clergy, and money of the subsidy of wool, might be in the keeping of special treasurers by his own appointment, which were Wm. Walworth and John Philpot, merchants of London, who were to give an account of their receipts and disbursements, in manner as the king and council should order.

[Alice Pierce banished.] In this parl. Alice Pierce, the late king's mistress, was brought before the lords, and accused of procuring a pardon for Rd. Lyon (who, in the 50th year of Edw. III. had been convicted of embezzling the public money) and other high crimes, of which, being found guilty, she was sentenced to be banished, and her estates confiscated. But with this proviso, "that this law, particularly made for the prevention of such odious things, should not be made use of, nor drawn into example, against any other person, or in any other case."

[Petitions of the Commons.] The following are the most remarkable petitions presented to the king.—The commons prayed, "That because the late king Edward was guided by evil counsellors, as had been authentically proved, that they might be removed from all the king's councils; and that other fit persons might be put in their places; and further, that no officers of the king's court, great or small, do keep up quarrels or suits in the country by Maintenance, nor meddle with any thing, but what belongs to their office."—As to the 1st request, the king granted it; and as to the 2nd, touching Maintenance, he further enforced it, by strictly forbidding any counsellor, officer, or other servant, or others belonging to him, in the kingdom, to uphold any quarrel or suit by Maintenance, under pain of losing their offices and services, and to be imprisoned, and ransomed at the king's pleasure.—Another Petition was, "That during the king's minority, the chancellor, high treasurer, chief justices of one bench and the other, the chief baron of the exchequer, the steward and treasurer of the household, the chief chamberlain and clerk of the privy-seal, the wardens of the forests on this side Trent and beyond, might be made by parliament; and if it should happen, that any of these ministers or officers should be laid aside, between one parl. and another, that then another be put in his place, by the king's council, until the next parl. should meet. This Petition was likewise granted in part, that while the king was under age, the counsellors, chancellor, steward of the household, and chamberlain, should be all chosen by the lords in parl. saving always the estate and heritage of the earl of Oxford, to the office of chamberlain; and as to the other officers above named, the king should make them by the assent of his council. Then the citizens of London desired, "that upon the king's special grace, and for the enlargement of the Franchises of their city, if any article in the charter granted by him and his progenitors, to the said citizens, should prove difficult or doubtful, and might be taken in divers senses, that then the sense they claimed to have it in, should be allowed." To this the answer was, "that the interpretation of the king's charters belonged to him: and if any doubt arose thereupon, the king, by advice of his council, would make such interpretation, as should be according to reason and good faith." The commons prayed, further, "That a parl. might be holden in a convenient place once a year to redress delays in suits, and to end such causes wherein the judges were of different opinions." Answer, "The statutes made for that purpose shall be observed and kept; and as to the place where the parliament shall be holden the king will have the choice."

[A new Parliament called.] On the 16th of Feb. 1378, writs were issued out to call a new parl. to meet at Westminster on the 25th of April. At the day appointed, the duke of Lancaster, with several bps. and lords, came to the palace at Westm. and attended the king's coming for a long time; but some sheriffs having not yet made their returns, the parl. was adjourned to next day; and for the same reason, on that day, it was put off to the following. On which day, being April 27, sir Rd. le Scroop, lord chancellor, opened the session with a speech to this purport:—"1st. That the king desired the liberty of the church might be maintained. Next, that at the end of the last parl. his majesty, according to their request, had elected several lords and others to be of his continual council; but, by reason of the sudden breaking up of that parl. he was not advised what number they would have chosen of the latter. Yet, what were being sworn, they, with the lords consulted about the affairs of the realm, and the great danger it was in; and considering the great charges necessary to support it, they would not fully determine without the advice of parl. However, they agreed to prepare a land army, and a navy of ships, and lent the king great sums of money to that purpose. Which navy and army his maj. had prepared, and by that means was become indebted to them, and to several good cities and towns for the same loan. Therefore he desired the lords and commons, separately, to weigh well the necessities of the nation, and to provide accordingly; and not to wonder at the sudden calling of this parl. considering that it was done for the king's honour and the safety of the realm." The chancellor concluded with saying, "That for the expences borne and to be borne, the treasurers of the same were ready, and should be ready, to exhibit their accounts."

[A Poll-Tax granted.] The lords and commons taking into consideration the alarming state of the nation, agreed that the mark laid upon every sack of wool, and the 6d. in the pound for all merchandize, which was given in the last parl. should be remitted; and in lieu thereof they granted the old subsidy on wool, as it was before that parl. for one year from Michaelmas next. They likewise granted a certain poll-tax, to be paid by persons of different sexes, ranks, estates, and degrees in the kingdom; which being a tax quite new, and the act itself expressing, very particularly, what sum each man or woman should pay, as well as the several qualities and conditions of the whole English nation, in those days, we shall give, at length, as translated from the original French in dr. Brady's Appendix.

"The dukes of Lancaster and Bretagne, each 10 marks. Also, every earl of England, 4l. The countesses, who were widows, the same as the earls, 4l. Every baron, banneret, or knight, who had as good an estate as the barons, 40s. Every baroness, who is a widow, as a baron; and a banneress as a banneret, 40s. Every bachelor and every esq. who by estate ought to be made a knight, 20s. Every widow that was the wife of a bachelor, or esq. 20s. Every esq. of less estate, 4s. 7d. Every woman, widow of such an esq. or sufficient merchant, 6s. 8d. Every esq. without possessions, lands, rents or goods, that is in service, or bears arms, 3s. 3d. The chief prior of the hospital of st. John, as a baron, 40s. Every commander of the same order of England, as a bachelor, 20s. Every other brother, knight of the same order, 13s. 4d. All other brothers of the same order, as an esq. without possessions, 3s. 4d. Every justice, as well of the one bench, as of the other, and the chief baron of the exchequer, each, 100s. Every serjeant and great apprentice of the law, 40s. Other apprentices which follow the law, 20s. All other apprentices of less estate, and attorneys, each 6s. 8d. The mayor of London shall pay as an earl, 4l. The aldermen of London, each as a baron, 40s. All other mayors of great towns in England, each as a baron, 40s. Other mayors of smaller towns, according to the value of their estate, 20s. 10s. or 6s. 8d.

And all jurats of good towns, and great merchants of the realm, shall pay as bachelors, each, 20s. Other sufficient merchants, 8s. 4d. All lesser merchants, and artificers, husbandmen, or who live upon tillage according to the value of their estate, 4s. 8d. 3s. 4d. 2s. 12d. or 6d. Every serjeant and freeman of the country, according to their estate, 6s. 8d. or 40d. The farmers of manors, parsonages and granges, merchants of beasts, and other buyers and sellers, according to their estate, 6s. 8d. 40d. 2s. or 12d. All advocates, notaries, and proctors, who are married, shall pay as serjeants of the law, and apprentices of the law, and attorneys, each according to their estate, 40s. 20s. or 6s. 8d. Apparitors that are married, according to their estate, 3s. 4d. 2s. or 12d. All inn-keepers that have not the estate of a merchant, shall pay according to his estate, 40d. 2s. or 12d. Every married man, for himself and his wife, that have not the estates above-named, and above the age of 16, except very beggars, 4d. And every man and woman unmarried, of such an estate, and above the age aforesaid, 4d. Also every strange merchant, of what condition soever, shall pay according to his ability, as other denizens." Walsingham and Knyghton also tell us, that the clergy were not exempt from this tax, but, according to their own custom, taxed themselves very high, viz. every abp. bp. and mitred abbot as much as a baron; every abbot was to pay 40d. for each monk in his monastery; and the beneficed clergy 6s. 8d.

[A new Parliament called.] Another parl. was summoned to meet on the 20th of Oct. 1378 at Gloucester; but though this parl. met on the day appointed, yet no business was begun till the day following. When, being all assembled, the king with his three uncles, of Lancaster, Cambridge and Buckingham, the two abps. prelates, lords and commons, in the great hall of the abbey of Gloucester; dr. Houghton, bp. of st. David's, then lord chanc. declared the cause of the summons to be;— "1st, for the liberties of the church, the maintenance of the laws and observations of the peace; 2nd, because it had been enacted, that a parl. should be holden once a year; 3rd, because that his maj. desired to see and consult with so honourable an assembly, as was there gathered in God's name, and he commended unity and concord amongst them according to the resemblance of the church. Another great cause was, that the king, being left in the midst of great wars, could neither endure nor maintain the same without their aid and assistance. That since the great mischief and damage done by the Scots, about Roxborough, though the truce still subsisted, they had allied themselves with France against England, in order to annoy us. All which required their utmost consideration to prevent. He reminded them of two evils, 1st, that the law of the land and the law of arms do not concur together; and with certain similitudes required them, of those two laws, to make a relative, so as each may stand with the other. The next was to provide a remedy against slanders, and sowers of discord between nobles, gentlemen and neighbours; which kind of men he resembled to dogs that devour raw flesh, since they eat and consume living men. For all which enormities he wished them to seek redress; and to be there the next day by eight o'clock, to hear further declarations; and directed the commons to consult in the chapter-house of the abbey aforesaid." The next day sir Rd. le Scroope, then steward of the household, enlarged upon the causes of calling this parl. and, excusing his own inability, told the prelates, lords and commons, "That the nation was encompassed with enemies, which daily increased. That the ports of Cherburgh and Brest, which of a long time had been in the hands of the English, besides Calais, Bourdeaux and Bayonne, with the adjacent territories, were very chargeable to maintain, since Calais, with its marches all limits about it, cost the king 24,000l. every year, Brest 12,000 marks, and the other 3 places according to the same rate."

[A Speaker chosen.] We now come to the second instance on record, where a Speaker of the house of commons is expressly named as such, and recognized by the king in somewhat the same form as is done at this day. For immediately after the lord chanc. and sir Rd. le Scroop had ended their harangues, sir Js. Pickering, having been elected Speaker of the house of commons, came with the whole body of them before the king, prelates and lords, in parl. and there made protestation, as well for the whole commons of England, as for himself, to this effect:—"First, if he should utter any thing to the prejudice, damage, slander or disgrace of the king or his crown, or in lessening the honour or estates of the great lords, it might not be taken notice of by the king; and that the lords would pass it by, as if nothing had been said; for the commons highly desired to maintain the honour and estate of the king, and the rights of the crown; as also to preserve the reverence due to the lords in all points. Then, as for his own person, he made protestation, that if by indiscretion he spoke any thing by common assent of his fellow members, it might, either then or afterwards, be amended by them." He then rehearsed, briefly, the articles given them in charge: "And first, as to the liberties and franchises granted to holy church, and for the king's promise of entirely preserving the good laws and customs of his kingdom, and punishing such as should act against them; the commons humbly thanked him with their whole hearts, kneeling upon the ground, and praying God they might be put in due execution. That, as to the aid the king demanded of his commons for the defence and safety of his kingdom, and for the safeguard of his lordships, lands, towns and forts beyond sea, and toward his wars, the commons said, that in the last parl. in his first year, the same things were shewn unto them in behalf of the king, at which time they answered, it was apparent the king had not so great need for an aid, seeing he had in his hands the priories alien, the subsidies of wool, the revenues of the crown, the lands of the prince his father, and many other great lordships, by the non-age of the heirs of them; and that therefore they still conceived there must be great plenty of money in the treasury." To this the king's council in parl. then answered, "That the late charge of the coronation had been very great, and that the money upon those funds they mentioned came in very slowly, nor could they be collected soon enough for an expedition that year; and it was then further proposed, that if the commons would furnish the king with a great sum of money to make such an expedition as might be for the destruction of his enemies, they (the council) hoped he might have money sufficient hereafter from time to time to maintain the war, and defend the kingdom without them." To this the commons replied, "that in hopes of that promise to be discharged of all tallages for a long time, they had granted a greater sum than had ever been given to any king to be levied in so short a time; and that all things considered, it seemed to the commons that there must needs be a great sum in the treasury, besides what had been expended in the last voyage; so that the king had no need to charge the commons, who were in a lower condition than ever, by reason of that payment, and also by the murrain among their cattle, and their enemy's burnings and depredations upon the sea-coasts; that their corn and cattle were at so low a rate, that no money could be raised at present; whereupon they prayed the king to excuse them, as not being able to bear any further charge of mere poverty." To all which sir Rd. le Scroop replied, by making protestation, "that he knew of no such promise made by the king in the last parl. and, saving the honour and reverence due to the king and lords, what the commons said was not true; and as to the subsidy last granted, that a great part of it was still in the treasury; to wit, of the two 15ths and two 10ths; but as to the wool that had been given in that parl. he vouched the testimony of Win. Walworth and John Philpot, who by their consent were appointed receivers of the same, that every penny thereof was expended upon the war, and that none of it came to the high treasurer of England, or any other, to the use of the king: that the revenues of the crown, considering the annuities and other charges upon them, granted by his father and grandfather, were so small, that without the customs of wool, and lands of the priors aliens, the honour and estate of the king could not be maintained; and therefore they were to know, that according to reason they ought to relinquish their complaint." Whereupon the commons, after a short deliberation, made it their request to the king, "that he would please to shew them how, and in what manner, the great sums given for the war had been expended; and also that he would please to let them know the names of such as should be the great officers of the kingdom, and who were to be his counsellors and governors of his person (being yet of tender age) for the next year, as it had been before ordained in parl." To which it was answered on behalf of the king, by the said sir Richard, "that though there never was any account yet given of subsidies, or any other grants made in parl. or out of parl. to the commons, or any other, but to the king and his officers; yet that the king willed and commanded of his own motion, to please the commons, (not that it was of right for him so to do, or that he was obliged to it, only by reason of their request now made,) that William Walworth then present, with some of his council, assigned thereunto by him, should in writing clearly shew them the receipts and expences, so as it should not be drawn into an example for the future. As to the officers, the king had caused them to be chosen by the advice of the lords; and as to his counsellors, they should be such as pleased him, whose names he would shortly give them in writing. That the king not only commanded them, but all the lords there present desired, that having due consideration of the great and apparent dangers on all sides, they would provide for the defence of the kingdom; which not only concerned the king, but all and every one of them, and therefore to consider how the war might be maintained; and that they would give as speedy an answer as they could, that the parl. might have an end, and good effect; for the ease of the king, the lords, and themselves, as also for the profit of the kingdom, and discharge of the poor commons, that every day paid their expences during the parl." This was one of the principal charges given the first day: another was, "that if any fault was found in any part of the kingdom or government, in the laws or any other manner, that they would bring in their petitions concerning it, and they should have due remedy."

[Petitions of the Commons.] Then the commons desired "to have a time limited to bring in their common bills or petitions, and that it might be prolonged to the feast of All-Souls next coming." Also the commons prayed the king "to have a copy of the enrolment of the subsidy of 15ths and 10ths, as they had been entered upon the roll of parl. for them to advise upon:" and this was granted at the king's pleasure, and not upon their request. They prayed likewise, "that 5 or 6 prelates and lords might come to the commons, to treat with them about their charge;" but the lords answered, "they neither ought nor would do it in that manner, which had never been seen but in the three last parliaments; for the custom was for the lords to choose a small number of 6 or 10, and the commons as many of themselves, to treat together without noise; and then report what they had done to their companions, of one part, and the other; and according to this method the lords would act, and no otherwise." To this the commons assented, to proceed as had anciently been used.

After the commons had seen and examined the enrolment, receipts, and expences, they were well satisfied with them, as being honourable for the king and kingdom; and only said, "that 46,000*l.* which was expended in keeping several countries, places, and fortresses, as the marshes of Calais, Brest, and Cherburgh, Gascoigny, and Ireland, was not to be charged upon them; nor, as it seemed to them, were they bound to bear any foreign charge." To which it was answered by the king's council, "that Gascoigny and the forts beyond sea were barbicans, and as it were out-works and defences to England; and if they were well guarded, and the sea well kept, the kingdom would be quiet, otherwise it could not be so." The commons then proposed, "that this charge be defrayed by the goods and estate of Edw. III. which the king possessed, and was much enriched by it." Whereunto it was answered, "that those goods were justly appraised, and delivered to those his grandfather was indebted, except some necessities reserved for his own house, for which he had paid in part, and was to pay in whole for the satisfaction of his creditors:" and therefore the king commanded, and the prelates and lords prayed them, as they had done before, "to advise about their charge, and give good and effectual answers thereunto, with as much haste as might be, for the common profit of the kingdom, and ease of the lords and themselves."

[A Subsidy granted.] At length, notwithstanding all these excuses, the prelates, lords, and commons, perceiving the great perils wherewith the land was encompassed, and the great and extraordinary expences the king was to be at for the safety and defence thereof, agreed and granted the king the former subsidy of wool, leather, and wool-fells for 3 years, viz. of wool 43*s.* 4*d.* the sack, and of wool-fells as much, that is, for every 240 of each, accounting six score to the 100; as also for leather, 4*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* on every last which should be exported by denizens and strangers, besides the ancient custom; and as an additional grant, they gave 13*s.* 4*d.* more for every sack of wool; as much for every 240 wool-fells; and for every last of leather 11*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* Also they gave 6*d.* in the lb. for every lb. value of merchandise, as well of denizens as strangers, both imported and exported for one year. And then the parl. was dissolved.

[A new Parliament called.] Writs were issued for a new parliament to meet at Westminster, on the 14th of Jan. 1379; but several sheriffs not having returned their writs, an adjournment took place till the next day. On which the king, bps. lords, and commons being assembled in the Painted Chamber, the lord chancellor sir Rd. le Scroop, by the king's command, declared the cause of the summons to this effect:—"1st. For the liberties of the church, the maintenance of laws, and preservation of the peace:—2nd. because the regality of the king's crown was much impaired, in several instances, as well by the court of Rome as otherwise; and therefore the provisions made for supporting it ought to be well observed, and other remedies provided for that purpose:—3rd. to consult how to resist, not only the enemies of France, Spain, and Scotland, who had raised hot wars against us, but also to suppress the rebels of Ireland and Gascoigny, and how to defend the king's dominions beyond sea. All which, because they could not be accomplished without their aid, he desired they would consult about and advise accordingly." He further told them, "That the grant made by them at Gloucester of the new increase of wools, and 6d. in the pound on merchandize, which had been revoked in the next parl. on the grant of the Poll-Tax, and which was promised to be able to raise 20,000 armed men, and as many archers had fallen short; for the charge of those soldiers came to 50,000l. besides other expences there declared, for all which the king stood indebted; whereof he willed them to have due consideration." Lastly, he added, "That the lords of the Great Council were ready to lay before them the receipts of the last subsidial grants, and the disbursements of the same."

[A Speaker chosen.] After appointing receivers and tryers of Petitions as usual, the commons adjourned to their place; and soon after returned into parl. with sir John Gildersburgh, kt. whom they had chosen Speaker, who, making the usual protestation first, "prayed that the prelates and other lords of the king's standing council might be discharged, and none such for the future be retained; because they said, that now the king was of good discretion, in respect of his age, which was the same with his grandfather's, at his coronation; who then had no other counsellors, but the five principal officers of his realm. Praying, also, that those five officers, viz. the chancellor, the treasurer, keeper of the privy-seal, chief chamberlain, and steward of the household, might not be renewed or changed until the next parl. They likewise prayed that a commission might be issued out to certain persons to survey and examine, in all his courts and palaces, the state of the king's household, the expences and receipts in all the offices, &c." This last was granted, and a commission was made out to the earls of Arundele, Warwick, and Stafford; the lords Latimer, Brian, and Montacute, with John Haistings, John Gildersburgh, and Edw. Dalyngrugge, knights; Wm. Walworth and John Philpot, citizens of London, and Thomas Graa, citizen of York, with others, to execute and report the same.

[A Supply granted.] The lords and commons together, "considering that the king and kingdom was surrounded with enemies, who with great force endeavoured all they could, as well by sea as land, to destroy them both, and even to extinguish the English language. Therefore, for the defence and safety of the kingdom, and for the good success of the expedition ordered into Brittany, and the destruction of the said enemies, they freely granted to the king one 15th and a half, without the cities and burghs, and one 10th and a half within those places. With this prayer, that this subsidy, and what was remaining of the other, given last parl. might be only applied for the expedition into Brittany, and no where else."—"Considering also that the subsidy on wools, leather and wool-fells, was to end at Michaelmas next; and that from thence the king would not be able to support the great charge of carrying on the war in the marches of Calais, Brest, Cherburgh, in Gascoigny, in Ireland, and in the marches of Scotland, they granted the same subsidies, from the time they were to end at, until the Michaelmas twelve month. And, withal, praying the king that there might not be another parl. called, to charge his poor commons till a year after that time."

Mr. Tyrrel has observed, in the Records, a remarkable transaction done in this parl. omitted by dr. Brady, which was this, "that when the king and both houses resolved to enlarge the powers of the justices of peace, the prelates and clergy, in their convocation, made an express protestation against it, that it had not, or ever should pass, with their consents." The answer the king gave to this, was, 'That he would not forbear, for their protestations, to make his justices as he was wont, and by his coronation oath was obliged to do.' From whence that author observes 'that the clergy assembled in convocation, were not then looked upon as a distinct estate of parl. as some men, without any just grounds have supposed.' (See Tyrrel's Hist. of Eng. vol. iii. p. 851.)—We shall take our leave of this parl. with observing, that now sir Rd. le Scroop, for what reason is not mentioned, surrendered his office of chancellorship, and Simon Sudbury, abp. of Canterbury was put in his place; which was then looked upon as a degradation to his archiepiscopal dignity.

[A new Parliament called.] In 1380, writs were issued out to summon a parl. to meet the day after the Feast of All-Saints, at Northampton. At the time appointed it was, as usual, adjourned for some days, because that again the continual rains had made the roads almost unpassable; when, at last, being all met that could come (for several lords were with the duke of Lancaster, on the Scotch borders) in a chamber belonging to the priory of st. Andrew, in Northampton, the abp. of Canterbury, as chancellor, declared the cause of their meeting, and said, "That they could not be ignorant that the earl of Buckingham had been sent into France, with an army which had cost the king more money than was given him by the last parl. Besides, the late expedition into Scotland, the defence of Guienne, and the charges he had been at in Ireland, had put the king under such great necessities, that he had, been forced to pawn his jewels; the subsidy on wools raising very little, because of the present disturbance in Flanders. That the soldiers in the marches of Calais, Brest, and Cherburgh, were in arrear more than 3 months, and it was feared they might desert for want of their pay. That they were to consider the king was very much in debt, and was bound by covenant and indenture to pay the earl of Buckingham, with others concerned in that expedition, for another half year, now nearly ended; and that the king was also at a very great charge in guarding the coasts. Lastly, he desired them to advise the king how these expences were to be born, with the most ease to his subjects; and how the kingdom might be best defended against all its enemies, both by sea and land, in as short a time as possible."

[Debate upon raising a Supply.] The commons took only one day to treat about these affairs, and then returned to the house of lords, where, in the presence of the king, prelates, and peers, sir John Gildersburgh, again their Speaker, "demanded a more clear declaration of what had been said to them; and, especially, what sum was demanded to support the charge; praying, that no more might be required than was necessary, because the commons were poor, and little able to bear so great a charge any longer." Whereupon, a schedule was delivered in, by the king's great officers and council, containing the sums necessary, which amounted to 160,000*l.* sterling. The commons replied, "That they thought the sum was too much, and, really, insupportable; and prayed that no more might be demanded than what was absolutely necessary for the causes set forth. And, farther, desired the prelates and lords would treat by themselves about the matter, and propound the ways by which any reasonable sum might be levied and collected." The lords took time to consult about this affair, and, when they were agreed, they ordered the commons to come before them, and told them what they resolved upon; "1st, that a certain sum of so many Groats might be paid by every person in the kingdom, both males and females, the more able to help the less. 2^{ndly}, If that was not agreeable; to have an imposition upon all manner of merchandizes, bought and sold within the realm, for a certain time, every time they should be sold, to be paid by the vender. And, 3^{rdly}, their advice was to raise a certain sum, by 10ths and 15ths; but because the last method was grievous to the poor commons, and that they could not know what sum it would raise, nor in what time the other ways could be expedited, therefore the lords thought proper to pitch upon the Groats; and proposed 4 or 5 to be levied upon every person, as above, this way of tallage seeming to them the best and most easy to the subject."

The commons, after debating a long time about the manner of this levy, came into full parl. and made protestation, "That they came not to grant any thing that day; but they said, that if the Clergy would support a third part of the charge, they would grant 100,000*l.* to be raised by a certain number of groats, so that the clergy would raise 50,000*l.* which was but reasonable, for that they possessed a third part of the kingdom; and prayed the king and lords to move it to them speedily, to agree to this proposal." To which the prelates replied, "That their grants were never made in parl. nor ought to be: that the laymen neither could nor should constrain them in that case; and claimed the Liberty of the Church, which before that time they had ever enjoyed. They desired that the Commons might be enjoined to do what they ought and were bound to do; as for themselves, they would act, under the present necessities, as they had done before."

[A Capitation Tax granted.] At last the lords and commons agreed upon a Capitation-Tax, which was to be three groats of every person of the kingdom, male or female, of the age of 15, of what state and condition soever, except beggars; the sufficient people in every town to contribute to the assistance of the less able; so as none paid above 60 groats, including himself and his wife. It was further enacted, "That no knight, citizen, or burges of this parl. should be collector of this money, but that the king should appoint such as should equally levy it, according to the meaning of the grant, throughout the kingdom." Our oldest English Chronicles call this tax a 'new and a strange subsidy.' Hollingshead writes, that 'great grudging, and many a bitter curse followed on the levying this money, and much mischief rose thereof as after did appear.' We may reasonably suppose that no common reader of English history is unacquainted with the history of this rebellion and its tragical consequences; Walsingham and Knyghton, both living at that time, are very particular in their relation of it; to whom, or their copiers, we must refer.

[A new Parliament called.] The Rebellion being at length suppressed, the king thought proper to send out writs, dated July 16, for a parl. to meet at Westm. on the 14th of Sep. following. It was afterwards prorogued to the day after All-Souls; and by reason of a quarrel which had happened between the duke of Lancaster and the earl of Northumberland, who came to parl. with each a great retinue of armed followers, it was further adjourned till the king could make up the difference, which was happily ended, a few days after, by causing the earl to ask the duke's pardon. On the meeting Wm. Courtney, elect abp. of Canterbury, and now chanc. of England, declared the cause of the summons, and took for his theme, "Rex convenire fecit consilium." He applied his text to the good and virtuous government of the king, during his reign: affirming, "That no reign could long endure, if vice reigned in it; to redress which this parl. was called, since the laws now in being were not able to do it." And, after the usual form for receiving petitions was settled, the chanc. told them that this being Saturday, the cause of their meeting should be more specially declared to them on the Monday next. On which day the commons were called over by their names, in the white-chamber at Westm. when sir Hugh Segrave, treasurer of England, by the king's command, reminded them of the abp's. oration, and said, "That the chief cause of their summons was; first, to take care of the church's liberties and to provide for the maintenance of the peace; and, especially, to punish the authors of the late horrible tumults and rebellion made against the king, who had been forced to grant to the rebels Charters of Liberty and Manumission, who were only bond-tenants and villains of the realm, under the great seal of England. Which the king knowing to be done against law, desired them to seek remedy and provide for the confirmation or revocation thereof." Lastly, he said, "The king was much in debt, and in great want of money to maintain his court and the wars."

[A Speaker chosen.] The commons retiring to their accustomed place, the Chapter-House of Westm. abbey, chose sir Rd. Walsgrave, kt. their Speaker; and returning with him into parl. the said sir Rd. desired to be excused and discharged from the office; but the king insisting, upon his allegiance, that he should stand "as being chosen by his companions," he made the usual protestation. This is the first instance of a Speaker pleading to be excused. Afterwards the lords and commons, together, came, unanimously, to this resolution, "That all grants of liberties and manumission to the said villains and bond-tenants, obtained by force, were in disherison of them, the lords and commons, and destruction of the realm; and therefore null and void." The commons, also petitioned the king, "That since the rest of the charge was for matters which highly concerned the state of the realm, they might have certain bps. and lords to consult with them, since they thought their advice would be very much to the purpose." The answer was, "That they should give in the names to the king in writing, of such as they desired, that he might advise about it;" which was done, and the king granted their desire. And the commons further prayed the king, "That the prelates by themselves, the lords temporal by themselves, the knights by themselves, the judges by themselves, and all other estates singly, might be ordered to treat about their charge; and that their advice might be reported to the commons." To which it was answered, "That the king had charged the lords, and other sages, to commune diligently upon the said matters; but the ancient custom and form of parl. had always been, that the commons should first report their advice, upon the matters given them in charge to the king and lords of parl. and not on the contrary; and therefore the king would, that the ancient and good customs and form of parl. should be kept and observed."

[The Commons complain of Abuses in the Government.] After the commons had conferred with the lords, they returned into the parliament, "and made great complaint of the government of the realm, which, if not amended, the kingdom would be in a short time ruined: they complained also of the government about the king's person, his court, the excessive number of his servants; of the abuses in the chancery, king's bench, common pleas, exchequer; and of grievous oppressions in the country, by the great multitude of maintainers of quarrels, who behaved themselves like kings in the country, so as there was very little law, or right; and of other things, which they said were the cause of the late commotions, and mischiefs of the land, and requested they might be amended." The king, by advice of the lords and his council, granted, "that certain prelates, lords, and others, should survey and examine the government of his person and court, and to think of sufficient remedies." The persons chosen to make this inquiry were, the duke of Lancaster, the abp. elect of Canterbury, the abp. of York, the bps. of Winchester, Ely, Exeter, and Rochester; the earls of Arundele, Warwick, Stafford, Suffolk, and Salisbury; the lords Zouch, Nevil, Grey of Ruthin, and Fitz-Walter; sir R. le Scroop, sir Guy de Brian and others. The king's confessor was charged to abstain from coming to, or remaining at court, at the request of the commons, and assent of the lords, being one, as was then supposed, that gave the king ill advice.

[Petitions of the Commons.] Then follow certain Petitions of the Commons, though their answers are not set down.—First, they petition the duke of Lancaster, and others, assigned by the king for that purpose, "To place the most discreet and valuable officers about the king's person, and his court; to appoint a chancellor, barons and officers in the exchequer, judges of one bench and the other; that they might know their names, and what they were to do, and the method they were to take in the regulation of the realm, after these things were done."—They also petition, "That an end might be made of the war, which was in great part maintained by the goods that the enemies of the nation took, by sea and land, from the English, to the great dishonour of the government, and nation, and destruction of the whole realm."—They likewise petition, "That certain of the chief clerks in chancery, certain justices, barons of the exchequer, and others learned in the law, might consult of the grievances above; and that certain merchants might declare the causes of the low prices of our commodities, the carrying over our money, washing and clipping thereof."

Then the Commons brought into parl. a draught, containing 3 articles, for as many sorts of pardons, if the king would please to grant them. The 1st was, for the lords, gentlemen, &c. that in resistance of the rioters and traitors caused some of them to be slain, without due process of law. The 2nd, to ap-peace and quiet the minds of the common people, concerning all treasons and felonies committed in the late riots and tumults. This was granted, with some exceptions, provided that such as received damages and losses by these insurrections, should not by this pardon be fore-closed from recovering any recompence by due course of law. The 3d was, for the good people that kept themselves in peace, and were no ways consenting to the said tumults and insurrections, yet were some ways concerned by favouring or receiving the rebels.—This business of the pardons being over, the Commons made a rehearsal of their requests and grievances, which they would have amended: and desired to have a view of what was done in that matter, which the king then did not immediately answer, but told them, “He had been at great expence in quieting the nation of the late tumults, and otherwise, as was declared to them before by his officers; and that he was to be at further great expences, by reason of the queen’s coming over, her marriage, and coronation, which were suddenly to be celebrated; also in guarding the seas, and keeping his fortresses abroad, and for defence of the realm at home; for the discharge of which debts, and the supply of his expences, he had nothing in his treasury.” To which the Commons answered, “That considering the evil hearts and rancour of the people through the whole realm, they neither durst nor would grant any manner of tallage.” They also desired the parl. might be adjourned till after Christmas, which was granted; and then they also desired again, to know the extent of his grace and favour in pardoning. To which the king replied, “That it was not the custom of parl. to have a general pardon, and such favour from the king, when the Commons would not grant him any thing;” and told them, “he would advise further of his grace and pardon, until they should do what belonged to them:” and said moreover, “it was customary to grant pardons the last day of the parl. when he answered their supplications and petitions in writing.” Hereupon the commons came into full parl. before the lords, saying, “They had advised and considered the great charge of the king, as well here as beyond sea;” and then the prelates, lords and commons, continued the subsidy of wool, leather, and wool-fells, until Candlemas next ensuing, as it was last granted. Whereupon the king ordered a declaration to be made of his grace and pardon.

In this parl. great complaints were made against the mayor, bailiffs, and people of the town of Cambridge, for their actions against the university in the late tumults; and the said officers being summoned to appear before the king and his council in parl. they appeared and denied the matters of fact; which being proved, they submitted themselves to the king’s mercy. Whereupon, their franchises being given up, some of them were granted to the university: and the residue the king granted again to the town.

The parl. was then adjourned to the latter end of Jan. 1382, on account of Christmas being near, and the young king’s going to be married to Ann, sister to the emperor of Germany and king of Bohemia: and it was ordered, that all pleas, causes, and other matters moved in this parl. with all other things, should remain undetermined to that time. Being met, the first thing the parl. went upon was, to take into consideration a proposal made by the duke of Lancaster, to make another expedition into Portugal, if the parl. would allow him 60,000l. to pay the wages of 2000 men at arms, and 2000 archers, for half a year. The duke’s reasons for this 2d expedition into Portugal, were, “For the saving such English soldiers as were still there; for the recovery of his own right in Spain; and, also, for the safeguard of the sea, preservation of the realm of England, and the destruction of her enemies. Offering to repay the sum stipulated in 3 years, either in money, or by some acceptable service.” This demand occasioned a long debate amongst the lords, some approving of the reasons, and others not; but the latter were the majority at this time.

[A Subsidy granted for the Assistance of the Portuguese.] On the 25th of Feb. the lords and commons resolved, “That, considering the king’s great necessities, and the number and strength of his enemies, both at sea and land, with the great expences he must be at for the defence of the kingdom, against such force, they would of their own free-will grant to the king the subsidy on wool, wool-fells, and leather, as it was in the last grant, from that very day to the feast of st. John Baptist next coming; and from thence for 4 years more. Whether such armaments should be made use of in the voyage of the lord of Lancaster into Spain, or in any other manner. But with this express protestation of the commons, that it was not their intention to be obliged by any words in this grant to quarrel or have a war with Spain, but they only gave it for the defence of the kingdom, and resistance of its enemies; as it should seem best to the whole house of lords to advise and ordain about it.”

In this parl. sir Rd. le Scroop, a man of known judgment, learning and integrity, was again appointed lord chanc. But very soon after its dissolution, by the instigation of some courtiers, who were but inferior officers to the king, because sir Rd. would not pass some large grants of estates to them, which had escheated to the crown, the seals were taken from him, and given to Rob. Braybroke, bp. of London. At this time, also, were made several Statutes concerning Strangers being admitted to buy and sell commodities in their own names, without any hindrance of the English merchants; likewise, for the forbidding of furs, and regulating the excess of apparel in inferior people; to settle the price of wines, and many other matters.

[A new Parl. called.] In the same year, 1382, another parl. was summoned to meet at Westm. about Michaelmas; when the king and lords being met in the Painted Chamber, the names of the knights, citizens and burgesses were called over before them. After which, the bp. of London, as chanc. opened the cause of their meeting to be, "For the better defence of the nation against its enemies, and to provide means for that purpose." Dr. John Gilbert, bp. of Hereford, by the king's command, further explained the cause of summons; and proposed two ways to deal with the enemies of the kingdom, one by making use of the Flemings, who offered their service, against them; and the other to close with the offer of the duke of Lancaster, made in the last parl. who now had reduced his demand, for the support of his army from 60 to 43,000l. These matters being of so high a nature the commons, as usual, made their request to the lords to have such as they named to consult with them about the charge, which was granted, and the names of the lords entered upon the roll. After a conference between the lords and commons they granted the king a 10th and a 15th, "by reason," as they said, "of the great danger the nation was in from the mighty preparations of the French king against them; to be employed as the king, by the advice of his council, and the lords of the realm, should think fit. Then the duke of Lancaster's proposal came again into consideration, and the question was put to every particular prelate, earl, baron, and banneret, "Whether they thought his voyage into Spain, with the number of forces proposed, would be for the service of the king and realm, or not?" It was agreed, "That it might be so, only they believed the force too small to be employed against so great a kingdom."

[Statute of Heresy.] A religious affair of some consequence to the church of England, as then established, came before this parl. In the last session there was an act passed, which is now in our statute books, entitled, "An act to commission sheriffs to apprehend preachers of heresy, and their abettors, reciting the enormities ensuing the preaching of heresies." This statute had been surreptitiously obtained by the clergy, and had the formality of an enrolment without the consent of the commons. In this parl. therefore, that body justly complained, and humbly petitioned the king, that "Forasmuch as that statute was made without their consents, and never authorized by them; and as it never was their meaning to bind themselves, or their successors, to the prelates, no more than their ancestors had done before them, they prayed the aforesaid statute might be repealed, and it was done accordingly." But, by the artifice of the bps. even this act of repeal was suppressed; and prosecutions carried on, by virtue of the former, which is the reason that the other is not to be found in the statute books.

[A Parliament called.] About this time a rebellion broke out in Flanders. The Flemings had driven their earl out of his country; he applies himself to the king of France, as his sovereign lord, and they crave the like assistance from the king of England. The French king marched an army into Flanders, and subdued a great part of that country, and the earl laid siege to Ghent, which was the head of the rebellion, and in great danger of being taken. To prevent this, and to stop the progress of the French king's arms in Flanders, his preparations to besiege Calais, and his further designs against England itself, another parl. was called to meet at Westm. about the middle of Lent, 1383. The above causes were expressed in the summons; and when met, the bp. of London declared further, "That the king had offered to go over in person with a royal army; but having since received the news, that the French king had over-run all Flanders, except Ghent, therefore this parl. was called for their advice, whether the king should go, in person, to the relief of that town; and, if so, how to provide for such an undertaking." The commons consulted together, 2 or 3 days on the business of their charge; but finding it, as they said, so great and so highly affecting the king's person, they prayed his majesty to grant them certain lords, all named by themselves, to treat with them about it. The prelates and peers desired, were, the abp. of Canterbury, the bps. of Ely and Hereford, the earls of Cambridge, Stafford, and Northumberland, the lords Nevile, Fitz-Walter and Cobham, which was granted by the king, "although," as the record mentions, "it was, is, and, ought to be, in the election of the king to assign such bps. and lords, as he should think fit, or others of his own proper nomination."

[A Speaker chosen.] When this committee of lords had consulted with the commons for some time, the latter appeared before the king and the whole house of peers, and, by sir J. Pickering their Speaker, declared that, "the king's passage and the ordering of his voyage, or any other great voyage belonged not to them, but to the king himself and lords of his council; yet, by way of advice, considering what troubles were in the land; that the truce with the Scots was near expiring, and they were raising great forces near the borders; and it being doubtful whether they would now comply with any proposals of peace or truce, unless driven to it; therefore they thought that neither the king, nor any of his 3 uncles of Lancaster, Cambridge or Buckingham, could be spared out of the kingdom, until that and the borders aforesaid was well quieted and settled. They rather advised him to accept of a proposal made by the bp. of Norwich of raising 3000 men at arms and 3000 archers well mounted, with whom he purposed to relieve Ghent, reduce Flanders, and afterwards to carry the war into France; provided he was allowed the 15th, granted by the laity and clergy, with the 2s. a tun upon wine, and 6d. in the pound upon merchandize for the guard of the sea."

his Household, &c.] The commons, also, prayed the king, "That for his honour and profit, with the quiet and comfort of themselves, of his great grace he would please to command, that certain lords might be assigned to be about his person, out of the most wise, honest and discreet persons in the kingdom, to advise and counsel him; and further, that he would please, by the advice of the lords, so to order his household, that he might live on the revenues of the crown; and that the subsidy on wool, with the money arising from marriages and escheats, might be wholly employed to support the war." The king answered, "That he would take such sufficient persons, lords and others, about his own person as appeared to him most for his honour and profit; and as to the government of his house it should be done by the advice of the lords and others of his council, as, saving his honour, should seem best to them."

[The Papal Chair in contest.] The proposal of the bp. of Norwich, mentioned above, was on an extraordinary occasion, and deserves our notice. At that time there was a great schism in holy church, two popes having been elected, and each supported by different nations and factions. One of them, who called himself Urban VI. had sent bulls into England for a crusade, to sign all with the cross that would go with him into France, for the destruction of the Antipope, who, also, stiled himself Clement XI. By virtue of these bulls, sent to the bp. of Norwich, and by him published all over England, that prelate collected a great sum of money; besides jewels, necklaces, bracelets, rings, dishes, spoons, and other silver implements, which the ladies and other devotees gave to purchase heaven, and to obtain the benefit of absolution and pardon for all transgressions. Nor were the men unmindful of their own salvation in this way, for many of them, as was believed, gave beyond their abilities, in order to make their absolution more valid; some found men at arms, others archers, and many were so zealous as to serve in their own persons.

But, to give the greater credit to this sanctified cause, the consent and aid of parl. was thought absolutely necessary; and the bp. on further consideration, made a second proposal, which was, "To serve the king, one whole year, with 2500 men at arms, and an equal number of archers, well arrayed and mounted, for the whole 15th granted by the laity. Of which number, 1000 men at arms and as many archers should be ready to pass the sea for the relief of Ghent, and the country of Flanders, within 20 days after the first payment; and that he would take upon him to pay the charge of shipping, and all other incident expences." This last proposal was agreeable to the king, his council, and both houses of parl.; and since France, with the earl of Flanders, were intirely in the interest of the anti-pope, they were in hopes that some great advantage might be made of this expedition, in the French war, which still continued. But though the bp. passed over with his army, and had some considerable success at first, yet, in the end, this pontifical war concluded with no great honour, either to the prelatical leader of it, or to the nation.

[A new Parliament called.] Before the bishop's return from this extraordinary crusade, writs had been sent out to call a new parl. to meet on the 1st of Nov. 1383. The cause of summons was in some measure expressed in the writs, "That by advice and assent of the council a parl. was called for their mediation and assistance, in a treaty of peace, then in agitation between the king, his kingdom, and subjects, on the one part; and Robert king of Scotland on the other. And for other difficult and urgent business, which concerned the king, the state and defence of the realm, and the English church." At the meeting, sir Michael de la Pole, then lord chanc. of England, opened the session by a speech, excusing first his own unworthiness to the place he possessed, and declaring that he was forced to accept of it; after which he acquainted the houses, "That the truce which had been concluded with the Scots was to end at Candlemas next; that the duke of Lancaster, who had been sent to renew it, was returned, and had brought back word that the Scots would send commissioners to London to manage the treaty. A second cause was to provide as well as they could against three powerful enemies, Spain, France and Flanders. And here he offered several reasons to prove that it was better for us to begin and make war upon them, than they upon us, or suffer them to invade us." And further observed, "That these wars were not to be imputed to the king, for they had descended to him with the crown. He desired that care might be taken for the maintenance of good laws, and security of the peace. And lastly put them in mind of an aid to support these great charges." The chanc. then addressed himself particularly to the lords, and told them, "That the king commanded them to have a due consideration of the necessary matters that had been declared to them; the apparent and insupportable mischiefs that threatened all, and the great necessity the king had for money to prevent them. That they should treat diligently of these things, by themselves, with as much speed as might be; and laying aside all animosities, they were to report their advice, from time to time, to the king." And added, "That his majesty commanded them to sit from day to day, to dispatch what they came for, and not to depart from parl. without his special licence, under the penalty that might ensue." Hereupon the lords and commons took into consideration the extraordinary charge the king was to be at, by reason of the war then open on every side, and granted two half 15ths, upon condition that the clergy would contribute and grant what became them, which they did accordingly.

[The Bishop of Norwich fined, &c.] In this parl. the bp. of Norwich was accused by the chanc. and several articles were exhibited against him for his miscarriages in the late expedition. The greatest of which was, that he had promised to serve the king with a certain number of men for a whole year, and had served but half a year, and then returned with his army quite broken. This article he could not clear himself of, and therefore was adjudged to make fine and ransom at the king's pleasure, and the temporalities of his bishopric to be seized for that purpose; and thus ended this piece of Ecclesiastical Knight-Errantry. The name of this warlike bp. of Norwich was Henry le Spenser. For the bishop's accusation, by the chanc. and his answers to them, see Cotton's Abridgment, p. 192.

[A Parliament called.] The war with Scotland being renewed, a parl. was appointed to meet at Salisbury, April the 25th, 1384. Being assembled, sir Mich. de la Pole, lord chanc. by the king's command, declared the cause of the summons to be;—1st, "For the maintenance of the church's liberties, the preservation of the laws and the peace." Next, he told them, "That there had been a treaty of peace transacted between England and France, of which, at a proper opportunity, he should shew them the articles. Which, although the king might have concluded without acquainting them, yet, he rather chose to do it with their knowledge and consent." He added, "That if the peace was to take effect, yet, it could not well be ratified without a meeting of both the princes; which, for their own sovereign's honour, required no small charge. Besides, the king had been at great expence in defending the nation against the Scots; in securing the sea-ports beyond sea; and the safety of Guienne and Ireland; and how all this was to be born, he charged them, on their allegiance, to consult and give their answer." The triers of petitions being settled, as usual, the commons came before the king, in parl. and requested that certain lords, there named, might be granted to them for conference; hereupon the duke of Lancaster, with other peers just then coming into parl. they besought the king, that the said duke and his brothers of Cambridge and Buckingham might be of the number; which was granted. After which, the lords and commons gave the king a moiety of a 10th and of a 15th, providing further, that if the wars with Scotland and France did continue, then the king should have the other moiety of a 15th; so that the clergy should tax themselves accordingly; and if a peace was made then the last moiety to cease.

[A Parliament called.] The same year a parl. was assembled at Westm. on the 12th of Nov. when, in the presence of the king, the lords sitting, and the knights and burgesses standing, the lord chanc. as before, put them in mind, "of the king's great care of the church, commons, and laws of England;" and further told them, "That the nation was environed with enemies, the French, Spaniards, Scots and Flemings; and that the chief cause for calling this parl. was to provide for the safety and defence of the kingdom; and to consider how this provision might best and most speedily be raised, so that the poor people might be least burthened by it." He acquainted them, "That the king would go in person, for the defence of the kingdom, against any enemy, by the advice and consent of parl. He then took occasion to tell them, 'of the base treachery and falshood of the French; who, in the last treaty of peace at Calais, had gone from their own offers; which, he added, was a good cause of assurance to the English, in so just a quarrel to look for victory.' The chanc. concluded with observing to them, 'That four ways or means would greatly further and speed this consultation; first, to be early in the house; next, to repel all melancholy passions; the third, to begin always on the most needful enquiries, and to direct without mixture of any orders; and lastly, to avoid all maintaining and partaking.' See Cotton's Abridgment, p. 303. These things being maturely considered, the lords and commons granted to the king, for the defence of the realm, the safeguard of the sea, and marches of Scotland, two 15ths. Upon condition that the last half 15th, granted at Salisbury, should not be paid; and in case the king did not go in person against his enemies, or that a peace or truce should be made with them, then the latter of these two 15ths should not be levied.

[A new Parliament called.] On or about the 20th of Oct. 1385, the king thought it advisable to call a new parl. On the day of their meeting, sir Michael la Pole, then earl of Suffolk and still chancellor of England, opened the session in the presence of the king and the other estates to this purport: "That the nation being assaulted on every side by most mortal enemies, it was their business to consider how it might best be defended and preserved. The defence of the realm, he said, might be effected 4 several ways; of which 2 were foreign and the other 2 domestic. The home affairs were concerning the Staple, and the current Coin of the kingdom. The other were, how they might best defend themselves; and how the war was to be best supported and maintained. For the Staple, he thought it best that the same should be planted within the realm. Since it was evident that the burgesses of Calais, and other towns abroad, were grown very rich thereby; whilst several good towns within the kingdom were very much decayed, by which the common profit was abated. For, he affirmed that the subsidy on wools yielded more to the king, when the Staple was kept in England, by a 1000 marks yearly, than it had done when held abroad. As to the Coin (he said) that considering how all nations were greedy of it, and conveyed much over, he advised it, as the best way, to raise the value. That the nation might be best defended by pursuing the enemy with a vigorous war; and for many reasons he told them, that it was better to seek than to be sought after; wherefore, of necessity, a subsidy was to be granted, such as might be equal to the occasions of the government."—Upon the chancellor's motion, the lords, great men, &c. granted to the king for the voyage of John king of Castile and Leon, and duke of Lancaster, into Spain, for the safe keeping of the sea and marches of Scotland, a full 10th and 15th, and a half a 10th and 15th. Particular treasurers were appointed by parl. for the receipt of this subsidy, with supervisors to see it laid out; and this voyage into Spain was declared to be "by the agreement and consent of the king, prelates, noblemen, and commons in full parl. assembled."

[Grants and Promotions.] In the last expedition into Scotland the king had created some new dignities, which, according to the custom of those times, were used to be confirmed in parliament. Edmund earl of Cambridge, the king's uncle, was confirmed duke of York, and had a pension of 1000l. a year assigned him and his heirs male out of the exchequer to support his dignity, until the king could settle lands upon him of like value. Thomas earl of Buckingham and Essex the king's other uncle, having been created duke of Gloucester, was confirmed in it; and had a like pension and assignment made him. Also Michael de la Pole, made earl of Suffolk, had some lesser grants passed to him. Lastly, Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, the king's favourite, was now, by an unusual title created Marquis of Dublin; and was confirmed in that title together with all the revenues of Ireland, &c. except some royalties reserved to the crown, and paying 5000 marks yearly into the exchequer. It was now also that Roger Mortimer, earl of March, was declared, in parl. presumptive heir to the crown, in case that Richard died without issue.

[Petitions of the Commons.] In this parl. the commons petitioned the king, "That the state of his household might be looked into and examined every year, by the chanc. treasurer and clerk of the privy-seal, and what was amiss to be mended at their discretion. And, also, that the ancient statutes made concerning the household, might be kept and duly executed in all their points." To the 1st article of the petition the answer was, "The king will order it when he pleaseth." To the 2d "Le Roy le veu." The commons desired to know, "Who should be the king's chief officers and governors of the state of the kingdom?" The answer was, "The king hath officers sufficient at present, and will change them at his pleasure."

It was, also, enacted in this parl. that, all lords and other persons who have lands on the marches beyond the river Tyne, should live upon them; saving, that the king may shew favour to whom he pleaseth in that matter. The staple of wool which was at Calais was, also, ordered to be kept in England in such place as the king and his council should think meet. See Cotton's Abridg. p. 310.

[Debate concerning restoring the Bp. of Norwich's Temporalities.] In this parl. Tho. Arundele, bp. of Ely, applied to the king, to make restitution of the temporalities to Henry Spenser bp. of Norwich, which had been seized into the king's hands in the last parl. This was warmly opposed by the new earl of Suffolk, lord chanc. who rose up and spoke to the bp. of Ely, in this manner, "What is that, my lord, that you ask of the king? Seems it to you a small matter for him to part with that bp.'s temporalities, when they yield to his coffers above 1000l. a year? Little need hath the king of such counsellors, or such friends, as advise him to acts so greatly to his disadvantage." To which the bp. of Ely replied, "What says your lordship, my lord Michael? Know, that I ask not from the king what is his own, but that which he, drawn thereunto by you, or such as you are, withholds from other men, upon none of the justest titles, and which, as I think, will never do him any good. As for yourself, if the king's advantage be the thing you drive at, why did you so greedily accept of 1000 marks a year, at the time he created you earl of Suffolk?" The chanc. adds our authority, was hit so home, by this round retort, that he offered no further to cross the restitution of the bp.'s temporalities. See Speed's Chron. p. 600.

[A new Parliament called.] A new parl. was called, by writs, to meet at Westm. on the 1st of Oct. 1386. It appears by the Records, that the session was opened, as usual, by a speech from the earl of Suffolk, lord chanc.; in which, he told the houses, "That the principal cause of calling them together, at that time, was to acquaint them, that at a council, held at Oxford, it had been determined that the king should pass the seas, in person, with an army royal; which resolution the king still held, and they were to debate in what manner and how it was to be done. He said there were 4 causes that moved the king to this expedition; the 1st was, that he might at less expence attack his enemy abroad, than stay and defend them at home. The 2d was to take off a reproach blazed about, that he durst not go over in person. The 3d was to gain his right to the crown of France; by which, he should acquire both renown and honour. And, lastly, since the French were daily threatening an invasion, he desired them to consult about it, as well as the maintenance of the laws and preservation of the peace."

[Differences between the King and his Parliament.] The tryers of Petitions being appointed, the next thing this parl. went upon was the Impeachment of the earl of Suffolk. Henry Knighton informs us, that "at the opening of the session, the king appeared, in person, as usual; but when he found that the commons were resolved upon impeaching sir Michael de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, and lord chanc. for divers crimes and misdemeanors, his majesty retired, lest he might seem to countenance their proceedings. The king went to Eltham, where he trifled away his time: hereupon both houses, with joint consent, thought proper to send this message to him, "That the chanc. and treasurer ought to be removed from their offices, because those men were not for the advantage of himself and kingdom. Adding, that they had matters to treat of relating to the lord Michael de la Pole, which could not be safely done whilst he remained in the office of chanc." The king was greatly incensed at this message, and commanded them, "Not to make mention of any such thing for the future; but forthwith proceed to the business for which they were summoned, and hasten to a conclusion;" and rashly added, "That he would not for them, or at their instance, remove the meanest scullion in his kitchen." What raised the resentment of the commons more against the chancellor was, that in this parl. he, in the king's name, had demanded of them four 15ths, to be paid in one year, and as many 10ths from the clergy. Alledging, that the king was so much in debt, that less would not discharge it. Without regarding this at all, the lords and commons returned their joint answer to the king, "That they neither could, nor by any means would proceed, in any business of parl. or dispatch, so much as the least article of it, till the king should come and shew himself in person amongst them, and remove the said Michael de la Pole from his office." To this high demand, the king returned for answer, "That they should order 40 knights, of the wisest and most substantial of the commons, to come to him and declare the opinion of all the rest." But this message alarmed them still more, every man doubting his own safety; for a private rumour had reached their ears, that these 40 members were designed to be massacred. For," adds our authority, "it was told them, and it appeared afterwards to be true, that as these 40 were to go to the king, a large party of armed men should set upon and murder them. Or else, that being invited to a feast, some armed ruffians should destroy them. Or, yet another way, that they should be murdered, all in instant, in their lodgings in London." "This last bloody design," he says, "was frustrated by R. de Exton, then mayor of London, who refused to give his consent to such a piece of villainy; by which it was deferred, and this cursed contrivance by degrees brought to light." Therefore the whole parl. by common consent, deputed the lord Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester, and Thomas de Arundel, bp. of Ely, to go to the king, still at Eltham, and that they should, in the behalf of the lords and commons, humbly salute him, and deliver the sense of both houses to him, to this effect:—

commend themselves to your royal dignity; wishing you successful in the course of honour, and invincible against the power of your enemies; together with the most firm band of peace and hearty love towards your subjects, as well for the increase of your own interest and advantage, in respect of God, and the salvation of your soul, as for the unspeakable comfort of all the people you govern, on whose behalf we intimate these things unto you: "That we have it settled and confirmed in our ancient constitution, from a laudable and approved custom, which none can gainsay, that the king ought to assemble the lords, nobles, and commons of the kingdom once a year, unto his parl. as the highest court of the realm, in which all equity ought to shine bright without any spot, clear as the sun; and wherein as well poor as rich may find never-failing shelter for their refreshment, by restoring tranquillity and peace, and removing all kind of injuries; where all public grievances or errors are to be redressed; and wherein with the most prudent council, the state and good govt. of the kingdom is to be treated of; and considering that the king and nation's foes at home, and their enemies abroad may be discovered, and repulsed, by such means as most conveniently and honourably may be done; and also with wholesome deliberation therein to foresee and order, how the necessary burthens of the king and kingdom may with most ease, the public wants considered, be supplied: they conceive also, that since they are to support all public charges incumbent, they should have the supervisal how and by whom their goods and fortunes are to be expended: they say moreover, that this is their privilege by ancient constitution, 'That if the king will wholly estrange himself from his parliament (no infirmity or necessary cause disabling him), but obstinately by his ungovernable will, shall withdraw himself, and be absent from them the space of 40 days, not regarding the vexation of his people, nor their grievous expences; that then from that time it shall be lawful for all, and every of them, without any damage from the king to go home, and return into their own countries.' And now, you for a longer time have absented yourself, and for what cause they know not, have refused to come among them."

[The King's Answer.] To this the king answered to this effect: "Now we do plainly discover, that our people and the commons intend to resist, and are endeavouring to make insurrections against us: and in such case nothing seems better for us than to call in our cousin the king of France; and from him to ask advice and aid, nay even to submit ourselves to him, rather than to truckle to our own subjects."

[The Parliament's Reply.] To which they replied: "Sir, this council is not safe for you, but rather tends to your inevitable destruction; for the king of France is your capital enemy, and the greatest adversary to your kingdom; and if he should once get footing on your land, would sooner endeavour to despoil you of it, to invade your kingdom, and drive you from your throne, than in the least to lend you his assisting hand, if at any time (which God forbid) you should stand in need thereof; rather therefore recall to your memory, how your noble grandfather, king Edw. III. and in like manner your father, a prince of the same name and renown, with great labour and hazards, during their whole lives, indefatigably contended for the conquest of that kingdom, which by hereditary right appertained to them, and after them to you by succession: you may also be pleased to call to mind, how many of the nobles, what innumerable troops of the commons of England, lost their lives in that quarrel: remember also the inestimable treasures the people of England freely parted with, for the maintenance of that war. And yet, what is more to be lamented, they have in your time sustained so many taxes for the support of your wars, as that now they are reduced to such incredible poverty, that they can neither pay their rents for their livings, nor assist the king, nor afford themselves even the necessities of life: thus the royal power is impoverished, and an unhappy condition brought upon all the great men and nobles of the kingdom, who, as well as the commons, are weakened and undone; for a king cannot be poor that has a rich people, nor that king be rich, whose subjects are beggars: nor do these ills redound alone to you the king, but to all the nobility and great men, every one in his rank and degree. All this is brought to pass by your evil ministers, who have ill governed both king and kingdom to this day; and unless we do quickly set to our helping hands, the kingdom will, in less time than we think of, be miserably subverted. But there is yet one part more of our message remaining, on the behalf of your people, to be imparted to you, "That we have an ancient constitution, and it was not many ages since experimented," (it grieves us that we must mention it) "that if the king, through any evil council, or weak obstinacy or contempt of his people, or out of a perverse and froward wilfulness, or by any other irregular courses, shall alienate himself from his people, and refuse to govern by the laws and statutes of the realm, according to the laudable ordinances, and their faithful advice; but will throw himself headlong into wild designs, and stubbornly exercise his own singular arbitrary will; that from that time, it shall be lawful for his people, by their full and free assent and consent, to depose that king from his throne, and in his stead to establish some other of the royal race upon the same:" therefore, that such a grievous and unhappy dissention may never spring up amongst your people; that they may never, through such lamentable divisions, pleasing only to your enemies, be by your evil counsellors subverted; and that this kingdom so honourable, and from your father's days hitherto most famous in war, may not now in your time, through the distractions of evil govt. be miserably laid waste; and that the title of those miseries may never be fixed as a scandalous mark upon your reign; recall, we beseech you, your royal mind from such foolish and pernicious councils; and whosoever they are that suggest such matters to you, do not only refuse to hearken to them, but totally remove them from your presence; for in a time of danger it will be found, that they can no ways prove effectual to serve you, when you stand most in need of them."

By these and other speeches, says our author, the king was brought to better temper, and laying aside his passion, he promised that after 3 days he would come to the parl. and with mature advice, willingly acquiesce in their Petitions. Accordingly, the king came at the time appointed; and, very soon after, Tho. Arundele, bp. of Ely, by the advice and consent of parl. was made chanc. in the room of M. de la Pole, earl of Suffolk; John Gilbert, bp. of Hereford, was made treasurer, instead of John de Fordham, bp. of Durham; and John de Waltham, keeper of the privy-seal.

[Impeachment of Sir M. de la Pole] After the removal of sir Mich. de la Pole from the chancellorship, he was impeached by the commons of several high crimes and misdemeanors. The following are the articles against him. See Rot. Parl. 10. R. 2, no. 1, 6.

"Articles of Impeachment exhibited by the Commons in full Parliament against Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, late Chancellor of England."

"I. That the said earl being chanc. and sworn to act for the just profit of the king, hath purchased of our lord the king, lands, tenements, and rents to a great value, as appears by the record-rolls of the chancery: and against his oath, not regarding the great necessity of the king and realm, being chanc. at the time of such purchase made, did cause the said lands and tenements to be extended at a much smaller value than really they were worth by the year, and thereby deceived the king."—And for that he purchased the said lands when he was chanc. against his oath, the king shall have the said lands again intirely, and the said earl shall make fine and ransom to the king, with all profits received since the purchase."

"II. Whereas 9 lords were assigned by the last parl. to examine the state of the king and realm, and to deliver their advice how the same might be improved, amended, and put into better order and governance, and thereupon such examination to be delivered to the king as well by word of mouth, as in writing; the said late chanc. did say in full parl. 'That the said advice and ordinance should be put in due execution;' which yet was not done, and that by the default of him who was the principal officer."—To this article, and the 3rd and the 7th, the said earl shall answer, if he have any thing to say against the same in special."

"III. Whereas a tax was granted by the customs in the last parl. to be laid out in a certain form demanded by the commons, and assented to by the king and lords, and not otherwise; yet the monies thence arising, were expended in another manner; so that the sea was not guarded as it was ordered to have been; whence many mischiefs already have happened, and more are like to ensue to the realm: and all this by the default of the said late chanc.

"IV. Whereas the tideman of Limbergh, having to him and his heirs of the gift of the king's grandfather 50l. per ann. out of the customs of Kingston upon Hull, which the said tideman forfeited to the king; and whereas the payment of the said 50l. per ann. was discontinued for 35 years and upwards: the said chanc. knowing the premises, purchased to him and his heirs of the said tideman, the said 50l. per ann. and prevailed with the king to confirm the said purchase, whereas the king ought to have had the whole profit."—For this purpose the said earl was adjudged to fine and ransom, and the said 50l. to go to the king and his heirs, with the manner of flaxflete, and ten marks of rent which were exchanged, &c. with the issues.

"V. Whereas the high master of st. Anthony is a schismatick, and for that cause the king ought to have the profits which appertain to him in England; the said late chanc. who ought to advance and procure the profit of the king, took to farm the said profits of the king at 20 marks per ann. and so got to his own use above a 1000 marks. And afterwards when the said master in England which now is, ought to have had the possession and livery of the said profits, he could not obtain the same, till he and two persons with him became bound by recognizance in chancery, of 3000l. to pay yearly to the said chanc. and his son John, 100l. for the term of their two lives."—For this it was adjudged, That the king shall have all the profits belonging to the said st. Anthony's, at the time of the purchase; and that for the recognizance so made, the said earl shall be awarded to prison, and fined, and ransomed at the pleasure of the king.

"VI. That in the time of the late chanc. there were granted and made divers charters and patents of pardon for murders, treasons, felonies, &c. against the laws; and before the commencement of this present parl. there was made and sealed a charter of certain franchises granted to the castle of Dover in disinherison of the crown, and to the subversion of the pleas and courts of the king, and of his laws."—The king awards that those charters be repealed.

"VII. Whereas by an ordinance made in the last parl. that 10,000 marks should be raised for the relief of the city of Ghent; by the default of the said late chanc. the said city of Ghent was lost, and also 1000 marks of the said money."—Upon all which articles the commons demand the judgment of parliament. Knyghton says that "the sum of the earl's answers to these articles, were either by denying some of them, or confessing and excusing others; and that for all these offences, the said earl was not only discharged from his office of chanc. but being arrested, was committed to the custody of the constable, and after the parl. was up, he was sent close prisoner to Windsor-Castle; but was soon after discharged by the king." Walsingham, an historian of good authority, and co-temporary with Knyghton, relates, that all these articles were so fully proved, that the earl could not deny them. Insomuch, that when he stood upon his defence, and had nothing to say for himself, the king, blushing for him, shook his head and said, 'Alas, alas, Michael, see what thou hast done.' Further, when the king desired a supply, the same author tells us that the commons answered, 'He did not need any tallage on his subjects, when he might so easily furnish himself with a sum of money from him who was his just debtor.' Knyghton adds, "that by the corruption of the king's officers, the public revenue was vainly consumed; the king insufferably defrauded and abused; the common people of the realm, by continued and grievous burdens miserably impoverished; the rents and profits of the nobles and great men much impaired; and their poor tenants in many places forced to abandon their husbandry, and leave their farms empty and desolate. And, all this time it was plain that, by these means, the king's officers became unmeasurably rich."

[Eleven Lords appointed to regulate the Affairs of the Kingdom.] The parl. observing all this, in order to remedy the evil, they chose 11 lords, to whom the king, by commission under the broad-seal, granted leave and power to enquire into, treat of, and determine all affairs, causes and complaints arising since the death of Edw. III. to that present time; as also of the king's expences, and his ministers, and all other matters happening within the limited time. The lords, so chosen, were sworn, on the holy Evangelists, to well and truly regulate all burdens, and other affairs incumbent on the king and kingdom; and to do justice to every one. The king, likewise, took an oath to stand to their appointment, to encourage them in their actings, and not to revoke any article of their power, but to confirm, as good and stable, whatsoever the said counsellors should do or order, during that time; and that any 6 of them, with the 3 chief officers of the king, should at any time make a quorum. Lastly, it was enacted, that if any man should advise the king to make any revocation of their power, though the king should not do it, yet if it was but probable he gave such evil counsel, he should for the same forfeit all his lands and goods; and if he attempted it a 2nd time he should be drawn and hanged as a public traitor to the king and kingdom.

[The King's Letters Patents in Confirmation thereof.] But the authority of parl. alone, being not judged sufficient to secure this great change in the government, the king was further prevailed on to grant his Letters Patent, on which, afterwards, a Statute was made in order to render it as irrevocable as possible. Which Letters Patent must find a place in this work, since, though not strictly parliamentary, they were the occasion of the persons concerned in the commission being afterwards brought to a very severe trial in parl. Thus they stand translated from the French:—

“ Richard, king, &c. to all those to whom these letters shall come to be seen or heard, greeting. We being duly conscious of the grievous complaints of the lords and commons of our realm in this present parl. assembled, that our profits and rents, and the revenues of our realm, by private and insufficient council, and the ill governance as well of certain of our late great officers, as of divers other people being near our person, are so much consumed, wasted, embezzled, given away, granted, and aliened, destroyed, and evilly disposed of and expended: that we are so much impoverished and stripped of treasure and means, and the substance of our crown so diminished and destroyed, that we are neither able to sustain honourably, as we ought, the state of our household, nor maintain and manage those wars wherewith our realm is environed, without great and outrageous oppressions and charges on our people, greater than they can bear: and also that the good laws, statutes and customs of our said realm, to which we are bound by oath, and obliged to maintain, are not, nor have been duly observed and executed, nor full justice or right done to our said people: but many disinherisons and other most great mischiefs and damages have happened, as well to us, as to our people and whole realm. Now we, for the honour of God, and for the good of us and our realm, and for the quiet and relief of our people, willing against the said mischiefs to establish a good and meet remedy, as we have already of our free will, at the request of the lords and commons, ordained and assigned such persons for our great officers; that is to say, our chancellor, treasurer, and keeper of our privy seal, as we esteem good, faithful, and sufficient, for the honour and profit of us and our realm: so also of our real authority, certain knowledge, good pleasure, and free will; and by the advice and assent of the prelates, lords, and commons in full parl. in aid of the good governance of our realm, and the well and due execution of our laws, and for the relief in time of that miserable condition under which both we and our subjects have long laboured, having full confidence in the good advice, sense, and discretion of the most hon. fathers in God, Wm. abp. of Canterbury, and Alex. abp. of York; our most dear uncles, Edmund, duke of York, and Thomas, duke of Gloucester; the hon. fathers in God William, bp. of Winchester, Thos. bp. of Exeter, and Nicholas Abbot of Waltham; our beloved and faithful Rd. earl of Arundel, John lord Cobham, Rd. le Scroop, and John Devereux, have ordained, assigned and deputed, and do ordain, assign and depute them to be of our great and continual council, for one whole year next after the date hereof, to survey and examine, together with our said great officers, as well the estate, condition, and government of our whole realm, and of all our officers and ministers of whatever estate, degree, or condition they be, within our household or without; and to inquire and take information by all such ways as they shall think meet, of all rents, revenues, and profits belonging to us, or which are due and ought to appertain to us, either within the realm or without: and of all gifts, grants, alienations, and confirmations by us made, of any lands, tenements, rents, annuities, profits, revenues, wards, marriages, escheats, forfeitures, franchises, liberties; voidances of archbishoprics, bishoprics, abbeys, priories, farms of houses, possessions of aliens, &c. And also of all revenues and profits, as well of our said realm, as of our lands, lordships, cities, villages, and other possessions beyond the sea; and of the benefices and possessions, and other revenues of all that are in rebellion against the pope: and of the carrying monies out of the realm by the collectors of the pope, or the procurators of cardinals, Lombards, or other persons: and likewise of the profits of our customs, and all subsidies granted to us by the clergy and laity, since the day of our coronation, to that time: and of all fees, wages, and rewards of our officers and ministers great and small, and of annuities and other rewards granted; and gifts made to any persons in fee or for term of life, or in any other manner: and of lands, tenements, rents, revenues, and forfeitures, bargained or sold to the prejudice and damage of our crown: and also touching the jewels and goods which were our grandfather's at the time of his death, and of charters and general pardons; and how general payments have been levied and expended; how garrisons and forts have been maintained: and of all defaults and misprisons as well in our household, as in our courts, and all other places of our realm: and by what persons our revenues and the substance of our crown have been withdrawn or diminished; or the common law interrupted or delayed, or any other damage that hath happened to us. Giving, and by these presents granting, of our authority, and by the advice and assent of our said subjects, unto our said counsellors, or any 6 of them, and to our great officers aforesaid, full power and authority, general and special, to enter our palace and household, and to call before them all our officers, and to command all rolls, records, and other monuments and evidences; and all defaults, wastes, and excesses found in our said household, and in other courts and places; and all deceits, extortions, oppressions, damages, and grievances whatsoever, that are to the prejudice, damage, and distress of us and our crown, and the estate of our said realm in general (though not herein particularly expressed and specified) to amend, correct, repair, redress, reform, and put into good and due order and establishment: and also to hear and receive the complaints of all our liege people, as well for us as themselves, against our said officers and counsellors: and all oppressions, wrongs, and injuries, which cannot so well be amended and determined in the courts of the common law: and to discuss and finally determine all the matters aforesaid, and full execution thereof to award, as to them shall seem most meet, for the honour and profits of us and our estate, and to the redintegration of the rights and profits of our crown, and the better governance of the peace and laws of our kingdom, and the relief of our said people. In which proceedings, if difference of opinion happen amongst our said counsellors, the same shall be concluded by majority of votes: and we command and charge all prelates, dukes, earls, barons, sheriffs, the treasurer, and comptroller, and all other officers of our household, justices de banco, and other officers, ministers, and liege subjects whatsoever, that to our said counsellors and officers in manner aforesaid, they be obedient, aiding and assisting. In witness whereof, &c. Given under our great seal the 19th day of November."

[A Subsidy granted.] It appears from the Record, that this parliament granted half a 10th in spirituals, and half a 15th on all temporals. They likewise gave the king of every tun of wine imported or exported, 3s.; and 12d. on every pound of merchandize, except of such staple commodities as wool-fells, &c. And that these subsidies might be well and truly expended, the same prudential care was taken in this as in other matters, that the money should be deposited in the hands of certain of the nobility appointed for that purpose. On the 20th of Nov. this parl. was dissolved; but the king's great candour and condescension in it was in a great measure sullied by the following memorandum, which is the last thing entered upon the roll, viz. "that the king came and made protestation, in full parl. with his own mouth, 'that for any thing which was done in that parl. he would not any prejudice should come to him, or his crown; but that the prerogative and liberties of it should be safe and preserved.'

It is necessary here, in order to keep up a proper connection, to deviate a little from our Parliamentary History, to learn what struggles the king made to get loose from the bonds which had been thus imposed upon him. In 1387, the king and queen made a progress into the west and northern parts of the kingdom. In his return from the latter, he held a council at Nottingham. The chief persons of which this council consisted, were, Alex. abp. of York; Rob. de Vere, lately created duke of Ireland; Mich. de la Pole, earl of Suffolk; Rob. Tresilian, chief justice of the King's Bench, and Nicholas Brembre of London, knights, who were the king's greatest favourites and advisers, and in whom he put his whole trust and confidence. This Council of State summoned all the sheriffs of the adjoining counties to Nottingham, and demanded of them what forces they were able to raise to assist the king against the lords if they were required to do it? The sheriffs answered, coldly, "That the people were generally persuaded that the lords were the king's friends, and that they sought the good of the nation in all they did, and therefore they believed they could get very few to oppose them." This disappointment was the less to these courtiers, because they knew that the lords were very popular, and they had still other projects to go upon. They next commanded the sheriffs and gentlemen, then attending on the summons, to suffer none to be returned as knights or burgesses for the next parl. but such as the king and his council should nominate. To which they replied, "That the people would be very hardly deprived of their antient privilege of choosing their own members of parl.; and that if there was a true freedom observed in choosing, it would be almost impossible to impose any person against the people's liking, especially, since, they would easily guess at the design, and stand the more resolutely upon their right." This answer of the sheriffs somewhat startled the council, because they built much on this invention; for what was done by a parl. would, as they imagined, carry a face of justice along with it, and their private revenge be turned into a public punishment. But, losing this point, they dismissed the sheriffs and gentlemen, and fell upon their last, but most desperate stratagem, which was to ruin them by law.

[Questions proposed to the Judges, and their Answers, relating to the late Commission.] To this end the king sent his summons for all the judges to attend him; and, on their appearance, a string of Questions or Articles, which were ready drawn up by sir Rob. Tresilian, chief justice of the king's bench, and one of the cabal, was proposed to them. These Articles Knyghton has given at large, and are as follow:—Be it remembered, That on the 25th of Aug. in the 11th year of the reign of k. Rich. II. at the castle of Nottingham, before our said lord the king, Rob. Tresilian, chief justice of England, and Rob. Belknappe, chief justice of the common bench of our said lord the king, John Holt, Roger Fulthorp, and Wm. de Burgh, knights, justices, and associates of the said Rob. Belknappe, and John de Lokton the king's serjeant at law, in the presence of the lords and other witnesses underwritten, were personally required by our said lord the king, on the faith and allegiance wherein to him the said king they are bound, to answer faithfully unto certain Questions here under specified, and to them then and there truly recited, and upon the same to declare the law according to their discretion, viz.—1. It was demanded of them, "Whether that new statute, ordinance and commission, made and published in the last parl. held at Westm. be not derogatory to the royalty and prerogative of our said lord the king?" To which they unanimously answered, that the same are derogatory thereunto, especially because they were against his will.—2. “How those are to be punished, who procured that statute and commission?” A. That they were to be punished with death, except the king would pardon them.—3. “How those are to be punished who moved the king to consent to the making of the said statute?” A. That they ought to lose their lives, unless his maj. would pardon them.—4. “What punishment they deserved who compelled, straightened or necessitated the king to consent to the making of the said statute and commission?” A. That they ought to suffer as traitors.—5. “How those are to be punished who hindered the king from exercising those things which appertain to his royalty and prerogative?” A. That they are to be punished as traitors.—6. “Whether after in a parl. assembled, the affairs of the kingdom, and the cause of calling that parl. are by the king’s command declared, and certain articles limited by the king, upon which the lords and commons in that parl. ought to proceed; if yet the said lords and commons will proceed altogether upon other articles and affairs, and not at all upon those limited and proposed to them by the king, until the king shall have first answered them upon the articles and matters so by them started and expressed, although the king’s command be to the contrary; whether in such case the king ought not to have the governance of the parl. and effectually over-rule them, so as that they ought to proceed first on the matters proposed by the king: or whether on the contrary, the lords and commons ought first to have the king’s answer upon their proposals before they proceeded further?” A. That the king in that behalf has the governance, and may appoint what shall be first handled, and so gradually what next in ail matters to be treated of in parl. even to the end of the parl.: and if any act contrary to the king’s pleasure made known therein, they are to be punished as traitors.—7. “Whether the king, whenever he pleases, can dissolve the parl. and command the lords and commons to depart from thence, or not?” A. That he can, and if any one shall then proceed in parl. against the king’s will, he is to be punished as a traitor.—8. “Since the king can, whenever he pleases, remove any of his judges and officers, and justify or punish them for their offences; whether the lords and commons can without the will of the king impeach in parl. any of the said judges or officers for any of their offences?” A. That they cannot, and if any one should do so, he is to be punished as a traitor.—9. “How he is to be punished who moved in parl. that the statute should be sent for, whereby Edw. II. (the king’s great grandfather) was proceeded against and deposed in parl.; by means of sending for and imposing which statute, the said late statute, ordinance, and commission, were devised and brought forth in parl.?” A. That as well he that so moved, as he who by pretence of that motion, carried the said statute to the parl. are traitors and criminals to be punished with death.—10. “Whether the judgment given in the last parl. held at Westm. against Mich. de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, was erroneous and revocable, or not?” A. That if that judgment were now to be given, they would not give it; because it seems to them, that the said judgment is revocable, as being erroneous in every part of it. In testimony of all which, the judges and serjeants aforesaid, to these presents have put their seals in the presence of the rev. lords, Alex. abp. of York, Rob. abp. of Dublin, John bp. of Durham, Tho. bp. of Chichester, and John bp. of Bangor, Rob. duke of Ireland, Mich. earl of Suffolk, John Rypon Clerk, and John Blake, esq; given the place, day, month, and year aforesaid.”

But though the king and his favourites had got the judges on their side, and had thus procured a colour of law for what they did; yet, the greatest difficulty remained behind, which was to arm themselves with power sufficient, to put these resolves into execution. To this purpose, they did their utmost to render themselves and their king popular; and at his majesty’s return to London, he was met and received by the mayor and citizens, with the greatest pomp and solemnity. But this joy was short lived, for the junto, soon after their arrival at Westm. had notice that the duke of Gloucester, with the earls of Arundel and Warwick, and a great body of armed men, were marching towards London. It was not long before these lords declared themselves, and being come with their army as far as Hackney, they sent the abp. of Canterbury; the lord John Lovel, the lord Cobham, the lord Devereux and others to the king with this message. “That they came to demand the persons who had seduced the king and were traitors, both to him and the kingdom. That it was purely for his majesty’s welfare and the good of the nation that they took up arms, in order that they might bring those traitors to justice, to the terror of all succeeding evil ministers.” They named 5 persons, who had the rule and govt. of every thing, both at home and abroad, and had given the king such pernicious advice, there specified, that, if it was followed, would be the ruin of them all. The king, finding that his favourites could no ways protect him, was forced at last to come to a compromise, and to refer all grievances to the decision of the next parliament.

[A new Parliament called] Writs were accordingly issued for a new parl. to meet on the 3d of Feb. 1388. But, in the body of the writs an equivocal clause was inserted; which was an order to return those persons that were the most indifferent in the present disputes. Which, being found out, the king was obliged to renew the writs, and even to specify that the clause, abovementioned, was put in contrary to the ancient form. The parl. being met on the day appointed, Tho. Fitz-Alan, bp. of Ely and lord chanc. declared the cause of the summons to be, "to consider by what means the troubles in the kingdom, for want of good govt. might be ended; the king better advised; the realm better governed; misdemeanours more severely punished, and good men better encouraged. How the kingdom might be best defended, the sea best kept, the marches of Scotland best guarded, Gascoigny preserved, and how the charges of these things might be born with the most ease to the people." And then he gave notice, "That those who would complain in that parl. of any thing which could not well be reversed at common-law, might carry their petitions to the clerks in chancery, there named, and appointed to receive them." Then the duke of Gloucester fell on his knees before the king, and said, "That he understood his maj. had been informed, that he was about to depose him and make himself king; and offered to stand to the award and judgment of his peers in parl." Upon this, the king declared, openly, "That he did not think him guilty, and fully excused him." The lords spiritual and temporal, then present, claimed as their liberty and franchise, that all great matters moved in that parl. or to be moved in any future parl. touching peers of the land, should be discussed and judged by course of parl.; and not by the civil or common law of the land used in the lower courts of the kingdom. Which claim, liberty and franchise, the king, in full parl. readily allowed and granted.

[Five Lords lodge an Appeal against the King's Ministers.] Then five lords, who were called Appellants, because they were the accusers of the late ministers, whose names were Thomas duke of Gloucester, Henry earl of Derby, Richard earl of Arundel, Thomas earl of Warwick, and Thomas earl of Nottingham, earl-marshal, stood up and made open protestation, in full parl. touching their appeal and suit in that parl. and that what had before been done, by the assistance of the people, in their company, or retinue, "was done principally, to the honour of God, in aid and safety of the king and his kingdom, and the security of all their lives." After this, the lords and commons granted half a 10th and half a 15th, with protestation, that it was done of necessity, and that it might be no prejudice to the lords and commons for time to come, because it was so granted; and further, they prayed the king, that notwithstanding this grant so made, the parl. might hold on its course; and be adjourned if need were; and that all things touching the said parl. might be done and executed, as if the grant had not been made till the end thereof, as in manner accustomed. Which request the king granted. The parl. further gave the king, in defence of the realm, a subsidy upon leather, wool and wool-fells; on condition, that the five Lords Appellants should have out of it 20,000l. by assent and grant of the king, "for their labour and expences, before that time, which they had been at for the honour, profit, and safety of the king and the whole kingdom." The Commons prayed, "That no person, of what degree soever, do intermeddle with the business of the kingdom, nor the king's council, but those assigned in this parl. unless it be by order of the continual council. And also that they might have power to remove all persons from the king whom they thought fit to remove, and put others in their places." To which the king's answer was, "As to the 1st part of the article the king granted it;" and as to the 2nd, "If any lord of the council, or other lord of the kingdom will inform the king that he had about him any person, not sufficient or honest, if it be so proved, he shall be removed and another more able, by his own consent, put in his place."

[Each Member swears to support the Lords Appellants.] And now, as a prelude to what was going to be acted, each of the prelates, lords and commons, then assembled, had the following oath administrated to them, upon the rood, or cross, of Canterbury, in full parl. "You shall swear, That you will keep and cause to be kept the good peace, quiet, and tranquillity of the kingdom: and if any will do to the contrary thereof, you shall oppose and disturb him to the utmost of your power. And if any people will do any thing against the bodies of the persons of the five lords; that is to say, Thos. duke of Gloucester, Henry Earl of Derby, Rd. earl of Arundel and Surry, Thos. earl of Warwick, and Thos. earl-marshal, or any of them, you shall stand with them to the end of this present parl. and maintain and support them with all your power, to live and die with them against all men, no person or any other thing excepted, saving always your allegiance to the king, and the prerogatives of his crown, the laws and good customs of the kingdom." After the taking of this oath, Easter being near, the parl. was adjourned till 15 days after that festival. Then the 5 Lords Appellants, before mentioned, exhibited the following

"I. That as false traitors to the king and realm, seeing the tender age of our said lord the king, and the innocency of his royal person, they had by many false contrivances, by them without loyalty or good faith imagined and suggested, endeavoured wholly to engross his majesty's affection, and to make him intirely give faith and credence to what they should say, though never so pernicious to himself and his realm, and to hate his loyal lords and people, by whom he would more faithfully have been served; encroaching and assuming to themselves a power to the disfranchising our lord the king of his sovereignty, and impairing his royal prerogative and dignity, making him so far obey them, that he hath been sworn to be governed and counselled by them only; by means of which oath, and the power they have so traitorously usurped, great inconveniences, mischiefs, and destructions have happened, as by the subsequent articles will appear.—II. Whereas the king is not bound to make any oath to any of his subjects, but on the day of his coronation, or for the common profit of him and his realm, the said bp. duke and earl, false traitors to the king and realm, have made him swear and assent to them, that he will maintain and defend them, and live and dye with them. And so whereas the king ought to be of a free condition above any other in his realm, they have brought him more into servitude and bondage, against his honour, estate, and royalty, contrary to their allegiance, and as traitors unto him.—III. The said traitors by the assent and council of Robert Tresilian the false justice, and Nicholas Brembre the false knight of London, by their false covin would not at all suffer the great persons of the realm, nor the good subjects of the king, to speak to, or approach the king, to give him wholesome advice, nor the king to speak to them, unless in the presence and hearing of them, the said duke of Ireland, &c. or two of them, at their will and pleasure, or about such things as they thought fit, to the great disgrace of the nobles and good councillors of the king, and to the preventing of their good will, and service towards the king, thereby encroaching to themselves the royal power, and a lordship and sovereignty over the person of the king to the great dishonour and peril of the king, his crown and realm.—IV. The said abp. &c. by such their false devices and pernicious councils, have diverted the king from shewing due countenance to his great lords and liege people, so that they could not be answered in their suits and rights, without the leave of them the said abps. &c. Thereby putting the king besides his devoir, contrary to his oath, contriving to alienate the heart of our lord the king from his people, that they might engross amongst themselves only the govt. of the realm; whereby they have caused our lord the king, without the assent of the realm, or any desert in them, to have given away by their abatement many lordships, castles, towns, and manors, as well annexed to his crown as others; as particularly the land of Ireland and Okeham, with the forest and lands which did belong to the lord Dandelegh, and great quantities of other lands to the said duke of Ireland, and divers others, whereby they unworthily are vastly enriched, but the king rendered poor, and unable to sustain and defray the charges of the govt. unless by impositions, heavy taxes and tributes laid upon his people, to the disinheriton of his crown, and the destruction of the realm.—V. By such encroachment of the said abp. &c. and by the counsel of that false justice Tresilian, and Brembre the false knight of London, they have caused our lord the king to have given away divers manors, lands, tenements, offices, and bailiwicks, to divers other persons their creatures, and such as they could confide in, and to others of whom they have taken great gifts by way of brokage for that purpose, and to stand by them in their false suits and ill purposes, to the great prejudice of the king and realm, such as sir Rob. Mansel clerk, John Blake, Thomas Usk, and divers others.—VI. The said duke, &c. encroaching to themselves the royal power, have caused the king to give very great gifts of gold and silver, as well of his proper goods and jewels, as of the goods and treasure of the realm; as 10ths, 15ths, and other taxes, granted by divers parliaments, to be expended for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom, which yet to the value of 100,000 marks have been lavished away upon the said duke of Ireland, and others. And though many good ordinances and laws have been made in parl. as well for maintaining and carrying on of wars, as for the defence of the realm; yet they have been by them disturbed and defeated, to the great dishonour and damage of the king and realm.—VII. By such encroachment, and the great gifts and brokages taken by the said duke of Ireland, &c. it came to pass that divers unfit and insufficient persons were preferred to, and entrusted with the keeping and govt. of divers garrisons, castles and countries involved in war, as in Guyenne and elsewhere, both beyond and on this side the sea, whereby the said strong holds have been lost, the countries wasted, and the people, faithful subjects to the king, destroyed; and great seignories newly rendered into the hands and possessions of enemies, without the assent of the realm, as the marches of Scotland, &c. to the disinheriton of the king's crown, and the great loss of the kingdom, as in Harpeden and Craddock, and divers others.—VIII. By the same means, the said abp. and his fellow-traitors, have caused divers people to be disturbed and deprived of right and the common-law of England, and put to intolerable delays, losses and costs; and the statutes and judgments which rightfully for necessary causes have been made and given in parl. have been reversed and annulled by the procurement of the said malefactors and traitors; and all this because of the great gifts and brokages by them received of parties, to the grand mischief of the king and realm.—IX. The said abp. and other traitors have caused and counselled our lord the king, to grant charters of pardon of horrible felonies and treasons, as well against the state of the king, as of the person injured and prosecuting; which thing is against the king, and the oath of the king.—X. Whereas the said seignories of the land of Ireland are, and time out of mind have been, parcel of the crown of England; and the people of Ireland, liege subjects to our lord the king, and his royal progenitors kings of England, who in all their charters, writs, letters patents, and in all their seals, have for the augmentation of their renown and royalty been entitled lords of Ireland; yet the said abp. &c. as false traitors, by their said encroachment, have caused and counselled our lord the king, as much as in him lies, to have granted and fully assented and accorded, that the said Robert de Vere, duke of Ireland, should be made king of Ireland: and to compleat such their ill purpose, have advised and excited our said lord the king to send his letters to our holy father the pope, to grant, ratify and confirm this their traiterous design, without the privity, or assent of his realm of England, and of the said land of Ireland, to the dividing the legiance of the king between his realm of England, and the said land of Ireland; in diminution of his majesty's honourable stile, and open disinherison of the crown of England, and full destruction of the lawful liege subjects of our lord the king, and of the said land of Ireland.—XI. Whereas by the Great Charter, and other good laws and usages of the realm of England, no man is to be taken, nor any prisoner put to death without the due process of law; the said Nich. Brembre, the false knight of London, did take by night certain prisoners, to the number of 22, out of the gaol of Newgate, some of them being indicted and appealed of felony, and some approvers in cases of felony, and some on suspicion of felony, and carried them out of London into Kent, to a place called Foulhoke; and there encroaching on the royal power, and in defiance of the said laws, as a traitor to the king, did without any process of law, cause them all to be beheaded, except one who was appealed of felony, by an approver, whom he set at large at the same time.—XII. The aforesaid abp. and other traitors have in small causes taken great gifts in the name of the king, of divers parties, to maintain and abate them in their suits and quarrels, and sometimes have played the ambo-dexters, and taken money of both sides.—XIII. Whereas divers of the great lords, loyal subjects to the king, in divers parliaments, seeing the dangers, and apprehending the destruction threatening the king and realm, by means of the mischiefs of these malefactors, have moved to have good governance under the king, to avoid the said perils: the forenamed abp. and other traitors, by their encroachments and fatal influences, have so ordered matters, that the king has not only been deaf to all such persuasions, but also has commanded some of those that moved it, to depart from his council, and to speak no more of such matters, nor touching the good governance of the king and kingdom, on pain of death; to the great prejudice of the king and kingdom.—XIV. Whereas in the last parl. all the lords and other sages there assembled, (seeing the loss and destruction of the king and realm, and the perils and mischiefs aforesaid; and that the king was departed from the council of the realm, and wholly abandoned himself to the counsels of the said malefactors and traitors; by means whereof the French king had ships, and a royal power on the sea, ready to have arrived in England, the said realm, and the very language of England to destroy; and that no provision was made, or good governance taken for the safety of the king nor realm,) finding no other remedy, did remonstrate to the king very fully, how he was ill-advised, and affairs most perniciously managed by the aforesaid traitors and malefactors, declaring to him their wicked conditions; and most humbly beseeching him for the safety of himself, and of all his realm, and avoiding the said impending dangers, to forsake and turn these traitors from his presence and company, and no longer to conduct himself after their evil council; but to hearken to the sage, loyal, and discreet persons of his realm: whereupon the said abp. and other traitors, to defeat this wholesome advice of the parl. by their false council did then cause the king to command the mayor of London suddenly to levy a great power of the people of that city, to attack and put to death all the said lords and commons, except such as were of their cabal: at the execution of which villainy, the said great malefactors and traitors should be present and parties, to the scandal and great disservice of the king and his realm.—XV. When the said abp. and other traitors perceived that the said mayor and good people of London, had openly refused in the presence of the king, to accomplish such their treachery and lewd purposes, touching the murder of the said lords and commons: they then by such their traiterous encroachment falsely advised the king, and so far prevailed, that our lord the king did absent himself from his parl. for many days, and did certify them, "That he would never approach the said parl. nor commune with the said lords and commons touching the affairs of the realm, for any danger, loss, or mischief that might happen to him or his realm, unless he were first assured by the said lords and commons, that they would not say nor act any thing in that parl. against any of the said malefactors, save only in the process which was begun against Mich. de la Pole: all which was to the disservice of the king and his realm, and contrary to the ancient ordinance and liberties of parl.—XVI. The said lords and commons of the realm, after they found the king's will by the malignant counsel and excitement of the said abp. and other traitors to be such, that he would not suffer any thing to be commenced, prosecuted, or done against the said malefactors and traitors; were pleased to acquiesce, and not proceed therein any further against his pleasure. And afterwards in the said parl. taking the advice and counsel of all the lords, judges, and other sages and commons of the said parl. how the estate of the king and his royalty might best be preserved from the perils and mischiefs aforesaid, could not find any apter expedient, than to ordain, that 11 of the loyal and sage lords of the land, should be of council to the king for one year then next ensuing: and that there should be made during that time, a statute and commission, whereby they should have full and sufficient power to order matters for the govt. of the king and of the realm, and what appertained to the king, as well on this side as beyond the seas: and to repel, repair, and redress whatever should have been ill done against the estate, honour and profit of the king and kingdom, and to do divers other things necessary for the king and realm, as in the commission thereupon issued, and remaining of record in chancery, is contained. And that no person should presume to counsel the king, or any way move him against the said ordinance and statute, on pain of forfeiting for the 1st offence, all their goods and chattels, and pain of death for the 2nd: such expedient and ordinance to be made, if it would so please the king, and not otherwise. To which ordinance or statute, all the judges of the land agreed, and gave their consent unto, and advice for the same, as well in presence of the king, as of the lords. And also, our lord the king did fully give his assent to the same; and thereupon the said ordinance, statute and commission, were made and accorded unto by the assent of the king, and of the said lords and judges, and other sages and commons assembled in that parl. for the safety of the king, his royalty and realm. And yet after the end of the said parl. the aforesaid traitors and malefactors by such their evil encroachments, falsely and traiterously did inform the king, that the said ordinance, statute and commission were made in derogation of his royalty; and that all those who procured or advised the making thereof, or counselled the king to assent thereunto, were worthy of death as traitors to the king.—XVII. That after this, the said traitors, the abp. bp. &c. caused the king to assemble a council of certain of the lords-justices and others, without the assent or presence of the said lords of the great council, to whom they made many demands, and very much suspicious, touching divers matters, whereby the king, the lords and the common people have been involved in most grievous trouble, the whole realm disquieted, and the hearts of many withdrawn from the king, saving their allegiance.—XVIII. To accomplish the said high-treasons, the said traitors, the abp. &c. caused the king to go with some of them throughout the midst of his realm, and to make the lords, knights, esqrs, and other good people, as well in cities and boroughs, as in other places, to come before him, and there to become bound, some by obligation, others by their oaths, to our said lord the king, to be with him against all people, and to accomplish the purpose of the king which at that time was to accomplish the will and purposes of the said malefactors and traitors, drawn in thereunto by their false contrivances, flatteries and deceits: which securities and oaths were made against the good laws and usages of the land, and contrary to the oath of the king, to the great dishonour of the king and kingdom; by means of which oaths so enforced, the whole realm was embroiled in great murmurs and trouble by the said traitors, and in danger to have suffered divers important mischiefs.—XIX. To enforce their purposes, the said traitors caused the king to absent himself in the furthest parts of his realm, to the intent that the lords appointed by the said ordinance, statute and commission, might not confer and advise with him touching the affairs of the realm: to the interruption and hindrance of the purport and effect of the said statute and commission, and great prejudice of the king and realm.—XX. The said malefactors and traitors, after they had estranged both the person and good will of the king, from the said lords so commissioned, and that he esteemed them traitors and enemies; and that they had obtained the opinions of the judges suited to their wicked purposes, did agree and design, that several of the lords, and also divers loyal commons, should be first arrested and then indicted in London and in Middlesex, and by false inquests attainted of certain treasons falsely imagined against them, and so put to shameful death: to which purpose they had procured an evil and false person of their conspiracy, called Thomas Usk, to be under-sheriff, by whose means the said false inquests were to be taken, and the wicked design accomplished by colour of law. And for the more compleat effecting thereof, they caused the king to send his letters of credence by John Rypon, a false clerk, and one of their crew, directed to the mayor of London, that he should seize the duke of Gloucester, and others therein named, to be indicted for certain treasons, in such manner as the said Nich. Brembre the false knight, and John Blake, who were thereof fully informed, should direct: by virtue of which letters of credence, Brembre and Blake carried to the mayor the said false indictment, commanding him on behalf of the king, that to his power he should promote the same: and also they ordered, that a strong watch should be set, to seize the duke of Lancaster upon his first arrival.—XXI. The said traitors having traiterously informed the king, that he should believe that the said ordinance, statute and commission, were made in derogation of his royalty and prerogative; did further persuade him, that the same was made with an intention to degrade, and finally to depose our lord the king: and perceiving that thereby he looked upon his loyal lords as traitors and enemies; they yet further advised him, that by all means possible, as well by the power of his own liege people, as by the force of his enemies, the French and others, he should destroy and put to death the said lords and others, that assented to the making of the said ordinance, and that the same might be done so privily that none should know of it till it was done.—XXII. In order to these treasons, by their counsels they caused the king to send letters to his enemy the French king, some by Nich. Southwell, groom of his chamber, and others, by other persons of base condition, as well aliens as denizens, requiring and praying the said French king, that he would with all his power and counsel, aid and assist our lord the king, to destroy and put to death the said lords and others, whom they had so falsely represented as traitors, to the great disturbance of the whole realm.—XXIII. That usurping to themselves royal power, they caused the king to promise the French king by his letters patents and messages, for such his assistance, to accomplish the said treason and murder, to give and surrender to the said French king, the town and castle of Calais, and divers other forts and places; as Brest, Cherburgh, and others, &c. to the great dishonour, trouble and prejudice of the realm.—XXIV. That after this traiterous contrivance, it was agreed between our lord the king and the French king, by the instigation and influence of these traitors, that a parley or interview should be had in the marches of Calais, and a truce of 5 years between the realms of England and France: at which interview, by treachery, the said lords and others whom the king took for traitors, attending him thither, should there be slain. In order to which they procured several letters of safe conduct from the said French king, for the said duke of Ireland's going into France, to accomplish this ill purpose and treason, which letters are ready to be shewn.—XXV. That the said Brembre, by the assent and council of the said other traitors, did come into London, and without the assent or knowledge of the king, did cause all the companies of the city to be sworn, to hold and perform divers matters, as they are contained in the said oath, which is of record in chancery: and amongst other things, that they should hold with and maintain the will and purpose of the king to their power, against all that are or shall be rebels, or contrary to his person, or royal pleasure: and that they should be ready to destroy all those which do or shall purpose treason against our said lord the king, in any manner; and be ready with their mayor to resist during life, all such traitors, &c. At which time the king, by the mis-information of the said evil-doers and traitors, and by the false answers of the judges, did firmly hold the said lords and others, who assented to the making of the said ordinance, statute and commission, to be rebels, traitors, and enemies unto him: by all which, the said traitors endeavoured to stir up the said people of London, to destroy the said lords and other loyal subjects.—XXVI. The said Brembre and other traitors to the king and realm, usurping to themselves royal power, did of their own authority, without any warrant from the king or his great council, cause proclamation to be made through the city of London, that none of the liege subjects of our lord the king, should sustain, comfort, or aid Rd. earl of Arundel and Surrey, one of the lords of the king's great council, during the said commission; nor sell him any armour, victuals, or other necessities, on pain of being proceeded against as rebels, carrying about and shewing a patent of the king's, but of another tenor; the better to compass such their false proclamation.—XXVII. They also caused it to be cried and proclaimed in the city of London, that no person should be so hardy as to presume to speak any ill, or utter any word or expression against them the said malefactors and traitors, or any of them, on pain of forfeiting all they had; which was an encroachment on the royal power.—XXVIII. The said abp. chief justice, and other traitors, caused the king to command his council to make certain persons throughout England sheriffs, who were named to him by them the said traitors, with an intent to get such persons as they should name returned for knights of the shire to serve in parl. and to keep out from thence gentlemen good and loyal, against the good laws and customs of the land.—XXIX. The said traitors, during the time that the king had so taken both parties into his protection as aforesaid, did falsely counsel and prevail with the king to command by his letters divers knights and esquires, sheriffs, and other ministers of several counties, to levy men, and assemble all their power, to join with the said duke of Ireland, against the said three lords now appealing, suddenly to make war upon and destroy them.—XXX. During the time of the same protection, they caused the king by his royal letters, to signify to the said duke of Ireland, not only that he and others were appealed of treason as aforesaid; but also that he should have sufficient power to guard him, and come with him to the king. And afterwards caused him to write again to the said d. of Ireland, that he should take the field with all the forces he could assemble; and that the king would meet with all his troops, and would expose and venture his royal person: and that the king was in great peril for himself and his realm, unless succoured and aided by the said duke: and that the said duke should shew and declare to all the people assembled with him, that the king would bear and pay all debts and costs of the said duke of Ireland, and all that joined with him. By virtue of which letters, and the evil and traiterous instigation as well of the said duke, as of his adherents and other traitors, the said duke of Ireland did actually levy and assemble great numbers of men at arms, and archers, as well of the counties of Lancaster, Cheshire, and Wales, as of other places of the realm, in warlike manner, to destroy and put to death the said lords, who had consented to the making the said ordinance, act of parl. and commission, in defence of the king and realm.—XXXI. That having thus traiterously levied forces, the said duke marched with them through the midst of England, and usurping the royal power, did cause the king's banner to be displayed before him, contrary to the estate of the king, and of his crown. In which march the said duke and his accomplices were by the grace of God disturbed, and prevented from their evil purposes.—XXXII. That the said duke of Ireland, by the counsel and abetment of the rest of the forenamed traitors, encroaching to himself the royal power, without the usual commission of the king, or other sufficient warrant, did make himself justice of Chester, by him and his deputies to hold there all manner of pleas of the crown, and thereupon to give judgment and award execution:

and also caused divers original and judicial writs to be sealed with the great seal of the king in that behalf used: and thereby compelled a great part of the people of those counties to join with him, or otherwise put some of them to grievous and tormenting death, imprisoned some, and seized the lands of others, &c. And all this to make war and destroy the said lords, and other loyal subjects of the king, and against the defence of the realm.—XXXIII. That the said traitors have caused the king to grant great retinues to divers people, and give them badges and ensigns otherwise than ever was used in the time of any of his progenitors; and this with design to gain greater power to accomplish their treasons.—XXXIV. Fully to complete all such their before-mentioned and other treasons, and to make the king wholly confide in, and rely upon them and their counsels, they caused the king to call before him divers justices and people of the law; that is to say, Rob. Tresilian, Robert Belknap, John Cary, John Holt, Roger Fulthorp, Wm. Burgh, six justices, John Locktan, serjeant at law, and John Blake: of whom he did by the contrivance of the said traitors, demand, Whether the before-mentioned act of parliament and commission were made in derogation of his royalty and prerogative, or not? and several other questions; to which they answered in manner and form before set forth," &c.

[Proceedings thereupon.] This Impeachment was exhibited the 3d of Feb. being the 1st day of the parl. when the lords Appellants also affirmed, "They were ready to prove every article of it, as should be awarded in parl. to the honour of God, and the advantage and profit of the king, and the whole realm." Whereupon all the persons appealed, were, by command of the king and lords, solemnly summoned in the great hall at Westminster, as also at the gates of the said palace, to come in and answer the said Appellants; but upon their non-appearance, the said duke and lords Appellants prayed, that their default might be recorded. Then, upon the said Appellants alledging, that the accused had full notice of the said appeal, and the king and lords being satisfied it was so, by reason they did not appear, their default was recorded accordingly; whereupon the said duke and earls Appellants prayed the king and lords, "that they might be adjudged and convicted of the treasons contained in the said appeal." Then the king commanded the lords to examine the articles severally, which they did with great labour and diligence, until the 13th of February.

During this interval, the justices, serjeants, and other sages of the law, both of the realm and of the civil law, were charged by the king to give their faithful advice to the lords of parl. how they ought to proceed in the said appeal. Who answered, "That they well understood the tenor of the said appeal; and affirmed, that it was not made nor brought according as the one law or other required. Upon which, the said lords of parl. having taken deliberation and advice, it was by the assent of the king, with their common accord declared, "That in so high a crime as is laid in this appeal, and which touches the person of the king, and the estates of this realm, and is perpetrated by persons who are peers thereof, together with others, the cause cannot be tried elsewhere, but in parl. nor by any other law, or court, except that of parl.; and that it belongs to the lords of parl. and to their free choice and liberty, by ancient custom of parl. to be judges in such cases, and to judge of them by the assent of the king; and thus it shall be done in this case, by award of parl. because the realm of England is not, nor ever was (neither is it the intent of the king, and lords of parl. that it shall ever be) ruled or governed by the law civil; and therefore it is not their intent, otherwise to proceed in so high a case as this appeal, which cannot be tried or determined any where else than in parl.; since the process or order used in inferior courts, is only as they are entrusted with the execution of the ancient laws and customs of the realm, and the ordinances and establishments of parl.; and it was the judgment of the lords of parl. by assent of the king, that this appeal was well and duly brought, and the process upon the same was good and effectual, according to the laws and course of parliament, and by which they will award and judge it."

Upon this, the Appellants again moved the king and lords to record their default; and that Nich. Brembre, who was the only person in custody, might be brought to answer. Then the other persons appealed were again summoned to come in and make answer, but they did not appear; nevertheless the king and lords took time to deliberate till the 5th of Feb. at which time the said Appellants again prayed, that the default of the Appealed might be re-recorded; which was done accordingly. After which, the abp. of Canterbury, in behalf of himself, and all other the suffragan bishops, with the abbots, priors, and other prelates, holding of the king by barony, made protestation, and delivered it in writing, "For the saving of their right of peerage, and sitting and voting in parl. notwithstanding they could not now be there, by reason of certain matters then in agitation, at which, by the canons, they could not be personally present." The like protestation was made by the bps. of Durham and Carlisle; which protestation being at the instance of the abp. and other prelates, read in full parl. was by the command of the king, and assent of the lords temporal, entered in the rolls of parliament. See Rot. Parl. No. 9 et 10.

On the 13th of Feb. the king and lords of parl. being met again in the Whitehall, the said Appellants prayed, that the last default of the said abp. duke, and earl, with Rob. Tresilian, should be recorded. Then the persons accused being again summoned, the third time, and not appearing, the lords proceeded to judgment, and declared, "That divers of the articles therein contained, were treason, as the 1st, 2d, 10th, 11th, 14th, 16th, 17th, 22d, 23d, 24th, 29th, 30th, and 31st articles; and then upon due information of their consciences they pronounced the said abp. duke, and earl, with Rob. Tresilian, "to be notoriously guilty of each of the said articles that concerned them; and that they were also culpable in all the rest of the articles contained in the said appeal, not yet declared treason." Then in presence of the king, and lords assembled, at the day and place aforesaid, the said duke and earls Appellants prayed the king, and lords there present, "That the persons so appealed, as aforesaid, should be adjudged convicted of the High Treason contained in the said appeal." Wherefore the said lords of parl. there present, as judges of parl. in this case, by assent of the king, pronounced their sentence, and did adjudge the said abp. duke, and earl, with Rob. Tresilian, so appealed as aforesaid, "to be guilty and convicted of treason, and to be drawn and hanged as traitors, and enemies to the king and kingdom, and that their heirs should be disinherited for ever, and their lands and tenements, goods and chattels, forfeited to the king; and that the temporalities of the abp. of York should be taken into the king's hands;" and because the like case had not been seen in the kingdom, concerning the person of an abp. or bp. the lords would advise by the assent of the king what they should best do, for the honour of God, and of holy church, and the safety of the laws of the land, about him.

Then the duke and earls Appellants prayed that sir Nich. Brembre might be brought to answer, and on Monday the 17th of Feb. the constable of the tower brought him into the parl. where the articles of appeal were read before him, to which he pleaded not guilty in any point, and said, "he was there ready to make good what he said by his body, as a knight ought to do." The lords answered, "Battle did not lie in that case, and that they would examine the articles touching the said Nicholas, and take true information by all true, necessary and convenient ways, that their consciences might be truly directed what judgment to give in this case, to the honour of God, the advantage and profit of the king, and his kingdom, and as they would answer it before God, according to the course and law of parl."

On the 19th of Feb. sir Rob. Tresilian was taken, being concealed in an apothecary's house in Palace-yard, and brought into parl.; who being asked if he had any thing to say which had happened since judgment had passed upon him, why execution should not be done? and he having nothing to say, it was commanded, "That he should be carried to the Tower; and from thence drawn upon a hurdle through the city of London, to the gallows at Tyburn, and there to hang by the neck; and that the execution should be done upon him by the marshal of England, taking to his assistance the mayor, sheriffs and aldermen of London:" and he was executed the same day accordingly.

On the 20th of Feb. sir Nich. Brembre was brought into parl. and the lords upon diligent examination, due proof and information, found him also guilty of high treason, and they awarded by assent of the king, "That as a traitor, and open enemy to the king and kingdom, he should be drawn and hanged, his heirs for ever disinherited, and his lands and tenements, goods and chattels forfeited to the king." He was executed on the same day accordingly, and in the same manner as was sir Rob. Tresilian.

Resolution of Parl. for saving the King's honour.] It was then resolved to be the intention of the lords of parl. spiritual and temporal, as well the lords Appellants, as all others, and by them agreed, "That considering the tender age of the king before that time, and the innocency of his royal person, nothing contained in the appeal, nor in any article thereof, nor in the judgment given, should be accounted any fault or dishonesty in his person, in any manner, for the causes abovesaid, nor should turn in prejudice of his person by any contrivance or interpretation whatever; but that the false treason and default abovesaid, should be charged upon the appealed, and that the judgments given against them should have full force and virtue, notwithstanding any thing that could be said or alledged to the contrary."

Sir Rob. Belknap, chief justice, and others impeached.] On the 2d of March, sir Rob. Belknap, late chief justice of the common bench, sir Roger Fulthorp, sir John Holt and sir Wm. Burgh, late his companions of the same bench: sir John Cary, late chief baron of the exchequer, and John Lockton, late serjeant to the king, were accused and impeached by the commons in parl. "for putting their hands and seals to the questions and answers given at Nottingham as aforesaid, by the procurement of the said appealed and convicted persons of treason, to cover and affirm their high treasons, &c. a copy whereof was exhibited and read before them, and that questions were answered, as was surmised by the commons in the said copy;" to which the Appealed replied, "They could not deny, but that the questions were such as were then asked them, but the answers were not such as they put their seals to." But sir Rob. Belknap pleaded in particular, "That the abp. of York, in his chamber at Windsor, told him, that he had devised and drawn up the commission and statute, whereby the govt. was wholly taken out of the king's hands, and that he therefore hated him above all men, and that if he found not some way to make void the said statute and commission, he should be slain as a traitor." He answered, "That the intention of the lords, and such as assisted at the making of them, was, that they should be for the honour and good govt. of the state of the king and kingdom: that he twice parted from the king dissatisfied, and was in doubt of his life, and said these answers proceeded not from his good will, but were made against his mind, and were the effects of the threats of the abp. of York, duke of Ireland, and earl of Suffolk; and that he was sworn and commanded in the presence of the king, upon pain of death, to conceal this matter, as the council of the king;" and prayed for the love of God he might have a gracious and merciful judgment. Sir John Holt alledged the same matter of excuse, and made the same prayer, so did Sir Wm. Burgh and sir John Cary; who all made the same excuse, and the same requests, as did also sir Roger Fulthorp and John Lockton serjeant at law. To all which the commons answered, "They were taken and holden for sages in the law, and the king's will was, that they should have answered the questions as the law was, and nor otherwise, as they did, with design and under colour of law, to murder and destroy the lords, and loyal lieges, who were aiding and assisting in making the commission and statute in the last parl. for the good govt. of the state of the king and kingdom;" and therefore the commons prayed they may be adjudged, convicted and attainted as traitors. Upon which the lords temporal took time to examine the matter and circumstances of it; "and for that they were present at the making of the said statute and commission, which they knew were contrived for the honour of God, and for the good govt. of the state of the king and whole kingdom; and that it was the king's will they should not have otherwise answered them than according to law, and had answered as before:" they were by the lords temporal, by the assent of the king, adjudged "to be drawn and hanged as traitors, their heirs disherited, and their lands and tenements, goods and chattels, to be forfeited to the king."

The next day John Blake and Tho. Usk were brought into parl.; and first John Blake was impeached by the commons, "that being retained of council for the king, he drew up the questions, to which the justices made answer, and contrived with the persons appealed, that the lords, and other the king's loyal lieges that caused the said commission and statute to be made in the last parl. should be indicted in London and Middlesex for treason; and that they should be arrested and traitorously and wickedly murdered; and that he was aiding and advising in the treasons aforesaid, with the Appealed already executed." Then Tho. Usk was accused "for procuring himself to be made under-sheriff of Middlesex, to the end to cause the said lords and loyal lieges to be arrested and indicted, as had been said before, and was aiding and counselling the appealed in the treasons aforesaid." John Blake answered, "that he was retained of counsel for the king, by his command, and sworn to keep secret his advice; and whatever he did it was by the king's command, whom he ought to obey;" and Tho. Usk gave the same answer. Whereupon the lords temporal took deliberation until the morrow, when the said John and Thomas were again brought into parliament; and the lords pronounced them guilty of the things whereof they were accused. And, "whereas they alledged for their excuse the king's command, it made the crime the greater; for that they knew well that the persons appealed and condemned had encroached to themselves royal power; and it was their command and not the king's." Then the lords awarded, by assent of the king, "that they should both be hanged and drawn, as traitors and open enemies to the king and kingdom, and their heirs disherited for ever, and their lands and tenements, goods and chattels, forfeited to the king;" and they were executed the same day.

On the 6th of March, sir Rob. Belknap, sir Roger Fulthorp, sir John Holt, sir Wm. Burgh, sir John Cary and John Lockton, were brought into the parl. and the lords were satisfied, "that they were at the making of the said commission and statute in the last parl. and sir John Cary knew well they were made to the honour of God, and the good govt. of the state of the king and the whole kingdom," and so on, as in the other processes; and they had judgment again passed upon them as before. But at that very time came in the abp. of Canterbury, and all the bps. of both provinces, and prayed the lords temporal, "that the execution as to their lives might be respited, so that they might obtain their lives of the king:" who thereupon ordered execution should be stayed, and granted them their lives. But as to the other part of their sentence, "that was to remain in force, and their bodies to be in prison during the king's pleasure; until by advice of the lords he should direct otherwise."

The Bp. of Chichester and others impeached.] The same day Tho. Rushooke, bp. of Chichester, the king's confessor, was impeached and accused by the commons, "that he was present at the places and times when the said questions were put to the justices, &c. and the answers made, and excited them by threats to answer as they did, and knew the false purposes and treasons designed by the traitors adjudged, and aided and assisted them, and would not make discovery to any of the lords that caused the said commission to be made last parl. whereby remedy might have been had for the safety of the king and kingdom." To which the bp. answered, "that of his own free will he had not excited them to do or say any thing;" and further said, "they were not excited or charged to say any thing but what the law was; and touching the concealment of the treason, he had made such assurance as he could not discover." And said further, "that the traitors were about the king, and had such power over him before, that he had not so great interest in the king, as to prevent those mischiefs that now came upon him." The commons replied, "he had upon the matter confessed himself guilty, and prayed he might be attainted." Upon this answer of the bp. the replication of the commons, and all circumstances of the accusation, the lords took time to give such judgment as might be for the honour of God, and profit of the king and kingdom.

On the 12th, Simon Burley, J. Beauchamp of Holt, J. Salisbury, and J. Berners, knights, being brought into parl. they were at the instance of the commons impeached. The articles exhibited against them were 16; the first art. in the appeal was the first art. in the former impeachment. In the 2nd art. they were accused "as traitors and enemies of the kingdom, for that they knew of all the treasons in the appeal mentioned, and that they were aiding, assisting, counselling, and assenting to all the traitors attainted; and that Simon Burley and J. Beauchamp were principal actors in all the said treasons." In the 8th art. they were accused "for conspiring and designing with the 5 persons appealed, to destroy and put to death those who were assenting to the making of the said commission and statute in the last parl." To which they all pleaded not guilty. The commons replied, "they were guilty;" and the lords took time to examine and consider the impeachment. Upon this, and the bp. of Chichester's impeachment, the lords temporal adjourned till the 5th of May, when sir Simon Burley being brought into the parl. was by the lords, after due and sufficient examination and information, found guilty of treason. Besides the articles before-mentioned, he was charged "with advising the king to entertain in his household great numbers of aliens, Bohemians, and others; and to give them large gifts out of the revenues and profits of the realm, whereby the king is greatly impoverished, and the people otherwise oppressed." For which he was sentenced to be drawn and hanged, and his head cut off; and all his lands and tenements, goods and chattels, to be forfeited to the king. But his maj. remitted his drawing, hanging, and quartering, because he was a knight of the order of the garter; so his head was only severed from his body the same day upon Tower-hill. J. Salisbury, J. Beauchamp, and J. Berners, knights, had the same judgment as sir Simon Burley, but the two latter were beheaded.

The Bp. of Chichester and the Judges banished.] At the same time was the bp. of Chichester sent for into parl. where the lords temporal found him guilty of treason, as it was laid in the impeachment; and by assent of the king, they awarded his heirs should be disinherited, his lands, tenements, goods, and chattels forfeited to the king, and the temporalities of his bishoprick seized into the king's hands; but as to his person, the lords would advise what to do, for the honour of God, and holy church, and the safety of the state of prelacy, and of the laws of the land. Then it was resolved, "that this bp. sir Rob. Belknap, sir Roger Fulthorp, sir Jn. Holt, sir Wm. Burgh, sir Jn. Cary, and Jn. Lockton, should be all sent into Ireland, to several castles and places, there to remain during their lives. Sir Rob.

Belknap and sir Roger Fulthorp to be allowed 40*l.* a year; sir Jn. Holt and Wm. Burgh 40 marks a year; sir Jn. Cary and Jn. Lockton 20*l.* a year of the king's gift, and each of them to have two servants to wait on them; and that the bp. of Chichester should have annually 40 marks for his sustenance during his life, if any of his friends would give it him."

Petitions of the Commons.] Then upon a petition of the commons, "the said ordinance and commission made the last year were confirmed, and likewise all that was done in that parl. and also what the duke of Gloucester, earls of Warwick, Arundel, Derby, and marshal, or any of them had done, or any of their company, or their adherents, or any of them, by their assemblings, ridings, or marching in arms, appeals, or pursuits, as things done to the honour of God, the safety of the king, maintenance of his crown, and support of the whole kingdom; and also in pursuance of the same petition, had a full pardon for all things that they had done or committed." Upon a 2nd petition, "all those that had been of the retinue, company, aid, counsel, assent, or adherence of them that were attainted or judged in this parl. for all things they had done were pardoned, except those therein named." A 3rd petition was delivered by them in the same parl. "that the appeals, pursuits, accusations, process, judgments, and executions made and given in this parl. should be approved, affirmed, and established, notwithstanding the lords spiritual were absent; and that by imagination, interpretation, or any other means, none of the same be reversed, broken, or annulled in anymanner; and whosoever should endeavour to break, annul, or reverse any of them, should be adjudged to have execution as a traitor, provided always that this acceptance, approbation, affirmance, and establishment, touching appeals, pursuits, accusations, process, judgments, and executions be in force in this case only, and that they be not drawn into example or consequence for the future. And divers points were declared for treason in that parl. which were not declared by statute before; yet no justice should have power to give judgment in other cases of treason, nor in other manner, than they had before the beginning of this parl." Another petition was, "that none of the traitors attainted by the appeal or accusations of the commons who were then alive, should ever be restored to the law, by pardon, or any other manner, saving the grace and pardon that was made in this parl.; and any one that should endeavour to have such a thing done, should be judged, and have execution as a traitor." The Answer to all these petitions was, "that the king, by the assent of the lords and commons, granted their petitions in all points, and willed his grant should be firm and stable, according to the contents of the petitions, without blemish for ever."

for the securing of peace and quiet for the future in all parts of the nation, that he would please to renew his Coronation-Oath, and that the prelates might renew their fealty, and the lords temporal their homage, notwithstanding they had done it before; which was also assented to." The preparation and introduction to this great ceremony, was with the mass of the Holy-Ghost, sung in the church of Westm. on the 3d of June, being the 21st day of the parl. After mass was ended, and a sermon preached by the abp. of Canterbury, the king of his free will renewed his Coronation Oath with great solemnity in the said church; at which time the prelates swore fealty to him, and the temporal lords did him homage; and then the prelates, lords and commons openly took a new oath, as followeth: "You shall swear that you will not assent, nor suffer, as much as in you lies, that any judgment, statute or ordinance made in this present parl. shall in any manner be annulled, reversed, or appealed, in any time to come; and further, that you will support the good laws and usages of the kingdom, and to your power firmly keep and cause to be kept the good peace, quiet and tranquillity of the kingdom, without disturbing it in any manner. So God you help, and the holy Saints." Then the abp. of Canterbury, and prelates excommunicated all such as should break the peace and quiet of the realm, and do contrary to this oath, which was not only taken by every member of both houses, but also imposed upon all gentlemen, and dignified persons of the clergy in all counties in England; and upon all the mayors, bailiffs and aldermen of cities, boroughs, and towns, by the king's writ, directed to the sheriff; and one special commissioner to administer it. Thus ended this famous parl. after a longer session than any we have yet met with, having sat, with a short prorogation, near 5 months. The lords and commons gave their most humble thanks to the king for his great justice done; and his maj. by the chanc. returned the compliment for their liberal grants. After which, the knights and burgesses were ordered to sue out writs for their expences.

A new Parliament called.] The king thought fit to call another parl. to meet on the 9th of Sept. at Cambridge. In this parl. there was granted to him half a 10th from the clergy, and half a 15th from the laity, in order to carry on the war against Scotland for the next year. Mr. Collier says a 15th was given by the laity this parl. on condition the clergy would grant a 10th. But, that the abp. and his suffragans, looking upon this precedent as a new incumbrance upon their property, refused to be tied to it. Upon which the conditional clause was thrown out of the bill. There were also several new statutes made for the common benefit of the people, and others renewed which had been enacted in the time of Edw. III. particularly the statutes of labourers and day-servants; of bailiffs and all sheriff's officers; of provisors against going out of the land to the pope, to procure the grant of any benefices in England without the king's leave, on penalty of being put out of his protection; against beggars; and against riding armed, and giving of liveries to great retinues; and, lastly, about regulating apparel suitable to every man's distinct rank and quality. "This last affair," Knyghton says, "was absolutely necessary at that time; for there was so much pride amongst the common people in vying with one another, in dress and ornaments, that it was scarce possible to distinguish the poor from the rich, the servant from the master, or a priest from another man."

A new Parliament called.] On the 6th of Dec. 1389, writs were issued out for calling a parl. to meet at Westminster, in Jan. following. Wm. of Wickham, bp. of Winchester, the new lord chanc. by the king's command, opened the cause of the summons to the estates, "declaring the king to be of full age, and that he intended to govern his people in peace and quiet; to do justice and right to all men; and that both clergy and laity should enjoy all their liberties. He further told them, that the kingdom being environed with enemies in France, Spain, and Guienne, on one side, and Scotland and Ireland of the other, it was now their business to consult which way peace was to be had, or a proper defence made against them. Likewise, how an aid was to be had to sustain the charges thereof, without which nothing could be done." On the 20th of Jan. the bp. of Winchester delivered up the seals of his office to the king, before both houses; as did also the bp. of st. David's, being treasurer, the keys of the exchequer; and prayed that they might be discharged. After which resignation, it was openly declared, in full parl. that if any person could justly complain of any illegal action, or any thing done amiss by them in their several offices, they might freely do it. But when both the lords and commons answered, "that they knew nothing amiss against them, and that they had behaved themselves well in their respective offices," the king, thereupon, delivered back the seal and the keys of the exchequer, to the aforesaid bps. and again received all those to be his counsellors that were so before, together with his uncles of Lancaster and Gloucester. However, he thought proper to make a protestation "that, for any thing then done he would keep, or remove, any of those counsellors at his pleasure."

In this parl. the king created John duke of Lancaster, duke of Aquitaine in Normandy, to hold the said dukedom of the king, saving only to his maj. as king of France, the direct dominion, superiority, and resort of the said dutchy. The ceremony was performed in full parl. by investing him with a cap, a coronet, and a ducal rod. The duke paid homage to the king, and humbly thanked him for the great honour he did him; but at the same time declared, that though he could not maintain the state of the dukedom, in time of war, without the aid of the king and realm, however he would do what he could, to the utmost of his power. Whereupon the king told the duke, that the charges should be born as he and his council could agree. To which the commons willingly assented. At this time also, by consent of parl. the king created Edw. eldest son to the duke of York, earl of Rutland; and gave him, towards the support of this dignity and during his father's life, 800 marks yearly, issuing out of the castle, town and demesnes of Okeham in that county, with the office of sheriff.

The two abps. of Canterbury and York, for themselves and the whole clergy of their provinces, made protestation, in open parl. that they neither intended or would assent to any statute or law to be made against the pope's authority; which protestation, at their request was entered upon the roll. In this parl. the court of Rome had also some shackles put upon statute of Provisors, made 25 Edw. III. was revived, and a penalty laid on him that should accept a benefice contrary to that statute. Likewise, a forfeiture awarded against any who should bring a summons, or excommunication, against any person on the provisors, and on a prelate for executing of it.

A Subsidy granted.] There was also a subsidy granted of 40s. on every sack of wool; of which 10s. should go to supply the king's present occasion; and the other 30s. to be reserved in the hands of commissioners appointed by parl. not to be expended unless the necessity of the war required it. There was also granted to the king this parl. for one year, of every sack of wool from a denizen 1l. 2s. 8d. of every alien 1l. 18s. 4d. of every last of skins from an alien 3l. 13s. 4d. from a denizen, for every 240 wool-fells 1l. 13s. 4d. from an alien 1l. 16s. 8d. on every tun of wine, imported or exported 6d.—See Cotton's Abridg. p. 332.

A Parliament called.] The king summoned a parl. to meet at Westminster on the 12th Nov. 1390. The bp. of Winchester, ld. chanc. informed them, "That the chief cause of the summons was concerning a truce made with France, and towards Candlemas the king would send commissioners over to treat of a final peace." He said, "That the Scots had been moved to come into this truce, which they refused; so there was nothing but war to be expected from thence; the charges whereof, with that of Ireland, keeping the king's fortresses abroad, and the seas at home, were so great, that the king could by no means without their aid sustain it. Wherefore he desired them to consult about these particulars, as well as the making ordinances for good laws, &c." Accordingly, they granted to the king one half 10th from the clergy, and a whole 15th from the laity, to go towards the expences of the duke of Lancaster; who set out in the lent following, in order to meet the French king at Amiens, according to appointment, and treat about a lasting peace.

funct Statute was made against the church and the priests thereof, viz. 'That no ecclesiastical person should be capable to take and possess any bequest of manors, glebe, houses, lands or any other rents or possessions, without a special licence from the king, and the capital lords thereof.' And this statute," adds he, "extended as well to parish-churches, chapels and chantries, as to abbies, priories, and all sorts of monasteries; likewise to citizens, burgesses, townsmen and villagers, who had any such rents in their possession for the uses aforesaid. For it was the custom in those days, that when any person wanted to bestow something upon the church, in order to save the trouble and expence of a licence, and at the same time to avoid the penalty of the Mortmain act, they used to leave it to certain persons, whom they could trust, under whose names the church enjoyed the full benefit of the bequest. But by this statute it was enacted, 'That if any person or persons, whatsoever, priest or layman, held any such manors, rents, lands, &c. for such uses, and did not take a licence for them from the king and the capital lords of such possessions, according to the statute of Mortmain before Michaelmas next coming, that then all such lands, &c. should be absolutely forfeited to the king and the said capital lords; and they might enter upon, seize and possess the same for ever.'"

Statute of Appropriation.] An act was also passed this session, which has since done great service to the clergy; namely, that of Appropriations. Before this parl. it was lawful to appropriate the whole fruits and profits of any benefice to a religious house, upon condition that the abbot or prior took care to have the cure tolerably supplied by his monks or friars of the house. This bred many inconveniences; as that hospitality was neglected, the churches and rectories dilapidated, and ministers very often wanting; of which grievances the commons complained, and procured this act, "That in every licence to be made hereafter in chancery, for the appropriation of any church, the bishop of the diocese should have power to reserve a convenient sum of money out of the fruits and profits of it, to sustain the poor parishioners of the said church, and to endow a perpetual vicar sufficiently to supply the cure of souls."

A Parliament called.] A Parl. was called to meet at Westminster, on the 3d of Nov. 1392. At which meeting the abp. of York, Thos. Arundel, chancellor of England, declared the cause to be for "to consider how to raise the price of wools, then too much debased; and how the wars might be maintained after the expiration of the truce. Lastly, in regard to the statute of Provisors, that the holy father might no longer be deprived of what belonged to him; concluding with these words, Reddite quæ sunt cæsaris cæsari, et quæ sunt dei deo." To this last affair, the commons, for the great confidence they reposed in the king, granted that he, by the advice of his lords, might make any alteration, touching the statute of Provisors, as to him seemed good, till the meeting of the next parl.; but so as that statute might not be repealed in any article, nor none disturbed in his lawful possession. With this protest, "that as their assent to this was indeed a novelty, they prayed that it might be no example." The lords and commons granted to the king half a 10th and half a 15th; with one other whole 10th, as it is called, and one 15th, conditionally, that if the king went not personally into France or Scotland against his enemies, or that peace was made, then the said subsidies should remain to be employed upon the sole defence of the realm. The commons also in open parl. declared, "that if any truce or treaty of peace was undertaken with the king's enemies, it was proper the duke of Aquitaine, as the most honourable, should go to the same treaty." The king answered, "that he desired the same, if the duke pleased;" which he consented to very readily. On the 2nd of Dec. which was the last day of their sitting, the lords and commons desired the king that he would as largely enjoy his prerogative as any of his predecessors ever did, notwithstanding any statute to the contrary; and particularly that made at Gloucester in the time of king Edward II. which they now repealed.

A Parliament called.] Early in 1393, the king held a parl. at Winchester, when the abp. of York opened the session by declaring, that it was called for two great causes, "the first was, that whether there was war or peace, or any new league made between the king and his adversaries, yet he was in great necessity for money to discharge his debts, the raising of which was to be their principal care. The next was, to provide some remedy touching the statute of Provisors, for avoiding any disputes between the pope, the king, and his realm." To this affair the lords and commons granted the king the same dispensing power as the last parl. had done, till the next; and to the first, they gave him the same subsidy as was granted in the 11th year of his reign, for 3 years, together with half a 10th and half a 15th. The bps, lords, and commons, in full parl. assented that the king, his heirs and successors of England, might lawfully make their last will and testament, and that execution should be done of the same.

The Abp.'s Protest against the Papal power.] On the last day of their sitting, Wm. Courteney, abp. of Canterbury, and primate of all England, made protestation, in open parl. "that the pope ought not to excommunicate any bp. or intermeddle as to presentations to any ecclesiastical dignity recovered in the king's courts. That the said holy father ought not to make translations to any bishoprick, within the realm, without the king's leave; for that this practice tended to the destruction of the realm and crown of England, which had always been free, and subject to no earthly power, but to God only, as to regalities, and to no other." Which protestation the abp. prayed might be entered on the roll. See Collier's Hist. vol. i. p. 594.

A Parliament called.] On the 29th of Jan. 1394, a parl. was called to meet at Westminster, which was opened by a speech from the abp. of York, lord chan. who declared the cause of the summons to be: 1st, that all bps. lords, and corporations should enjoy their liberties, and that there should be a due observation of the king's peace. Next, how the wars, which by assent of parl. were begun, should be sustained as to the expence of that, and the preservation of Guienne, Calais, Ireland, and Scotland." The 3rd day of the meeting the commons presented to the king, in full parl. sir John Bussy as their speaker; who, making the usual protestation, was allowed.

Charges against the Earl of Lancaster.] Rd. earl of Arundel exhibited a complaint against the earl of Lancaster, which he said concerned the king's honour: "1st, that he thought it not honourable for the king to suffer the said duke to walk arm in arm with him: 2nd, it did not become the duke's servants to wear the same livery with the king's: 3rd, that the said duke, both in council and parl. was used to speak such bitter words, that he, the said earl, and others of his quality, durst not utter their minds for him: 4th, that it was not to the king's profit to give to the said duke the dutchy of Guienne: and, 5th, he wanted to know what was become of all that mass of money given to the duke for his voyage into Spain, and for the last treaty of peace." Unto which accusation the king himself answered and affirmed, "that what the duke of Lancaster had done was all right and good." And his maj. with the assent of the lords, awarded, that the said earl should ask the duke's pardon, in full parl. and in the very words following, which he spoke accordingly: "sir, sith that it seemeth to the king, and other lords, and eke that each here hath been so mickle grieved and displeased by my words; it forethinketh, and I beseech you of your grace and lordship to quit me your man-tallant."

A Supply granted.] The king designing to go over in person, in order to reduce Ireland, demanded an aid of this parl. and the commons granted him for 3 years a subsidy upon wool, wool-fells, &c. 3s. upon every tun of wine, and 12d. upon every pound of merchandize, so as this money should only be employed for the defence of the realm. The clergy granted also a full 10th, if the king went over, otherwise only half a 10th.

A Parliament called.] The duke of York, who had been left guardian to the realm in the king's absence, summoned a parl. to meet on the 28th of Jan. 1395, to consider of the best way to make the govt. of Ireland prosperous and happy. To further this business, the king sent over the duke of Gloucester from Ireland, who, coming to this parl. declared the king's great necessity for money, occasioned by the late expedition, his great zeal to make an entire conquest there, and the great hope he had of success. The duke's speech had so powerful an effect, as to draw from the clergy a full 10th, and the commons a 15th; but not without a protestation was first made, "that they were not bound, stricto jure, to grant the same, but purely out of their affection to their king."

A Parl. called.] In a short time after his return, Richard called a parl. to meet at Westminster, on the 22nd of Jan. 1397. Being all assembled, the bp. of Exeter, then chancellor, by the king's command, opened the cause of summons, in a speech, wherein he alleged many authorities from holy writ, to prove 4 points on which a prince ought to consult his parl. The 1st. was, "that the church might enjoy her liberties in peace." The 2nd, "that all his subjects should be governed without oppression." 3d, "that the good laws should be maintained, the evil amended, and justice executed." And, lastly, "that the realm should be defended against all foreign enemies." All which, he added, the king was ready to do with their good advice. He then told them of the danger the nation was in from the Scots and Irish, the hazard of Guienne and the marshes of Calais, and desired them to consult and do what was proper with the least charge to the realm. The next day the commons presented sir John Bussy as their speaker, whom the king allowed of; and, after making the usual protestation, he said, "that the commons required of the king that such bps. and lords as were absent should be sent for." To which the chancellor answered, "that it would be too long and tedious for that session."

The King resents the bringing in a Bill for regulating his Household.] Then the commons desired a conference with the chancellor and others of the king's officers; which, being agreed to, and the chancellor returned from it, the king commanded him to declare the result of that conference. This report was, "that the commons by a bill required 4 things; 1st, the continuance of sheriffs; 2nd, that proper care should be taken of the northern marches; 3rd, about liveries and badges; and the 4th, for avoiding of the extravagant expences of the king's household, and to forbid bps. and ladies, who had no particular business there, from frequenting the court." The king being informed of the contents of it, was highly incensed, and told the peers, "That it was directed against those liberties and royalties his progenitors had enjoyed, and which he was resolved to uphold and maintain. He therefore commanded the lords spiritual and temporal to inform the commons of his resolution; and, particularly, ordered the duke of Lancaster to charge sir John Bussy, their Speaker, upon his allegiance, to acquaint him who it was that brought it into parl."

The Commons ask Pardon.] The submissive answer which the commons gave to this message is very extraordinary, and humbler than any we have yet met with from that body. For, being told the king's mind in a conference with the lords, they immediately delivered in the bill to them, with the name of the person who had brought it into their house, and who was one Thomas Haxey, clerk. The bill was given to the clerk of the crown, by the clerk of the parl. according to the king's command. Soon after, the commons came before his maj. in full parl. and there, with all humility and obedience, shewed great concern that the king had conceived such a resentment against them, "humbly praying him to accept their excuse, for that it never was their intent or desire to speak, shew, or act any thing which should be an offence or give displeasure to his majesty, or be against his royal estate and liberty; especially about this matter touching his person and the govt. of his house, or about the lords and ladies of his court, or any other matter that regarded himself. Knowing, very well, that such things did not belong to them, but solely to the king himself, and in his own ordering. That their intention was only to shew their great affection to his maj. as faithful subjects, and to desire the lords to pray him to consider his own honourable estate and to do therein what he thought good. That they submitted themselves to the king's will and favour, humbly beseeching his maj. graciously to excuse them; being always ready to save his royal estate and liberty, and to perform with body and goods, as loyal subjects are bound to do, whatever shall be for the honour and safety of his royal person and dignity."—See Brady and Tyrrel.—Upon this declaration, the king commanded the chancellor to tell the commons that, "out of his royal benignity and gracious seigniory, he then fully excused them." As a farther proof of their attachment to the prerogative royal, Thos. Haxey, clerk, was tried before this parl. and condemned to die the death of a traitor. But here the church interposed, for soon after the sentence, the abp. of Canterbury and all the other prelates came before the king in parl. with great humility, and made protestation, "that their sincere and full intention was, and always should be, to have his majesty's royal estate and power ever saved and preserved without diminution: and then they beseeched the king to grant them the life of Thos. Haxey, and the custody of his body, not as of right belonging to them, but of his special grace and favour." Both which petitions the king granted.

The banished Judges allowed to return.] In this parl. Rob. Belknap, John Holt, and Wm. Burgh, knights, and formerly judges, who had been banished into Ireland, (see p. 213), had leave given them to return into England, and practise the law without impeachment. Saving always against them all other points mentioned in the said statute.

A Supply granted.] This parl. granted the king 12d. in the pound of all merchandize imported, and 3s. per pound on every tun of wine for 3 years to come. The clergy also gave half a 10th on their temporalities.

A great Council at Nottingham.] On the 1st of Aug. this year, the king held a great council of peers at Nottingham, himself sitting amongst them, with his crown on his head, in the great hall of the castle. Here it was that Edw. earl of Rutland, Thos. earl of Kent, John earl of Huntingdon, Thos. earl of Nottingham, John earl of Somerset, John earl of Salisbury, Thomas lord Despenser, and Wm. le Scroop, chamberlain to the king, brought a bill of Appeal of Treason against Thos. duke of Gloucester, Rd. earl of Arundel, and Thos. earl of Warwick. This bill being read, by advice of the peers and those of the king's council, the accused lords had a day assigned them to answer in the next parl. which was summoned to meet on the 17th Sept. following, at Westm.

[A Parl. called.] At the time appointed, Sept. 17, 1397, the king, lords, and commons all met, when the bp. of Exeter, as ld. chanc. by his majesty's command, opened the session by a speech, which he began with a text taken from Ezekiel, Rex unus erit omnibus. The prelate endeavoured to prove, by many authorities, "that no realm could be well governed but by one sole king, and that to the right conduct of a good king 3 things were wanting; 1st. that he should be powerful; 2nd. severe in the execution of the laws by which he governed; and 3rd. that the subjects should be obedient to the king and the laws of the kingdom. That the king might grow more powerful, he told them that many liberties and prerogatives were given to him, which at the time of his coronation he was sworn to maintain. And if any thing was done since, contrary to them and the law, they were revoked; of which particular they themselves were then called to consult. That laws ought to be executed appeared by the common example of a good father, who uses to strike as well as stroke his child. But for the better execution of them the king had appointed new judges and officers through the realm, and was now desirous to redress any defects of the law which could be shewn him. And that the national subjects ought to obey the king and his laws was apparent; for that no man could claim any property of life or goods or any fruit of his labour, without the prince, who is the pillar of the law. He concluded with observing that the king meant to maintain the laws, and to continue the general and particular liberties granted to all corporations and every single person; further, that he designed to grant a pardon to all his subjects except to some particular persons." The next day the commons presented sir Jn. Bussey to the king as their Speaker, who, being approved of, made the usual protestation, which he prayed might be recorded. The first thing that passed was an act to confirm to holy church, the lords spiritual and temporal, and to all cities, boroughs and commonalties of the realm, their liberties and franchises, as they had reasonably held and enjoyed them in the time of the king's noble progenitors. And, because that several judgments were heretofore not finished by reason the clergy were not present, nor consenting to them, the commons prayed the king that they might now appoint a general proctor, who might have sufficient authority to act for them. Whereupon, the two abps. and the clergy of both provinces, constituted and appointed sir Tho. Piercy their procurator, as appears by their instruments made for that purpose. Afterwards, the commission and statute pursuant to it, made in the 11th of this king, was, wholly, repealed and made void, at the petition of the commons, "as being traiterously made, by constraint, and compulsion, against the king's will, his royalty, crown and dignity." It was ordained and established by the king, with the advice and consent of the lords and commons, "That no such like commission should be made for the future, and he who should endeavour to procure any such to be made for the time to come, being thereof duly convict, should suffer death as a traitor." Then the pardons granted to the duke of Gloucester, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, in the parl. of the 11th of this king, were made void, as being obtained by force and against the king's will. Also, the pardon granted to the earl of Arundel at Windsor, the 17th of this king, was in like manner revoked and annulled.

The 3d day of the session, the commons came before the king, in full parl. and made Protestation by their speaker, that though they intended to shew and declare certain matters and articles, which they had then advised of and agreed amongst themselves; yet, nevertheless it was and is their intent and will, with leave of the king, to accuse or impeach any person or persons, as oft as they should think fit, during the time of this parl.; they prayed the king that he would please to accept this Protestation, and, that it might be entered as a record on the roll of parl.; which the king granted and commanded to be done accordingly.

Abp. of Canterbury impeached.] On the same day, the commons came again before the king, in parl. and impeached Tho. Arundel, then abp. of Canterbury, of high treason; "For that he, being the chief officer of the king, his chanc. when he was bp. of Ely, was traiterously aiding, procuring and advising in making a commission, directed to Tho. duke of Gloucester, Rd. earl of Arundel and others, in the 10th of his majesty's reign; and made and procured himself, as chief officer, to be put into it, to have power, with the other commissioners to see it put in execution; which commission was made in prejudice to the king, and openly against his royalty, crown and dignity; and that the said Tho. actually put the said commission in execution." "Also, that the said abp. in the 11th of the king, procured and advised the duke of Gloucester, with the earls of Warwick and Arundel, to take upon them royal power, and to arrest the king's liege subjects, viz. Simon Burley and James Berners, knights, and adjudge them to death, contrary to the king's will and without his consent; thereupon, the said commons prayed the king that the said abp. might be put into safe custody." The king answered; "Because the accusation and impeachment touched so high a person, and a peer of the realm, he would be advised."

The next day the commons prayed the king, "That as they had impeached and accused the abp. of Canterbury of assenting and being in the contrivance of making the commission on the 19th of Nov. in the 10th of the king, and agreed to the execution of the same, which was expressly against his state and dignity, that he would please to ordain such judgment against the said abp. as the cause required." Hereupon the king commanded it to be recorded in parl. "that the abp. had been before him, in the presence of certain lords, and confessed that he was mistaken, or erred in the exercise of the commission, and therefore put himself upon the king's grace and mercy." Upon this, the king and the lords temporal, with sir Tho. Peircy, the proctor for the prelates, who, as it appears upon record, had full power from the whole body of the clergy to act for them, adjudged and declared the said article, which the abp. had confessed, to be treason, and that it touched the king himself; for which they, also, adjudged and declared him a traitor. And it was awarded in parl. "That he should be banished out of the kingdom, have his temporalities seized, and his goods and chattels forfeited to the king, who was, also, to appoint the time of his exile." Whereupon the king assigned him a time of passage, which was from the eve of st. Michael, until 6 weeks next ensuing; to pass from the port of Dover into France; and further, that he should forfeit all his lands, tenements, and possessions, which he had in fee simple by descent, or purchase, or otherwise, at the day of the treason committed, or after, or that any one held to his use, to the king and his heirs for ever.

The D. of Gloucester, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and Tho. Mortimer, impeached.] And now came on the other proceedings of this parl. against the duke of Gloucester, and the earls of Arundel and Warwick, contained in several articles of Impeachment then brought against them, by way of bill, by the Lords Appellants, mentioned in the council at Nottingham. The bill, as appears by the record itself, was directed to the king in parl. and is to this effect. First, it sets forth, "That the duke of Gloucester, and the earl of Arundel, designing to encroach, and have the govt. of your royal person and kingdom, with the liberties and dignities thereof, as well within this kingdom, as without; when the parl. sat at Westm. in the 10th of your reign, they sent a peer of the land to you, who on their behalf, and by their command, told your majesty, that if you would not consent to make to them, and others whom they should name, such a commission, whereby they might have the govt. in the manner as is above related, you should be in danger of your life, and the lords and commons of parl. would depart without your leave; and then you should see in what a miserable condition you would be; so that in very fear of their power, you then granted such a commission as they desired." Next follows the commission itself, (see p. 191), and then the

go on thus: I. "The said duke and earl of Arundel, to accomplish their traiterous purposes, and to have your royal person in their power, ordered, as they pleased, the govt. of your whole state, with the laws and dignities thereof, and prevailed with Tho. earl of Warwick, and Tho. Mortimer to join with them in their traiterous design; who, by agreement, as traitors to the king and kingdom, all met and assembled on the 13th of Nov. in the 11th of your reign, at Haringay-Park in Middlesex, with a great number of people armed and arrayed, and made divers of your liege-people in several parts of your realm, to rise, and march with them against your royal person, contrary to their legiance, and would not come before your presence, until they were secured by your oath that they might come, and return safely; and then they all appeared before you in your palace at Westm. with a great force of armed men, and traiterously constrained you to take them into your safe protection, against your will and pleasure."—II. "The said duke, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, and Tho. Mortimer, continuing their traiterous purposes, by force and violence, did take, and imprison divers of your liege-people, and amongst others, sir Simon Burley, and brought him to your parl. held on the morrow of the purification, in the 11th of your reign, and there suggested divers points of high crimes and treason against him, and the advice of every lord then present was asked, concerning the crimes of the said Simon, and afterwards the duke and earls would know your advice and opinion; and you answered plainly, he was not Guilty in any point objected against him. And after that, the duke and earls caused you to come into a secret place at Westm. and there shewed you the particulars of the crimes abovesaid. To whom you then answered likewise, that the said Simon was not Guilty in any of those points. And there they took upon them traiterously to have you by force consent to the judgment they had designed against him; and yet you would not consent to any judgment to be given against the said Simon. Yet nevertheless, the said duke and earls took upon them royal power, in prejudice of you, and in derogation to your crown, and without your assent, and contrary to your will, in your absence, and in the absence of many other peers of parl. without their assent, and against their wills, they awarded that the said Simon should be drawn, hanged and beheaded; and thereupon they traiterously caused his head to be struck off, against your peace, crown, majesty and dignity."—III. "The aforesaid duke, earls, and Tho. Mortimer, continuing their malicious, false and traiterous purposes and force, at Huntington, on Thursday the 6th of Dec. in the said 11th year, traiterously agreed, and intended to have gone with their forces to any place of the kingdom, where they might have found your royal person, to have surrendered to you their homage-liege, and to have deposed you; and this they would have done, had they not been hindered by H. of Lancaster earl of Derby, and Tho. Mowbray earl of Nottingham. And the said duke and earls continuing their traiterous intention and force, by agreement between them, caused the records in your treasury, of the time of your great grandfather king Edw. to be searched, how he demised his crown; and they shewed to you in writing the causes of the demise of his crown in your palace at Westm. in the time of parl. in the said 11th year, and they said falsely and traiterously that they had cause sufficient to depose you, but for the reverence they had for your most noble grandfather and father; and they said also, that in hopes of your better govt. they would suffer you to continue in your royal estate and regality."—IV. "Which treasons so imagined, done and perpetrated by the aforesaid duke, earls, and Tho. Mortimer, against your royal person, estate, majesty and dignity, as is above declared: we the Appellants (there named) your loyal lieges, have been and are ready to prove against the said duke, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, and Tho. Mortimer as you, our most dread lord, and this high and honourable court, your parl. shall order."

These articles having been read, the Lords Appellants prayed the king that the accused might be brought before him, in parl. to make their answer. Accordingly, Ralph lord Nevil, constable of the tower, there present, had orders to bring before them Rd. earl of Arundel, his prisoner, which he did, on the 4th day of this session of parl. The duke of Lancaster, being constituted lord high steward of England, pro hac vice, told the prisoner, that he was impeached of divers acts of High-Treason, and the appeal being read to him, his answer was, "That he had a general pardon in the parl. held in the 11th of the king; as also a charter of pardon made to him within 6 years last past, both which he prayed might be allowed." The lord high steward told the earl, by command of the king and consent of parl. that, "The pardon granted in the 11th year, was made by constraint upon the king, by the said duke, earls and others of their party, assuming to themselves royal power, in prejudice to the king, his royal estate, crown and dignity; and that the charter of pardon was made in deceit of the king, and expressly against him and his royal dignity; wherefore, upon the request of the commons, by consent of the king and all the estates of parl. the said pardon and charter had been in this parl. repealed and made void." The earl was asked if he had any thing more to say, and he being silent, sir Wm. Clopton, chief justice of the king's bench, by the king's command, declared to him the law, and the punishment he must undergo, if he pleaded nothing else, for if he did not, he would be convict and attainted of all the matters objected against him. But upon the earl's still insisting on his charter and pardon, and demanding the allowance of them, the Lords Appellants, in their proper persons, prayed the king, "That it would please him to give judgment upon him as convict of all the points on which he was accused."

The Earl of Arundel convicted.] Then the lord high steward, by command of the king, all the lords temporal, and sir Tho. Piercy, proctor for the clergy, as before taken notice of, adjudged the said earl of Arundel, "Guilty and convict of all the points on which he stood appealed, and as a traitor to the king and realm, to be drawn, hanged, beheaded, and quartered. And farther, because his treasons were of so high a nature, as to have gone about to surrender their liege homage, and depose the king, and that his levying war was so notorious, the said lord high steward, by the authority aforesaid, awarded that all his castles, manors, lands, tenements, reversions, fees, and every other manor of inheritance, as well in fee-tail as fee-simple, which were the said earl of Arundel's on the 19th of Nov. in the 10th of the king, or afterwards; and also all the lands and tenements of which other persons were infeoffed to his use, the said 19th of Nov. or afterwards, with all his goods and chattels, should be forfeited to the king and his heirs for ever." But the king graciously remitted that part of his sentence of being drawn, hanged and quartered; and to shew equity as well as rigour, the king and lords, both spiritual and temporal, declared, that it was not their intention that the lands and tenements, fees or any other inheritance of which the said earl stood infeoffed, to the use of another, should in any manner be forfeited by reason of this judgment.

The d. of Gloucester, though dead, declared guilty of High-Treason.] On the same day that the earl of Arundel was brought into parl. and tried and convicted, the king directed his warrant to Thomas earl marshal, governor of the town of Calais, or to his lieut. signifying that he should bring over the body of Tho. duke of Gloucester, with all the speed he could, to answer to divers articles of treason objected against him, in parl. by the Appellants, according to the law and custom used in England; and further to receive the orders of the king and parl. concerning him. This writ bears date at Westminster, Sept. 21. The return of the earl marshal to this warrant, was, "That he could not bring the said duke before the king and his council in that parl. for that being in his custody, in the king's prison at Calais, he there died." This return was made Sept. 24. Upon the reading of this warrant and return in parl. the Lords Appellants prayed the king, "That the said duke of Gloucester might be declared a traitor and an enemy to him; as having levied war in this kingdom against his person and contrary to his allegiance. And that all his lands, tenements, goods and chattels might be forfeited; as, in this case, notwithstanding his death, they ought to be." Then the Commons prayed the king and lords, "That since it was notoriously known to his maj. and all the estates of this parl. and to all the kingdom, that the said duke and others of his party, assembled at Haringway, in the county of Middlesex, with a great number of people armed and arrayed to make war against the king, contrary to their allegiance, and came with those forces into the king's presence, which was levying war against their liege-lord, that he might thereupon be adjudged as a traitor, and his lands, tenements, &c. notwithstanding his death before, forfeited." Whereupon, all the lords temporal, and the aforesaid sir Tho. Piercy, proctor for the clergy, declared that the said crime and treason was notoriously known to them and the whole kingdom; wherefore they, with the king's assent, declared him guilty of levying war as a traitor, and adjudged "all his castles, lands, manors, &c. which he was possessed of on the 13th of Nov. in the 11th year of this reign, to be forfeited to the king and his heirs; and that none of his issue, or heirs of his body, or their issue or heirs in time to come, should ever bear the royal arms of England entire, or with difference; or in any other manner whatsoever, should inherit the crown of England."

The Duke's Confession while in Prison.]
On the 25th of Sept. the said Appellants prayed the king in full parl. that if there was any thing upon record, either by confession of any person accused, or any other person whatsoever touching their appeal, that it might be openly known and declared in full parl. Upon which petition, by the advice of the lords temporal, the king commanded that a commission bearing date the 17th of Aug. last past, directed to sir Wm. Rickhill, one of the justices of the common bench, together with a confession made before him, by Tho. late duke of Gloucester, by virtue of the abovesaid commission, with the return of that commission, be read in parl. The duke's confession is in old English, and deserves particular notice, as a specimen of the elegance of the English tongue in those days:—
"This is the answer of Wm. Rickhill to the commission of his liege lord the king. Tho. duke of Gloucester, be the name of Tho. Woodstock, the year of the king Richard 21, in the castle of Caleys, by vertue of a commission of the king, at it is more plainly declared in the same, directed to Wm. Rickhill justice, hath I know and confessed to fore the same Wm. all the matters and points I wrote in this great roll annexed to this schedule, the which schedule and great roll both sealed under the seal of the aforesaid Wm. and all the matters and points I know and confessed by the aforesaid duke in the castle of Caleys, the foresaid duke be his own hand fully and plainly I wrote, and delivered it to the same Wm. Rickhill touching this matter as it was done in the presence of John Lancaster, and John Lovetoft, and in none other manner."

"I Thomas of Woodstock, the year of my lord the king 21, be the vertue of a commission of my lord the king, the same year directed to Wm. Rickhill justice, the which is comprehended more plainly in the foresaid commission, knowleche that I was one with sterynge of other men, to assent to the making of a commission, in the which commission I among other, restrained my lord of his freedom, and took upon me among others power regal, truly not knowing ne witting, that time that I did against his estate, nor his royaltie, as I did after, and do now; and forasmuch as I knew afterward that I had done wrong, and take upon me more than I ought to do, I submitted me to my lord, and cried him mercy and grace, and yet do as truly and as meekly as any man may, and put me high and low in his mercy and grace, as he hath always been full of mercy and grace to all other. Also, in that time, that I came armed into my lord's presence, and into his palace, howsoever that I did it for drede of my life, I knowleche for certain, that I did evil, and against his regalitie, and his estate, wherefore I submit me lowly and meekly to his mercy, and to his grace. Also, in that I took my lord's letters of his messages, and opened them against his leave, I knowleche that I did evil, wherefore I put me lowly in his grace. Also, in that, that I sclaudred my lord, I knowlech, that I did evil and wickedly, in that, that I spake to him in sclauderous wise, in audience of other folk; bot by the way, that my soul shall too, I meant none evil therein, nevertheless I wot and knowleche that I did evil and unkindly, wherefore I submit me high and low in his grace. Also, in that I among other, communed and asked of certain clerics, whether that we might give up our homage for drede of our lives or not, and whether that we were assentid thereto for to do it, trewly and by my troth, I ne have how none full mind thereof but I trowe rather yes, than nay, wherefore I submit me high and low evermore in his grace. Also, in that, that I was in place, where it was communed, and spoken in manner of deposal of my liege lord, truly I knowlech well, that we were assentid thereto for two days or three, and then were for to have done our homage and our othes, and put him as highly in his estate as ever he was; but forsouth there I knowlech that I did untruly, and unkindly as to him, that is my liege lord, and hath been so good and kind lord to me, wherefore I beseech to him, notwithstanding myn unkindness, evermore of his mercy and of his grace, as lowly as any creature may beseech it unto his liege lord. And as of any new thing or ordenance, that ever I should have witting or known, ordained or assented, privy or appert, that should have been against my lord's estate, or his will or any that longeth about him, syth that day I swore unto him at Langely, on God's body truly, and by that othe that I there made, I never knew of gathering against him, ne none other that longeth unto him. And as touching these points, that I have made confession of to sir Wm. Rickhill justice, in the which I wot well, that I have offended my lord unkindly and untruly, as I have said before, how that I have in all these points offended him, and done against him, trewly and as I will answer before God it was my meaning and my weaning to do the best for his person and for his estate; nevertheless I wot well, and know well now, that my deeds and my workings were against my intent; but by the way that my soul shall too, of these points and of all other the which that I done of negligence and of unkindness, it was never myne intent ne my will, ne for my thought for to do a thing that should have been distresse or harming against the safety of my liege lord's persone, as I will answer before God at the day of judgment. And therefore I beseech my liege and sovereign lord the king, that he will of his grace and benignity accept me to his mercy and his grace, as I that put my life, my body and my goods, wholly at his will, as lowly as meekly as any creature can do or may do to his liege lord; beseeching to his high lordship, that he will for the passion of him that suffered for all mankind, and the compassion that he had for his mother on the crosse, and the pity he had of Mary Magdalen, that he will vouchsafe for to have compassion and pity, and to accept me to his mercy and to his grace; as he that hath ever been full of mercy and of grace to all his lieges, and to all other that have nought been so nigh unto him as I have been, though I been unworthy."

After this return to the commission had been read, the Appellants prayed, that sir Wm. Rickhill, approved for his loyalty and discretion, might be commanded by the king upon his allegiance to declare the truth touching this Confession; who, in the presence of the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parl. said and declared, "that about 8 o'clock before noon, he came within the castle of Calais, to the duke of Gloucester, who was then of good memory and out of prison. That he shewed him his commission, and the cause of his coming, in the presence of John Lancaster and John Lovetolt; and desired that what he, the said duke, had to say to it he would put down in writing, and then he departed. Returning to him about 9 of the clock, in the afternoon of the same day, the duke read in writing the said Confession, with his own mouth, and gave the same to Wm. Rickhill with his own hand. Further; Wm. Rickhill said to the said duke, that if there was any thing more touching this matter, that he would speak it for the king's satisfaction, and the knowledge of the whole truth of the affair. Whereupon the duke said he had forgot one thing that then came into his memory, that he said to his majesty, 'if he designed to be king, he must not intercede for sir Simon Burley, to save him from death.' And he desired the said Wm. Rickhill to shew this to the king by word of mouth." See Brady, p. 411.

The Earl of Warwick convicted.] On the 20th of Sept. the constable of the Tower brought before the parl. Tho. earl of Warwick, who was told by the duke of Lancaster, that he was accused by Edw. earl of Rutland, and the other Appellants, there named, of divers High Treasons, which were all comprehended in two articles: that of assembling with force and armed men at Haringay, &c. and the charge about sir Simon Burley, which were drawn up in the same words as in the case of the earl of Arundel. To all which he answered with tears, "that he well understood those treasons and wicked deeds; that he was guilty of them, and put himself upon the king's mercy and grace." Upon which the duke of Lancaster pronounced the very same sentence against him, in all things, as he had done against the earl of Arundel. But, adds the record, the king, moved with pity, to the reverence and honour of God, at the prayer of the Appellants, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parl. remitted part of the said judgment, and granted him his life; so that his sentence was, "to remain prisoner in the Isle of Man during his life, upon condition that if any means were made use of to the king or his heirs, to gain him any further favour, or if he should make his escape, then the judgment should be put in execution, and the king's grace should be void." This done, the commons before the king in parl. affirmed the said appeals to be all good and lawful.

Thomas Mortimer makes his escape.] Afterwards the lords Appellants impeached Thomas Mortimer of the treasons comprised in the said accusation; but he, being then in Ireland, fled into the mountains to the Irish rebels for protection. A proclamation was thereupon ordered in parl. to be made throughout Ireland, that he should surrender himself in England within 3 months, to answer to the impeachment, or else be declared a traitor; and all his manors, castles, lands, and tenements, &c. which he was possessed of on the 13th of Nov. as in the former cases, should be forfeited to the king.

Promotions.] After these severe proceedings, the king, in some measure, to reward the loyalty of the nobility, made several new creations in this parl. For, on Michaelmas-day, Hy. earl of Derby, was made duke of Hereford; Edw. earl of Rutland, duke of Albe-marle; Tho. Holland, earl of Kent, duke of Surrey; Jn. Holland, earl of Huntington, duke of Exeter, both the king's half brothers; Tho. Mowbray, earl of Nottingham, duke of Norfolk; Jn. Beaufort was made earl of Somerset, and marquis of Dorset; Tho. lord Despencer, earl of Gloucester; Ralph Nevile, earl of Westmoreland; Tho. Piercy, earl of Worcester; and Wm. Scroop, earl of Wiltshire. After which, this parl. was adjourned to the 27th Jan. to be then held at Shrewsbury, and all things till then were to remain in the same state and condition.

At the time appointed, Jan. 27, 1398, this parl. met at Shrewsbury; and on the day of their reassembling, the lord chanc. put them in mind "that this parl. was first summoned to Westminster, for the honour of God, and that Holy Church might enjoy all her liberties and franchises; and the knights, citizens, and burghesses theirs also, as strongly as they ever did in former times. That there might be no more governors in the kingdom than one; also that the laws might be duly obeyed and executed, as he more fully explained to them in setting forth and declaring the cause of this parl." The chancellor then applied himself particularly to the commons, and said, "That the king wanted to be informed by them, how the charge should be borne for the defence of England, Ireland, Guyenne, the marshes of Calais, and also those of Scotland, in case they kept not the four year's truce, which was to end at Michaelmas next."

Proceedings of the Parl. of the 11th Year annulled.] In this session, the Lords Appellants, viz. as Edw. duke of Albemarle, Thos. duke of Surrey, Jn. duke of Exeter, Jn. marq. of Dorset, John earl of Salisbury, Thos. earl of Gloucester, and Wm. earl of Wiltshire, set forth to the king, that certain lords, lately convicted and attainted, viz. the duke of Gloucester, with the earls of Arundel and Warwick, by coercion and compulsion, had made him summon a parl. at Westminster, on the morrow after Candlemas, in the 11th of his reign; where were particularly recited all the questions and answers, formerly put to and made by sir Rob. Tresilian, chief justice, with the other judges and king's serjeants at Nottingham, as are already recited.—See p. 194. Then the Questions and Answers of the judges, made at the time aforesaid, were read over before the king, lords, and commons; and all the estates in parl. were severally asked, "What they thought of those answers?" who said, "They thought the judges had made and given their answers duly and lawfully, as good and liege people of the king ought to do." After which, sir Tho. Skelton, learned in the law, Wm. Hankeford, and Wm. Brenckly, the king's serjeants, said, "The answers were good and lawful, and if the same question had been put to them, they would have given the same answer." William Thirning, chief justice of the king's bench, said, "The declaration of treason, not already declared, belonged to parl.; but, were he a lord or peer of parl. and had been asked, he would have spoke in the same manner." So, likewise, Wm. Rickhill, a judge of the common pleas, and Wm. Clopton, chief justice of the common bench, answered and affirmed the same things: therefore, the former answers of the judges, in the 11th year of the king, were judged and held to be good and sufficient, by this parl.—Then, by the assent of the lords spiritual and temporal, the procurators of the clergy, and the whole body of the commons, by and with the advice of the judges there present, it was decreed, ordained, and established, "that the parl. holden the said 11th year, shall be clearly annulled and held for none, as being done without the authority, and against the will and liberty of the king, and the right of his crown; and that all the judgments, statutes, and ordinances, made in the same, with all things depending upon them, shall be revoked and annulled, reversed and repealed, and held for none; and that all lands, tenements, fees, advowsons, and other possessions, seized as forfeit, by colour of the said judgment, shall be restored and delivered to them who were condemned or put out, or else to their heirs; and to them that have any cause of action, or title of right, all manner of liberties and franchises as they had at any time, with restitution of goods and chattels."

In this session, Thos. Mortimer, impeached in the last, had time given him to make his appearance and take his trial, which he not doing, the duke of Lancaster, as lord high steward, with the consent of the lords temporal, and the earl of Wiltshire, then proctor for the prelates and clergy, gave sentence and judgment against him, according to the tenor of the proclamation.

Sir J. Cobham impeached.] On the same day, Jan. 28, came on the trial of John de Cobham, knight, who had been impeached by the commons in the last session, for the same crimes that Thos. Mortimer was, viz. that he, sitting in judgment, awarded Simon Burley and James Berners, knights, to be executed as before, without the king's assent, in his absence, and in the absence of many peers of parl. who arose and would not sit in such judgment, &c. against the peace of the king, his crown and dignity. The duke of Surrey, in whose custody this sir John Cobham was, brought him into parl. to answer to the Articles alledged against him, and the duke of Lancaster told him, that he was accused and impeached by the commons for the treasons aforesaid, and commanded him to answer at his peril. Upon hearing the impeachment read, the knight said, "That as to the making of the commission he was not guilty; and as to the use and exercise of the same, he said he did not meddle with it without the king's command, and that he went to the king, and told him, he, with others, were made commissioners, but that he would not act according to the commission without the king's licence, who thereupon commanded him to act." To this the king himself answered, "That he was under such govt. at that time, that he could say no otherwise, by reason of such as were then about him; but that the commission was made against his will the said John Cobham could not deny." As to the judgment and award made against the said Simon and James, the prisoner said, "He was told by those who were then masters, that it was the king's will such judgment and award should be made."—Upon these answers, the commons prayed the king to give judgment against him, as convict and attainted of the use and exercise of the commission, &c. Whereupon the lord high steward, by consent as aforesaid, gave judgment against the said John de Cobham, as in the case of the earl of Arundel. But all those judgments the king graciously pardoned; yet so that he was to be a prisoner in the isle of Jersey during his life.

A Subsidy granted for the King's Life.] On the last day of this parl. Jan. 31, the commons, with the assent of the lords, granted to the king the subsidy on wool, leather, and wool-fells, for his life; with one whole 10th and 15th, and half a 10th and 15th, which was more than ever they had given to his grandfather. But, upon these grants, the commons prayed his maj. to bestow 3 or 4000 marks on those that had been plundered at Radcot-bridge, and to pay the Lords Appellants their expences; both which were granted.—On the same day, an act of grace, or a general pardon, was passed for all things done before that time. After the grant of this pardon, the king, by his own mouth, declared in parl. "That, if the lords and commons, who in time to come may sit in parl. shall let, or any ways disturb him in the collection of the said imposts on wool, leather, and wool-fells, granted as above, their proceedings shall be void."

The Disherison of the Two Despensers annulled.] A private petition, but which had a public concern, came before this session of parl. Tho. le Despenser, grandson and great grandson to Hugh the father and Hugh the son, petitioned the king, in full parl. to have redress; and recited the petitions of his said ancestors made to the king, in a parl. held at York in the 15th of Edw. II. The parl. took this affair into consideration, and disannulled the exile and disherison of both those earls for the following reasons: 1st. because they were not appealed, or called to answer, nor due process against them made according to law. 2nd. because the prelates, who were peers of the realm, did not consent to the said exile and disherison. 3d. because it was against Magna Charta that any one should be exiled or tried, or otherwise destroyed, without judgment of his peers. And the petitioners farther set forth, that whereas this annulation was afterwards made void in the 1st. of Edw. III. they pray that statute may be reversed, and all the articles and things contained in it, for the reasons abovesaid. The petition was granted, and the statute reversed and made void accordingly, not only for the causes before expressed, but also "considering that the repeal was made by king Edw. III. at such time as his father Edw. II. was living, being very king, and in prison, so that he could not resist the same."

tions of this parl. we must recite an affair which now happened, greater in its consequences than any thing which has been hitherto related. The reader may observe, that in the list of the Lords Appellants, given at the beginning of this session, the names of the dukes of Hereford and Norfolk are not mentioned, though they were both concerned in the impeachments. This could proceed from nothing else than a mortal quarrel which had then happened between these two noblemen; and which the former was about to accuse the other of before the king and parl. As a prelude to the main affair, on this last day of the parl. the duke of Hereford took occasion to fall on his knees before the king, in the presence of both the houses, and spoke thus to him: "My liege lord, I know well that many riots, disturbances, and evil deeds have been made and done within your kingdom, to the offence of you and your royal estate, in which I, myself, was, with others present; not with an ill intent on purpose to offend you, for I knew not then it was any fault or offence against you. But, sir, since I am now better informed, I confess my offences, and in so doing I beg your mercy and pardon." Upon which the king graciously accepted of the humble prayer and confession of the duke; granted him the pardon he asked, in full parl. for whatever he had done in the things above-said, or deserved for them; promised to be his good lord; and declared openly to all the estates, that he had granted him full pardon for the matters aforesaid.

After which, the said Henry of Lancaster, duke of Hereford, came to the king, with a schedule in his hand, and said, "that he had already, by his majesty's command, been before him at Haywode, where he had informed him, that Tho. Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, had spoken many dishonest words, in slander of his royal person, which were spoken to himself; and that then his maj. charged him, upon his allegiance, that he would truly repeat the words as they were spoken. That not out of malice, or any other cause, but only as he was bound to obey the king's command, he had now put down in writing the words which the duke of Norfolk spake to him, to the best of his remembrance, as they were contained in this schedule, which he delivered to the king; with a protestation, at the same time, to add or diminish when he pleased, or as it might be needful, saving always the substance of the present writing;" which was to this effect: "That in the month of Dec. in the 21st year of your reign, the duke of Hereford, travelling between Brainford and London, met the duke of Norfolk with a great train, and discoursed with him of divers matters; amongst which he told him, they were all ready to be undone; and the duke of Hereford demanded why? He answered, for the fact at Radcot-bridge: the duke of Hereford said, how can that be, for the king hath shewed us favour, and declared us in parl. to have been good and loyal towards him. The duke of Norfolk answered, notwithstanding that, it will be done to us as has been done to others before, for he will vacate this record. The duke of Hereford replied, this would be a great wonder, since the king had said it before all the people, that he should afterwards make it be annulled. And further, the duke of Norfolk said, this was a marvellous world, and unsafe; for I know well, said he, that if * * * [not legible in the record] "my lord your father and you had been taken or killed when you came to Windsor, after the parl. was up, that the dukes of Albemarle and Exeter, the earl of Worcester, and himself, were agreed never to undo any lord without just and reasonable cause; and that the malice of this fact was in the duke of Surry, with the earls of Wiltshire and Salisbury, drawing to them the earl of Gloucester, who had sworn to undo 6 other lords; that is to say, the dukes of Lancaster, Hereford, Albemarle, and Exeter, with the marquis of Dorset and himself. He also said, they purposed to reverse the judgment of earl Tho. of Lancaster, and hereby we and many others should be disinherited. The duke of Hereford said, God forbid, for it would be a great wonder if the king should assent to this; for it was with a cheerful countenance that he promised to be a good lord to them and others; and also that he knew he had sworn it by st. Edward: and the duke of Norfolk answered, he had done the same to him many times, and sworn by the body of God; and that for all this he was never the more to be trusted; and further said to the duke of Hereford, that the king was about to draw the earl of March and others to the same agreement and purpose of the said 4 lords to destroy the rest aforesaid. The duke of Hereford replied, if it be so, we can never trust them. The duke of Norfolk returned, for certain not; for although they cannot accomplish their designs at present, yet they will be contriving ten years from this time to destroy us in our houses."

This complaint in writing having been read before the king and lords, it was then ordained by him, with the assent of all the other estates, that the matters therein comprised should be determined and ended by the good advice and discretion of the king, and the commissioners already assigned by authority of parl. The reason of constituting these commissioners we have reserved as the finishing stroke to the long proceedings of this parl.

The Authority of the whole Parl. delegated to 12 Lords and 6 Commoners. On this last day of the session, Jan. 31, the commons prayed the king, "That whereas they had before them divers petitions, as well for special persons as others, not read and answered; and, also, many other matters and things had been moved in the presence of the king, which, for shortness of time, could not be well determined, that it would please his majesty to commit full power to certain lords, and others there named, to examine, answer, and dispatch the petitions, matters, and things abovesaid, and all dependencies on them." To this prayer the king gave his assent, and thereupon, by authority of all the estates, it was ordained, that John duke of Lancaster, Edm. duke of York, Edw. duke of Albemarle, Tho. duke of Surry, John duke of Exeter, John marquis of Dorset, Roger earl of March, John earl of Salisbury, Hy. earl of Northumberland, Tho. earl of Gloucester, Tho. earl of Winchester, and Wm. earl of Wiltshire, or any 6 of them, together with John Bussey, Hy. Green, John Russel, Rob. Teye, Hy. Chelmswike, and John Golofre, knights, deputed by the commons in that parl. or any 3 of them, shall have full power to execute, answer, and fully determine all the said petitions, with their complaints; as also, all other matters and things moved in the presence of the king with all other dependencies upon them, not yet determined, as they shall think best by their good advice and discretion to act in these affairs.—"By this act," says Tyrrel, "the whole power and authority of the kingdom was now devolved upon the king, 12 peers, and 6 commoners; and how arbitrarily they used it, may be seen in the sequel."

[The Dukes of Hereford and Norfolk banished by the Committee.] No sooner was the parl. dissolved, but both the dukes appeared before the king at Oswaldstree, when a further day was assigned to meet them at Windsor. In the mean time the king, lords, and knights, abovesaid, agreed that the determination of the difference should be according to the laws of chivalry; if other proof or evidence could not be found for the ending of this dispute by the ordinary course of law. But no further proof being produced by either of the parties, they both appeared at the place last mentioned, on the day prefixed, to receive the king's judgment thereon. Hereupon, as it had been determined by the king and the committee of parl. at Oswaldstree, his maj. ordained, since there was no other way to settle the difference, that it should be determined by single combat at Coventry, on a day appointed for that purpose. The two dukes having accepted of the trial by duel, as above, they both appeared at Coventry, on the 16th of Sept. ready at all points, to decide the bloody controversy; when the king took the battle into his own hands, as the record has it, and by the full advice, authority, and assent of parl. decreed and ordained, "That for the peace and tranquillity of himself, his kingdom, and his subjects; and to avoid the debates and troubles that might not only arise between the two dukes, but amongst their friends and followers, the duke of Hereford should be banished the kingdom for 10 years, to depart on or before the 13th of Oct. next, upon the penalty of incurring treason, by authority of parl. Also it was ordained, by the authority aforesaid, under the same penalty, that the duke of Hereford should not come in company with the duke of Norfolk, nor with Tho. Arundel, abp.; nor send nor cause to be sent, nor receive or cause to be received, any message or otherwise, to or from either of them." As to the duke of Norfolk, it was decreed, "That forasmuch as he had confessed certain points of the accusation, before the king at Windsor, on the 29th of April last, which he had denied at Oswaldstree, on the 23d of Feb. foregoing; and which were very likely to breed great trouble within the kingdom; the king desiring to punish as rightful lord, all such as were the authors of such troubles and debates, and willing also to avoid the occasion of them, adjudged and ordained, that Tho. duke of Norfolk should void the realm, for term of life, and that he shall be out of the kingdom by the 20th of Oct. next coming, to reside in Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary, and other parts of Christendom, upon pain to incur treason, by the authority aforesaid. Further, that he should not come into the company of the duke of Hereford, nor of Tho. Arundel, nor send or receive messages, &c. as in the case of the other. And it was likewise ordained, by the said authority, that if either of the dukes, or any for them, do procure any thing to be done against the least point in this ordinance, or what was done on the 16th of Sept. he or they shall incur the penalty of treason, as if it had been done against any other ordinance of the parl. begun at Westminster and adjourned to Shrewsbury. Lastly, if they, or any for them, should seek for any manner of pardon or licence, to return home, they were also to incur the same penalty, by the same authority." The duke of Hereford, at his taking leave of the king at Eltham, behaved himself so respectfully, and bore his sentence with so much unconcernedness, that his majesty was then pleased to declare, that he would abate 4 years of his exile. The duke of Norfolk, in great grief and discontent, went into Germany, and from thence to Venice, where not long after he died.

Proceedings of the Committee.] On the 14th of Oct. the king, with the dukes of Lancaster, York, Albemarle, Surry, and Exeter, the marquis of Dorset, the earls of March, Salisbury, and Gloucester, John Bussey, Henry Green and John Russel, knights, being again assembled by virtue of the authority to them committed in the parl. at Shrewsbury, made certain ordinances and statutes, 5 whereof are printed in the Statutes at Large. The last of these relating only to our purpose, and varying somewhat from the roll, wants this addition, viz. "The king, on the day above-mentioned, by the assent of the lords and knights of counties assigned by authority of parl. doth ordain that every person that procureth or endeavoureth to repeal or reverse any of the statutes or ordinances made by the king and the said committee, and that being duly proved in parl. shall be adjudged and have execution as a traitor to the kingdom; in like manner as they which endeavour or procure to be repealed the statutes and ordinances made during the time of the sitting of the said parl." Besides this, there was a provision made, for their greater security, that the oath of every bp. at his receiving his temporalities, and of every lay-lord, when he had livery of his lands and tenements should be enlarged with these additions, that of the bishops was as follows; "You shall swear, that well and truly you shall hold, maintain, and stand to, without fraud or deceit, all the statutes, establishments, ordinances, or judgments made and rendered in the parl. summoned and begun at Westminster, on the Monday next after the exaltation of holy cross, in the year of the reign of our lord king Richard II. after the conquest, 21, and from thence adjourned to Shrewsbury, to the quindene of st. Hillary, then next coming, and there ended. And also all the statutes and ordinances made after the said parl. by the king and lords, and knights of shires, coming for the commons to that parl. without going or doing to the contrary of any of them, or the dependents on, or parcel of them; nor that you will ever repeal, revoke, make void, reverse, or annul, nor ever suffer them to be repealed, revoked, cassated, made void, reversed, or annulled, so long as you live; saving to the king his royalty, liberty and right of his crown." To the Oath of the Temporal Lords was this addition; "You shall swear, that you will never suffer in time to come, any man living to do any thing contrary to any of the statutes, establishments, ordinances and judgments abovesaid, nor any dependents on, or part of them. And if any one so do and be thereof duly convict, you shall use your utmost power and diligence, without fraud or deceit, to prosecute him before the king, or his heirs kings of England, and cause him to have execution as an high traitor to the king and kingdom. Saving to the king his regality, liberty, and right of his crown."

[The Duke of Lancaster claims the Crown.] In 1399, died John duke of Lancaster, the king's uncle, who had just lived to see his eldest son banished, and have a vote himself in the sentence of it. By the duke's death, the title, vast estate and honours, of that branch of the royal family, ought to have devolved upon Henry duke of Hereford his son; but the king, jealous of so great power in so near a relation, took occasion to prevent it. For, on the 8th of March following, the commissioners, that had the authority of parl. delegated to them, met again at Westminster; where they declared that Henry duke of Hereford, after the judgment given against him at Coventry, had procured letters patents from the king, that, during his absence, he might, by his attorney, sue and have livery of any lands descended to him, and have his homage respited till his return: these letters patents the commissioners declared were against law; wherefore the king, by the advice and assent of the said committee, revoked these letters patents, as also the like made to the duke of Norfolk.—The new duke of Lancaster, who was more irritated at this last treatment than at his banishment, was then in France. To him the discontented nobility and gentry of England applied themselves, as the only man that by his birth, power and popularity, could redress their grievances. The duke received their addresses at first very slightly; but being settled at last in his resolutions by Tho. Arundel, abp. of Canterbury, who came to him in disguise for that purpose, he determined to try his fortune in England on the first opportunity.

It was not long before a very fair one offered; for an account having been brought to court, that Roger earl of March, the king's lieut. in Ireland, had been there slain by the natives; to revenge his death and subdue the country, the king levied a considerable force, and went over in person with them. Towards which expedition also he raised money by several undue ways, taking up carriages, victuals, and other necessities without paying for them; by which, and many other imprudent and rash practices, he made himself and govt. disagreeable to his people. The duke of Lancaster, taking advantage of Richard's absence, with Tho. Arundel, abp. of Canterbury, the son and heir of the late earl of Arundel, and a small company of others, took shipping in France, and hovering a while on the English coast, to spy if there were any ready to resist them, they at length landed at Ravensburg (now called Spurn-head) in Yorkshire. At first, the duke gave out that he came only to recover his own inheritance; but finding himself soon joined by Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland, and Henry, named Hotspur, his son, Ralph earl of Westmoreland, and other lords, and an army of 60,000 men, he altered his tone, and boldly laid claim to the kingdom. With these forces the duke made a speedy march to Bristol, besieged the castle, and took it; in which was the earl of Wiltshire, lord treasurer, sir John Bussy, and sir Henry Green, of the late junto of parl. who the next day, by the clamour of the people, and without further process, had their heads struck off.

The King resigns the Government.] The duke of York, the king's uncle, who was left guardian of the realm in his absence, with several bps. lords, and others of the king's council, consulted what to do in this exigency, but could come to no resolution about it. In the mean time, as soon as the king was informed in Ireland of the duke's landing, he secured his sons, and the sons of the duke of Gloucester, who were with him, in Trim castle, in that kingdom. Then, with the dukes of Albemarle, Exeter, and Surrey, with the bps. of London, Lincoln, and Carlisle, and many others, he took shipping with all speed, in order to go over and raise such a force as might hinder the duke's progress. But, on his landing, when he found how matters went, and that the people and greater part of the lords had forsaken him, and were gone over to duke Henry, he laid aside all thoughts of fighting, and even dismissed his family; giving them notice, by sir Tho. Piercy, his steward, that they might provide for and reserve themselves for better times. After this, the king shifted up and down, and was here and there for many days, the duke following him with his army; till at last he fixed at the castle of Conway, in Wales, from whence he sent to speak with the abp. and the earl of Northumberland. They immediately waited on his maj. to whom he declared, "that he would quit his govt. if he might have his life secured, and an honourable provision made for himself, and 8 persons that he should name." This being granted and confirmed, the king went to Flint castle, where, after a short conference with the duke of Lancaster, they mounted their horses together, and rode to Chester that night, the duke's numerous army still following.

At Chester the writs of summons were issued out, in king Richard's name, for a parl. to meet on the 30th of Sept. dated August 19, from Chester. In the mean time, the king was brought up to London, and secured in the Tower, until the parl. should sit; and all the instruments of his Cession, Resignation, and Deposition, with the Articles against him, could be prepared. The abp. of Canterbury having objected, that the moment Richard's Renunciation was made, and his Cession and Deposition taken, the parl. would be absolutely dissolved. It was thought necessary, as soon as it was met, to have new writs ready to issue out for calling another. Accordingly, when the aforesaid ceremony was over, which met with no opposition from the unhappy king, fresh writs came out, dated at Westminster, Sept. 30th, to the lords, and all the knights, citizens, and burgesses, throughout England, which were made returnable in 6 days time; for they were summoned to meet at Westminster on the 6th of Oct. following; these double writs being still extant on record to prove it. That these last were the very same members that came on the first summons, though called in Henry's name, appears also beyond contradiction, by the writs for their wages or expences, which dr. Brady has taken care to preserve.

The members of both houses being come up, they met in a very pompous and unusual manner, Sept. 30, 1399, in the Great Hall at Westminster, which was sumptuously set off on this occasion. At the upper end of the hall was placed a royal throne or chair of state, which was empty, and near it the bps. in order; on the other side, sat the lords temporal, and by them the whole body of the commons. At the head of the lords sat the duke of Lancaster, next him the duke of York, the dukes of Albemarle, Surrey, and Exeter, with the marq. of Dorset; after them, in order, sat the earls of Arundele, Norfolk, March, Stafford, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Devonshire; the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland did not sit down, but went about, from place to place, as occasion required them. See Stowe's Chron. p. 23. This piece of new pageantry being adjusted, which Walsingham says was "absque presidente quocunque," a committee of bps. lords, and commons, was appointed to go to king Richard, then a prisoner in the Tower of London, with the instruments of his Renunciation and Deposition ready drawn up for that purpose.

Taxes in the Reign of Richard II.

In his 1st year, Richard had two 15ths without cities and boroughs, and two 10ths within cities and boroughs, for two years granted him; and in the same year a poll-tax was granted for the war against France.—In his 2nd year, the former subsidy of wool, leather, and wool-fells was granted for 3 years; also 6d. in the pound on all merchandize imported and exported for one year.—In his 3rd year, the parl. granted to the king one 15th and a half, without the cities and burghs, and one 10th and a half within those places; and the subsidies on wool, leather, and wool-fells for one year more.—In his 4th year, there was a capitation-tax of 3 groats of every person of the kingdom, male or female, of the age of 16, of what state and condition soever, except beggars. This was granted for the expedition into Britany, but occasioned an insurrection under Wat. Tyler, &c.—In his 5th year, the former subsidy on wool and leather was farther continued for 4 years, for the assistance of the Portuguese; and the same year a 10th and a 15th was granted for the war with France.—In this 7th year there was granted two half 15ths for the war. The same year the parl. gave the king the moiety of a 10th and a 15th against Scotland and France; and afterwards for the same purpose two 15ths.—In his 9th year there was granted for the duke of Lancaster's voyage into Spain, for the safe keeping of the sea and marches of Scotland; a full 10th and 15th, and half a 10th and 15th. The clergy also granted a 10th.—In his 10th year the parl. granted half a 10th in spirituals, and half a 15th on all temporals. They likewise gave him of every tun of wine imported or exported, 3s.; and 12d. on every pound of merchandize.—In his 11th year there was granted half a 10th and half a 15th; and also a subsidy upon leather, wool, and wool-fells.—In his 12th year there was granted to the king half a 10th from the clergy, and half a 15th from the laity; in order to carry on the war against Scotland for the next year.—In his 13th year, there was a subsidy granted of 40s. on every sack of wool; of which 10s. should go to supply the king's present occasion; and the other 30s. to be reserved in the hands of commissioners appointed by parl. not to be expended unless the necessity of the war required it.—In his 14th year the parl. granted to the king one half 10th from the clergy, and a whole 15th from the laity.—In his 15th year the lords and commons granted to the king half a 10th and half a 15th; with one other whole 10th, as it called, and one 15th; conditionally, that if the king went not personally into France or Scotland against his enemies, or that peace was made, then the said subsidies should remain to be employed upon the sole defence of the realm.—In his 16th year, they gave the same subsidy as was granted in the 11th year of his reign, for 3 years; together with half a 10th and half a 15th.—In his 17th year, the commons granted the king for 3 years, a subsidy upon wool, wool-fells, &c. 3s. upon every tun of wine, and 12d. upon every pound of merchandize as in the 11th year of his reign; so as this money should only be employed for the defence of the realm. The clergy granted also a full 10th, if the king went over; otherwise, only half a 10th.—In his 18th year, the clergy gave a 10th, and the commons a 15th.—In his 20th year, the parl. granted 12d. in the pound of all merchandize imported, and 3s. per pound on every tun of wine for 3 years to come. The clergy also gave half a 10th on their temporalities.—And in his 21st year, the king had granted him the subsidy on wool, leather, and wool-fells, for his life; with one whole 10th and 15th, and half a 10th and 15th. But this extravagant grant was made one of the articles against this unhappy prince in the succeeding reign.

Price of Provisions in the Reign of Richard II.

In 1379, wheat was sold for 4s. a qr.; white wine, 6d. a gallon, and red, 4d. The low price of corn, at this time, was pleaded by the commons against granting a supply.—In 1382, wine sold for 4l. a tun.—In 1387, barley was sold at Leicester for 2s. a qr. and wheat for 2s.; pease, 1s.; soot, 1s.—In 1390, wheat sold at the same town for 16s. 8d. for 14s. and 13s. 4d. a qr.; wool, on account of a law against the exportation of it, sold for 3s. for 2s. and even for 20d. a stone.

Acts passed in the Reign of Richard II.

HENRY IV.

A Parl. called.] It may not be amiss in the beginning of this parl. to give the names of the peers summoned to it by the second writ, in Henry's name; and as these, with the peers called to the first, stand in sir Robert Cotton's Abridgement, on two opposite pages, there is no difference except in the names of the kings; and, in the former, sir Thos. Erpingham is put as warden of the cinque ports, which in the other he is not. The first writ is thus directed, "Rex [Richardus] &c. dilecto consanguineo suo Henrico duci Lancastrie salutem, &c. apud Westmonasterium in crastino S. Michaelis proximo futuro. Teste rege apud Cestriam xxix die Augusti." The other is, "Rex [Henricus] &c. Henrico duci Lancastrie [filio suo] &c. apud Westmonasterium, in festo sanct. Fidis Virginis, sexto die Octobris, 1399. Teste rege apud Westmonasterium, 30 Septembris." See sir Robert Cotton's Abridgement of the Records, from which work the parliamentary proceedings of this and some succeeding reigns are almost wholly taken.—Next follow the

On Monday, being the 6th of Oct. 1399, these peers, with the bps. and commons of England, being assembled in the great hall at Westminster, and the new king placed in the royal throne; by his command, Tho. Arundele, abp. of Canterbury, declared, "That this parl. was summoned by king Richard, to be held the Tuesday next before. Which summons was annulled and made void by the accepting of the Renunciation of the said king Richard, and deposing of him; which was done the same day in the presence of the king, lords and commons, as by the process hereafter to be read would appear."—He then told them, "That this most famous realm, abounding in all felicities, had been long governed by children and young counsellors, and would utterly have been ruined and wasted, had not God sent a wise and discreet man to govern the same, who meant, by God's help, to be governed himself by the wise and old heads of the realm."—After this he took for his text these words out of Maccabees, Incumbit nobis ordinare pro regno, i. e. it is the king's will to be governed by the honourable, discreet, and sage men of the realm, and by their common consent; and not by his will or humour, to rule the same. He further laid great stress on this, "That this nation, of any under the sun, might best support and live within itself, alledging for authority this adage, Quod inter regna, hoc principatum tenet." To these he added, "That to every good govt. 3 things were required; 1st, justice; next, that the laws should be duly observed; and lastly, that every degree of men, in their several vocations, should be encouraged and protected." He brought many reasons why this nation ought to be well governed, and said, "That their new king intended strictly to observe these 3 points. He concluded with acquainting them, "That Henry, their king and lord, meant to be crowned on the Monday following, after which he would wholly addict himself to the care of the commonwealth; and desired the commons that they would consent to have the parl. continued to the Tuesday following." After this harangue was ended, Henry Percie, earl of Northumberland, and constable of England, demanded of the lords and commons, whether they would agree to this continuance, who, being all and severally examined, consented thereto.—Then the receivers and triers of petitions for England, Ireland, Wales, and Scotland, were appointed, with those for Gascoigny, and other places beyond the seas, with the isles.

Renunciation of Richard II.] The next thing they went upon, was to read the record of the Renunciation of king Richard II. with their acceptance of the same, and the deposition of the said king, as follows:

The roll of parliament summoned and holden at Westminster, on the feast of st. Faith the virgin, in the first year of the reign of king Henry IV. after the conquest, membrane XX.

The record and process of the renunciation of king Richard II. after the conquest, and likewise the acceptance of the same renunciation, with the deposition of the same king Richard afterwards ensuing.

"Be it remembered, that on Monday the feast of st. Michael the archangel, in the 23rd year of the reign of king Richard II. the lords spiritual and temporal, and other persons of note; that is to say, the lord Rich. le Scroop, abp. of York, John bp. of Hereford, Henry earl of Northumberland, and Ralph earl of Westmoreland; the lord Hugh de Burnel, Tho. lord de Berkeley, the prior of Canterbury with the abbot of Westminster, Wm. Thyrning, knight, and John Markham, justices; Tho. Stow and John Burbache, doctors of laws, Tho. de Erpingham and Tho. Gray, knights, Wm. de Feryby and Dionysius Lapham, public notaries, first deputed to the act under-written, by the assent and advice of several of the lords spiritual and temporal, and of the judges and others, skilful as well in the civil and canon law, as in the laws of the realm, assembled at Westminster in the usual place of council; did about 9 of the clock come to the presence of the said king, being within the tower of London: and it being recited before the said king, by the said earl of Northumberland, in the behalf of all the rest before-named, so as aforesaid joined with him: how the said king heretofore at Conway in North-Wales, being at liberty, did promise unto the lord Tho. abp. of Canterbury, and the earl of Northumberland, that he would yield up and renounce the crown of England and France, and his regal majesty, for causes of his inability and insufficiency, there by the said king himself confessed, and that in the best manner and form the same could be done, as counsel learned should best order; the said king before the said lords and others above-named, hereunto benignly answered, "That he would with effect accomplish, what before in that behalf he had promised," but desired to have some discourse with his cousins, Henry duke of Lancaster, and the said lord abp. of Canterbury, before he fulfilled such his promise. Afterwards the same day after dinner, the said king much affecting the coming of the said duke of Lancaster, and having long waited for him, at last the said duke of Lancaster, the lords, and others above-named, and also the said abp. of Canterbury, did come to the presence of the said king in the tower aforesaid; the lords de Roos, de Willoughby, and de Bergavenny, and very many others being then there present; and after the said king had had discourse with the said duke of Lancaster and abp. exhibiting a merry countenance here and there amongst them to part thereof, as appeared to those that stood round about; at last the said king calling to him all that were there present, did publicly say before them, "That he was ready to make the renunciation, and to renounce and recede, according to the promise by him made as aforesaid." And so forthwith, although, as was said unto him, he might have made some deputy to have served as the organ of his voice, for avoiding so tedious a labour as the reading of the said cession and renunciation, reduced by others into a schedule of parchment; yet the said king, very willingly as appeared, and with a pleasant countenance, holding the said schedule in his hand, said, "That he himself would read it," and distinctly read the same through: and also did absolve all his liege people, and renounce, and recede, and swear, and other things did say and pronounce in reading, and did subscribe it with his own hand, as is more fully contained in the said schedule; the tenor whereof is such."

"In the name of God, Amen. I, Richard, by the grace of God, king of England and France, and lord of Ireland, do absolve the abps. bps. and other prelates of churches, secular or regular, of whatsoever dignity, degree, state, or condition they be; the dukes, marquises, earls, barons, vassals, and valvasors, and all and every my liege people whatsoever, ecclesiastics or seculars, of all the said kingdoms and dominions, by what name soever they are known, from the oath of fealty and homage, and other oaths whatsoever to me made, and from all bond or tye of legiance, royalty, and dominion, whereby they have been or are obliged, or otherwise in any manner bound unto me. And I do free, release, and acquit them and their heirs and successors for ever, from the said oaths and other obligations whatsoever. And I do dismiss them free, unloosen, quit and in full immunity, as far as relates to my person, to every effect of law which may follow from the premisses, or any of them.

And I do purely, of my own accord, simply and absolutely, in and by the best manner, way, and form that may be, in these writings, renounce and totally resign, all kingly dignity and majesty, and the crown and dominion and power of the said kingdom and dominions, and all other my dominions and possessions, or any way belonging or appertaining unto me, by what name soever they may be reckoned up within the aforesaid kingdoms, or elsewhere; and all right and colour of right and title, possession, and dominion, which at any time I have had, now have, or by any means shall have in or to the same, or any of them, with their universal rights and appurtenances, or any dependencies however, on them or any of them: and also the rule and government of the said kingdoms and dominions, and their administration, and all manner of meer and mixt empire and jurisdiction to me in the said kingdoms belonging, or that may be belonging; and to the name of king, and the honour, regality, and celsitude royal, purely, voluntarily, simply, and absolutely, by the best manner, way, and form, that the same can be done in these writings, I do renounce, and them do totally resign, and in deed and in word dismiss and quit the same, and from them do recede for ever. Saving to my successors kings of England, the rights to them or any of them belonging, or that shall any way belong, in the said kingdoms or dominions, and all other the premisses for ever. And I do confess, acknowledge, repute, and truly and out of certain knowledge, do judge myself to have been and to be utterly insufficient and unuseful for the rule and govt. of the said kingdoms and dominions, with all their appurtenances: and that for my notorious demerits I deserve to be deposed. And I do swear upon these holy gospels of God, by me corporally touched, that I will never act contrary to the said resignation, renunciation, dismissal, and cession; nor any way oppose the same in deed or in word, by myself or any other or others: nor will, as much as in me lies, permit the same publicly or privately to be contraried or opposed; but the said renunciation, resignation, dismissal, and cession, will for ever esteem ratified and well-pleasing, and firmly hold and observe the same in the whole and in every part; so God me help, and these holy gospels of God. I the before-named king Richard do here subscribe myself with my own hand."

"And presently to the said renunciation and cession, the said king added by word of mouth, 'That if it lay in his power the said duke of Lancaster should succeed him in his kingdom.' But, because, as he said, this did not depend on his pleasure, he did request the said abp. of York, and bp. of Hereford, whom he for that time had constituted his procurators, to declare and intimate such his cession and renunciation to the states of the kingdom, 'That they would be pleased to signify to the people, his will and intention in that behalf.' And in token of such his will and intention, did then and there openly pluck off the golden ring of his signet from his own finger, and put it upon the finger of the said duke of Lancaster, desiring as he affirmed, that the same might be made known to all the states of the kingdom. Which being done, taking their leaves on both sides, they all went out of the said tower to return to their lodgings.

"But on the morrow, viz. Tuesday the feast of st. Jerome, in the great hall at Westminster, in the place honourably prepared for holding the parl. the said abps. of Canterbury and York, and the duke of Lancaster, and other dukes and lords, as well spiritual as temporal, whose names are under written, and the commons of the said kingdom, assembled in a great multitude in parl. being present; and the said duke of Lancaster being seated in a place due to his quality, and the chair of state, being solemnly adorned with cloth of gold, but then empty, without any person whatever presiding therein; the above-named abp. of York, in the name of himself, and of the said bp. of Hereford, according to the order of the said king, did publicly declare the Cession, and Renunciation, to have been so made by him as aforesaid, with the subscription of his royal hand, and delivery of his signet. And the said Cession and Renunciation, did there cause to be read by another, first in Latin and then in English.

"Immediately after which, it was demanded of the estates and people there present, to wit, first of the abp. of Canterbury, to whom, by reason of the dignity and prerogative of his metropolitan church of Canterbury, it belongs in this behalf to have the first voice amongst the rest of the prelates, and nobles of the realm, 'whether, for their interest and the utility of the kingdom, they would be pleased to admit such Renunciation and Cession.' And the said states and people, judging from the causes by the said king himself, in his Renunciation and Cession aforesaid, signified, that the same was very expedient, did each man singly by himself, and in common with the people, unanimously admit the said Cession and Renunciation. After which admission, it was then and there publicly declared, that besides such Cession and Renunciation, so as aforesaid admitted, it would be very expedient and profitable to the kingdom, for the removing of all scruples, and taking away sinister suspicions, that very many crimes and defects, by the said king about the ill governance of his kingdom very often committed, reduced into writing by way of articles, by reason of which, as himself affirmed in the Cession, by him made, he was deservedly to be deposed, should be publicly read, and declared to the people. And so the greatest part of the said articles were then and there read through. The tenour of all which articles is such:—

Articles against Richard II.

"Imprimis, It is objected against king Richard, that whereas by reason of his ill

govt. viz. his giving away the goods and possessions belonging to his crown, and that to persons unworthy; and his indiscreet squandering the same away otherwise, and to that end imposing, without cause, collections and other grievous burthens on his people, more than they were able to bear: and also innumerable other evils by his assent and command perpetrated; there were by the whole parl. certain prelates, and others, temporal lords, elected and assigned, who might with all their power, and at their own charges, faithfully labour about the just govt. of the realm: yet the king causing a conventicle to be held by him, with his accomplices, the said lords, as well spiritual as temporal, so occupied about the safety and profit of the kingdom, did propose to impeach of high treason; and did violently draw the judges of the kingdom, for fear of death and corporal tortures, to such his wicked purpose, most vigorously striving to destroy the said lords.—II. The said king lately at Shrewsbury, caused several, and the greater part of the judges, to come before him and his favourites privately in a chamber, and by menaces, and various terrors, and such affrightments as might fall even upon men of constant resolutions, did induce, cause, and compel them severally to answer certain questions there propounded, on the behalf of the king; concerning the laws of his kingdom, besides, and against their will, and otherwise than they would have answered, had they been at liberty and unforced. By colour of which answers, the said king purposed to have proceeded afterwards to the destruction of Tho. duke of Gloucester, and the earls of Arundel and Warwick, and other lords, against whose deeds and behaviour the said king was much incensed, chiefly because they desired the said king to be under good guidance; but providence withstanding it, by the resistance and power of the said lords, the king was not able to bring such his design to effect.—III. When the lords temporal defending themselves, had withstood his malice and fraud, and the said king had prefixed a day for holding his parl. to do them and other inhabitants of the realm, justice in that behalf, and the said temporal lords were quietly and peaceably gone home, and at rest in their houses, in hope and confidence of the said parl. the king secretly sent the duke of Ireland with his letters and standard towards Chester, and there gathered multitudes in arms, and caused them to rise against the said lords, the nobles of the kingdom, and servants of the state, publicly erecting his standard against the peace which he had sworn to keep. From whence slaughters of men, captivities, dissensions, and other infinite mischiefs, did ensue throughout the whole kingdom; by which act he became guilty of perjury.—IV. Although the said king had in full parl. and by the assent thereof, pardoned the said duke of Gloucester, and earls of Arundel and Warwick, and all their assistants, and others, all offences; and had for many years shewn signs of peace and love, to the said duke and earls, and to the rest appeared with a pleasant and benign countenance. Yet the said king always and continually bearing gall in his heart, did at last, taking an opportunity, cause the said duke of Gloucester, the uncle of him, the said king, and also the son of Edw. the late king of England, of happy memory, and constable of England, then humbly going to meet the said king, in solemn procession; and the said earls of Arundel, and Warwick, to be taken and arrested; and him the said duke out of the kingdom of England, to the town of Calais, did cause to be led, and there imprisoned, and under the custody of the earl of Nottingham, one of the appellors of the said duke, detained, and without answer, or any lawful process whatsoever, did inhumanly and cruelly cause to be suffocated, strangled, and murdered. And the earl of Arundel, though he pleaded as well the general pardon, as a pardon afterwards to him specially granted, and desired justice to be done him, yet in his parl. encompassed with armed men, and innumerable archers of the people by him gathered to that purpose by pressing, did damnably cause to be beheaded. And the earl of Warwick, and lord Cobham, did commit to perpetual imprisonment; wickedly and against justice, and the laws of his kingdom, and his express oath, confiscating their lands and tenements, as well fee-simple, as fee-tail, from them and their heirs, and giving the same to their appellors.—V. At the same time, that the king in his parl. caused the duke of Gloucester, and earls of Arundel and Warwick, to be adjudged, that he might more freely exercise his cruelty upon them, and accomplish his injurious will in other matters, he gathered to himself a great multitude of malefactors of the county of Chester; of whom some passing with the king through the kingdom, as well within the king's palace as without, did cruelly kill the liege subjects of the kingdom, and some they beat and wounded, and did plunder the goods of the people, and refuse to pay for their victuals, and did ravish and violate their wives, and other women; and though there were grievous complaints, of such their excesses, brought to the hearing of the said king, yet the said king did not regard to cause justice to be done, or any remedy thereupon, but did favour the said troops in such their evil-doings, trusting in them and their guard, against all others of his kingdom; for which cause, the faithful people of his kingdom had great matter of commotion and indignation.—VI. Although the said king by his writs, caused proclamation to be made throughout the whole kingdom, that he had caused his uncle the duke of Gloucester, and the earls of Arundel and Warwick, to be taken and arrested, not for any assemblings or troopings by them formerly made within the kingdom of England, but for very many extortions, oppressions, and other things by them afterwards done, and perpetrated, against his royalty, and kingly maj.; and that it was not his intention, that any of the family of the said duke, and earls, or of their followers at the time of such assembling, and trooping, should for that occasion be molested, or aggrieved; yet the said king, at last, in his parl. did not impeach the said lords for extortions, oppressions, or any such matters, but for the assemblings and troopings aforesaid did adjudge them to death; and very many of the family of the said lords, and others, who were following them at the time of such their assembling, and trooping, he did, for fear of death, force to make fine and ransom, as traitors or rebels, to the great destruction of a great number of his people. And so he did subtly, fraudulently, and maliciously deceive the said lords, and their domestics, and the people of his kingdom.—VII. After very many of those persons so making fine and ransom, had obtained of the king his letters patent of full pardon in the premises, they could not reap any commodity by such letters of pardon, till they had made new fines, and ransoms, for saving of their life, whereby very many were impoverished; which was a great derogation and dishonour to the name and state of a king.—VIII. In the last parliament held at Shrewsbury, the said king purposing to oppress his people, subtly procured, and caused it to be granted, “that the power of the parl. by the consent of the states of this kingdom, should remain in certain persons, to determine, after the dissolution of the parl. certain petitions in the said parl. exhibited, but then not dispatched.” By colour of which grant, the persons so deputed proceeded to other things generally touching that parl. And this with the will of the king; in derogation of the state of parl. and the great damage of the whole kingdom, and pernicious example. And that they might seem to have some colour and authority for such their doings, the king caused the Parl. Rolls to be altered and blotted at his pleasure, against the effect of the said grant.—IX. Notwithstanding the said king at his coronation had sworn, “that in all his judgments, he would cause to be done equal and right justice and discretion, in mercy and truth, according to his power;” yet the said king, rigorously, without all mercy, did, amongst other things, ordain, under grievous penalties, that none should sue for any favour, or intercede with the said king, for Henry duke of Lancaster being banished, whereby the said king did act against the bond of charity, rashly violating his oath aforesaid.—X. Although the crown of the kingdom of England, and the rights of the said crown, and the kingdom itself, have in all time past been so free, that our lord the pope, nor any other without the kingdom, ought to concern himself about the same; yet the aforesaid king, for the corroboration of such his erroneous statutes, did make supplication to our lord the pope, that he would confirm the statutes ordained in his last parliament; whereupon our lord the pope granted his Apostolic Letters, in which grievous censures are denounced against any that should presume in any thing to act contrary to the said statutes; all which are well known to tend against the crown and royal dignity, and against the statutes and liberties of the said kingdom.—XI. Although the lord Henry, now duke of Lancaster, by the king's command, had preferred his bill touching the “State and Honour of the King” against the duke of Norfolk, and the same had duly prosecuted; so that, according to the king's order, he had exhibited himself in all points prepared for the combat; and the said king had declared, that the said duke of Lancaster had honourably performed his devoir as much as in him lay; and this by a decree publicly proclaimed before all the people assembled at the said combat: yet the said king, without any legal reason whatsoever, did cause and command the said duke to be banished for ten years, against all justice, and the laws and customs of this kingdom, and the law of war in that behalf, thereby damnably incurring perjury.—XII. After the said king had graciously granted by his letters patents, to the lord Henry, now duke of Lancaster, that in his absence, whilst he was banished, his general attornies might prosecute for livery to him to be made of all manner of inheritance or successions belonging unto him; and that his homage should be respited, paying a certain reasonable fine; he injuriously did revoke the said letters patent, against the laws of the land, thereby incurring the crime of perjury.—XIII. Notwithstanding that it was enacted, that every year the officers of the king, with his justices, and others of the king's council, should choose sheriffs for all the counties of England, and name them to our lord the king, according as to their discretion and conscience should seem expedient, for the good and utility of the kingdom, the said king hath caused persons to be made sheriffs, not so nominated or elected; but others, according to the capricies of his pleasure, sometimes his favourites or creatures, and sometimes such as he knew would not oppose his humour, for his own and others private advantage, to the great grievance of his people, and against the laws of his kingdom, thereby notoriously incurring perjury.—XIV. At such time as the aforesaid king requested, and had of very many lords and others of his kingdom, divers sums of money by way of loan, to be paid again at a certain term, notwithstanding the said king faithfully promised by his several letters patent to the several persons of whom he borrowed the said monies, that at the term limited as aforesaid, he would repay the same; yet he did not fulfil such his promise, nor are they yet satisfied the said monies, whereby such creditors are much aggrieved; and not only they, but many others of the kingdom, repute the king unfaithful.—XV. Whereas the king of England, by the revenue of his kingdom, and the patrimony belonging to his crown, is able to live honestly, without the oppression of his people, as long as the kingdom is not burdened with the charge of wars; yet the said king, in a manner, for his whole time, during the truces between the kingdom of England and its adversaries, hath not only given away a great, yea indeed the greatest part of his said patrimony, and this to unworthy persons; but also hath further imposed on his subjects so many burdens of money granted, as it were, every year of his reign, that thereby he hath extremely and too excessively oppressed his people, to the impoverishment of his kingdom; not converting the goods so levied to the commodity and profit of the kingdom of England, but prodigally squandering it away, for the ostentation of his name, and in pomp and vain-glory; whilst great sums of money are owing in his kingdom for the victuals of his household, and other things bought, though he hath abounded with riches and treasures more than any of his progenitors.—XVI. The said king, not willing to keep or protect the just laws and customs of his kingdom, but according to his arbitrary will to do whatsoever should occur to his desires; sometimes, and very often, when the laws of his kingdom have been expounded and declared to him by the judges and others of his council, and that they have desired that he would do justice according to those laws, hath expressly, and with an angry and haughty countenance, said, "that his laws were in his mouth;" and sometimes, "that they were in his breast;" and that "he himself alone could make and change the laws of his kingdom;" and being seduced with that opinion, did not suffer justice to be done to very many of his liege people, but by threats and terrors hath forced very many to cease from the prosecution of common justice.—XVII. That after certain statutes had been made in parl. which always bind till they are specially revoked by the authority of another parl. the said king, desiring to enjoy such liberty that no such statutes should so bind him, but that he might do and execute his pleasure, subtly procured a petition to be preferred in his parl. on behalf of the commonalty of his kingdom, and to be granted to him in general, "that he might be as free as any of his progenitors were before him." By colour of which petition and concession, the said king hath very often commanded very many things to be done against such statutes unrepealed; acting therein expressly and knowingly against his oath taken in coronation, as aforesaid.—XVIII. Although it was enacted and ordained, that no sheriff should hold his office above one year together; but that 3 years should pass before he should be again admitted to that office; the said king Rd. sometimes for his own single commodity, and sometimes at the instance of others for their advantage, hath permitted and caused certain sheriffs to stand and remain continually in their offices, sometimes 2, sometimes 3 years, against the tenor and effect of the statute aforesaid, thereby incurring perjury; and this is notorious, public, and generally ill spoken of.—XIX. Although by the statute and custom of his realm, in the calling together of every parl. his people in the several counties of the kingdom ought to be free in choosing and deputed two knights to be present in such parliament, for each respective county, and to declare their grievances, and to prosecute such remedies thereupon, as to them shall seem expedient; yet the aforesaid king, that in his parliaments he might be able more freely to accomplish the effects of his headstrong will, did very often direct his commands to his sheriffs, that they should cause to come to his parliaments, as knights of the shire, certain persons by the said king named; which knights, being his favourites, he might lead, as often he had done, sometimes by various menaces and terrors, and sometimes by gifts, to consent to those things as were prejudicial to the kingdom, and exceeding burdensome to the people; and especially to grant to the said king a subsidy on wool for the "term of his life," and another subsidy for certain years, thereby too grievously oppressing his people.—XX. The said king, that he might more freely fulfil and follow in every thing his own arbitrary will, did unlawfully cause and command, that the sheriffs throughout his whole realm, besides their ancient accustomed oath, should swear that they would obey all his commands, as often as they should be directed to them, under his great and privy seal, and also his letters under his signet; and that in case the said sheriffs should come to know that any within their bailiwicks, of whatsoever condition they were, had publicly or secretly said or spoken any ill, that might tend to the disgrace or scandal of his royal person, they should arrest and imprison them, there safely to be kept till they should receive command from the king to the contrary, as may be found in the record; which fact may probably tend to the destruction of many of the liege people of the said kingdom.—XXI. The said king, striving to trample under foot his people, and subtly to acquire their goods to himself, that he might abound in superfluous riches, did cause the people of 17 counties of the realm to submit themselves to the king as traitors, by letters under their seals; by colour whereof he got mighty sums of money to be granted him, by the clergy and people of those counties, for obtaining his royal good-will and favour: and though, to please the people, the king had caused those obligatory letters to be restored; yet the procurators of the people, having full power granted them to oblige themselves and their heirs to the said king; he, the said king, caused them under their seals, to be bound to him in the name of the said people; and so deceived his people, and subtly extorted from them their goods.—XXII. Although the said king, at his coronation, had sworn to keep the liberties granted to the church of England; yet the said king, by reason of his voyage into Ireland, did by his letters command very many religious persons, viz. abbots and priors of his kingdom, strictly requiring that some of them should send to him certain horses; and some of them not only horses, but also waggons and carriages for his said voyage, or in lieu thereof great sums of money in the said letters expressed: by which manner of writing, he forced many of such religious out of fear to fulfil his will and command; whereby they were heavily impoverished and oppressed, in manifest derogation of ecclesiastical liberty; by which pretext the said king did incur perjury.—XXIII. In most of the great royal councils, when the lords of the realm, the judges and others, being charged that they would faithfully counsel the king in matters relating to his state and that of his kingdom: the said lords, justices, and others, very often in giving counsel, according to their best discretion, have been by the king suddenly and so fiercely chidden and reproved, that they have not dared to speak the truth, in giving their advice for the state of the king and kingdom.—XXIV. The treasure, crowns, reliques, and other jewels, viz. the goods of the kingdom, which came out of mind have been repositied in the treasury of the kingdom, for the honour of the king, and preservation of his kingdom against any sudden event or exigency; the said king going out of his kingdom into Ireland, did take away, and caused the same to be carried with him, "without the consent of the states of the kingdom:" whereby this kingdom had been vastly impoverished, if God by the retaking of the said goods against the said king's will had not otherwise provided. And furthermore the said king did cause the Rolls of Records touching the state and govt. of his kingdom, to be destroyed and rased, to the great prejudice of his people, and disinheriting of the crown of the said kingdom: and all this, as tis probably believed, in favour and support of his evil governance.—XXV. The said king was wont, as it were perpetually, to be so variable and dissembling in his words and writings, and so contrary to himself, and especially in writing to the pope, and to kings, and other lords out of the kingdom, and within it, and also to others his subjects, that no man living that knew his conditions could or would confide in him; nay, he was reputed so unfaithful and unconstant, that it became scandalous not only to his own person, but also to the whole kingdom, and especially amongst foreigners of all the world who came to know the same.—XXVI. Although the lands and tenements, the goods and chattels of every freeman, by the laws of the realm used from all time heretofore, ought not to be taken from him, unless they be forfeited: yet the said king purposing and longing to weaken such laws, in the presence of very many lords, and others of the commonalty of the kingdom, hath frequently said and affirmed, "That the life of every one of his subjects, and his lands, tenements, goods, and chattels, are his, the said king's, at his will and pleasure, without any forfeiture."—Which is utterly against the laws and customs of the kingdom aforesaid.—XXVII. Although it was enacted and ordained, and is hitherto confirmed, that no freeman shall be taken, nor any way destroyed; and that the king shall not pass, nor send any to pass upon him, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the laws of the land: yet by the will, command and order of the said king, very many of his liege people being maliciously accused for having publicly or secretly said something that might tend to the dispraise, scandal, or disgrace of the person of the said king, have been taken and imprisoned, and brought before the constable and marshal of England in the court military, in which court the said liege people being accused would not be admitted to make any other answer, than that they were no way guilty, and would justify the same, and defend themselves by their bodies, and not otherwise; notwithstanding their appellors were young men, stout and lusty, and those so accused, ancient and impotent, maimed or infirm; whereby not only destruction of the lords and grandes of the kingdom, but also of all and singular persons of the commonalty of the same may probably ensue: since therefore the said king hath wilfully acted contrary to such a statute of this kingdom, tis not to be doubted but he hath thereby incurred the crime of perjury.—XXVIII. Although the people of the realm of England, by virtue of their legiance, are fully enough bound to their king; and the said king, by the laws and customs of his kingdom, is enabled to correct and punish his people, if in any kind they transgress; yet the said king desiring to trample on, and too much oppress his people, that he might the more freely execute and follow the humour of his foolish and unlawful will, by his letters to all the counties of his kingdom, did enjoin and command, that all his subjects, as well spiritual as temporal, should take certain oaths in general, which were too grievous to them, and which might probably cause the final destruction of his people; and that they should confirm such their oaths under their letters and seals. To which royal command, the people of his kingdom did submit and pay obedience, that they might not incur his indignation or displeasure, and also for fear of death.—XXIX. When parties contending in the ecclesiastical court in causes merely ecclesiastical and spiritual, had endeavoured to obtain from the chanc. of England, prohibitions to hinder the lawful process in the said courts, and the said chanc. had justly refused to grant the same: yet the said king by letters under his signet, has frequently prohibited the ecclesiastical judges to proceed in such causes, thereby evilly infringing the liberties of the church in the Grand Charter approved, to the conservation whereof he was sworn, and damnably incurring perjury, and the sentence of excommunication against such violaters thereof by the holy fathers pronounced.—XXX. The said king without any reasonable or lawful cause whatsoever, or any other process of law, did in his parl. encompassed in warlike manner by armed men, adjudge Tho. of Arundel, lord abp. of Canterbury, (primate of all England, his spiritual father, absenting himself by the treacherous counsel of the said king) to banishment, against the laws of his kingdom, so by him sworn to as aforesaid.—XXXI. By inspection of the testament of the said king, sealed with the great and privy seal, and also with his signet, among other things there is contained this clause or article. "Item, we will that the residue of our gold, (the true debts of our household, chamber, and wardrobe, being paid, for payment whereof we bequeath 20,000 marks, reserving to our executors, 5 or 6000 marks; which we will by them to be expended towards the more plentiful maintenance of the lepers, and chaplains, to celebrate before them, by us founded at Westminster and Bermondsey,) shall remain to our successor, provided always that he approve, ratify and confirm, and hold, and cause to be holden, and firmly observed, all and singular the statutes, ordinances, and judgments, made, given, and rendered in our parl. begun at Westminster the 17th of Sept. in the 21st year of our reign, and in the same parl. continued at Shrewsbury, and there holden; and also all the ordinances, judgments, and establishments, of the 16th Sept. in the 22d of our reign, at Coventry; and afterwards at Westminster, the 8th of March, in the year aforesaid, by the authority of the said parl. and likewise all other ordinances and judgments, which shall hereafter happen to be made by authority of the said parl. But otherwise, if our said successor shall refuse to perform the premises, (which we do not believe) then we will that Tho. duke of Surrey, Edw. duke of Albemarle, John duke of Exeter, and Wm. le Scroop earl of Wiltshire, paying first the debts of our household, our chamber, and our wardrobe, and reserving 5 or 6000 marks, as aforesaid, shall have and hold all the said residue abovementioned; for to support and defend the said statutes, establishments, ordinances and judgments, to their utmost power, even unto death, if it be necessary; upon all which, and every part, we do hereby charge and burden their consciences as they will answer in the day of judgment." By which article it may evidently enough appear, that the said king did obstinately strive to maintain and defend those statutes and ordinances, which are erroneous and unjust, and repugnant to all law and reason. And this not only during his life, but after his death too; neither regarding the peril of his own soul, nor yet the utter destruction of his said kingdom or liege people.—XXXII. In the 11th year of the said king Rd. he the said king, in the chapel of his manor of Langley, in the presence of the dukes of Lancaster and York, and very many other lords, desiring, as it hath appeared, that his uncle the duke of Gloucester, then there present, should fully confide in the good will of him the said king; did voluntarily and of his own accord, swear before the venerable Sacrament of the Lord's Body, there placed upon the altar, that thenceforwards he would never endamage, trouble, or grieve him, the said duke of Gloucester, for any of his deeds which were said to have been committed against the person of him the said king, but did cheerfully and totally forgive him all his offence, if any were. Yet afterwards, notwithstanding such oath, the said king did horribly and cruelly cause the said duke to be murdered, for such the before pretended offences, thereby incurring the guilt of damnable perjury.—XXXIII. After one of the knights of the shires, of the said kingdom, having a voice in parl. had impeached the said Tho. abp. of Canterbury, upon certain defaults, committed against the king's majesty, as was untruly suggested; and the said abp. presently then and there offered himself ready to answer the matters charged upon him; and desired that he might be thereunto admitted by the king, not doubting, as he said, but he should be able sufficiently to shew his innocence: yet the said king, contriving by all the ways and means he could, to oppress the said abp. of Canterbury, and ruin his estate, as the event of the matter has declared, speaking graciously, and with a cheerful countenance to the said abp. from his royal seat, did advise, and very earnestly request him, that at that time, he would hold his peace, and expect a better and more fit time to make his defence; which day being passed, the said king from day to day, for 5 days or more, did fraudulently and treacherously deceive the said abp. counselling him, and persuading him, that he should not come to the parl. but wait at home without any fear; because, as the said king faithfully did promise him, there should not in his absence any loss or prejudice be done or happen to him. Notwithstanding all which, the said king, in his parl. aforesaid, did in the mean time, adjudge the said abp. to be banished, during the king's pleasure, though absent, and never any way called to answer, and without any reasonable cause whatsoever; and also voluntarily, against the laws of the kingdom and all justice, confiscated all his goods, whereby he likewise became guilty of perjury. But furthermore, the said king being willing to palliate his malice and subtilty, by flattering discourses which he oft-times had with the said abp. did endeavour to clear himself of such injury done, and make as if it were the doings of others; insomuch that the abp. discoursing with the king, and with the duke of Norfolk, and other lords, and great men of the kingdom; happened to say by way of lamenting his own condition, "That he was not the first that had suffered banishment, nor should he be the last; for he thought in a short time the duke of Norfolk, and other lords would follow him; and confidently averred to the king, that all the rigour of these proceedings would finally be returned back on his own head." To which the said king, as astonished, hastily replied, "That he verily thought it might so happen; and that he himself might and indeed ought to be expelled his kingdom by his liege people." And further, the said king said, "That if the same should happen, he would convey himself to the same place, where the said abp. should be." And that the abp. might the rather credit his words, he shewed him a certain great jewel, curiously formed, underneath the skirt of his outward vestment; intimating for certain, to the said abp. that whenever he should send that jewel for a token, he would not delay to come thither, where the said abp. should be resident: and that the said abp. might more confide in him; the said king sent to him, advising him, that he should privately send all his jewels, and other things of value, belonging to his chapel, unto him the said king, for the safe keeping thereof; lest by colour of the before-mentioned judgment, any one should wrongfully seize the same. Which, under the greatest confidence in the world, being done, the said king caused him to reposit the said goods in certain coffers; and the said coffers to be locked up, and sealed by one of the abp.'s clerks; and keeping the said coffers by him, returned the keys thereof by the said clerk to the abp.: yet afterwards, unknown to the said abp. caused the said coffers to be broken open, and disposed of the goods therein, at his will and pleasure. Furthermore, the said king faithfully promised the said abp. that if he would but repair to the port of Hampton, in order to go out of the realm, he would at last, by the intercession of the queen, get him recalled. And if it should happen, that he the said abp. should go out of the realm, he should without fail return into England, before Easter next following; nor should in any kind lose his archbishopric: and this he faithfully promised, swearing upon the cross of the late martyr st. Thomas, abp. of Canterbury, by him the said king corporally touched: all which promises notwithstanding, the said king forced the said abp. to depart the realm; and forthwith transmitted special letters to the apostolical see, to have him translated. And so, and by other frauds, and deceitful tricks of the said king, the said abp. being a well-meaning believing man, was subtilly circumvented."

After the recital of the foregoing Articles, the Record proceeds thus; "And because it seemed to all the estates of the realm, being asked their judgments thereupon, as well severally as jointly; that these causes of crimes and defaults were sufficient and notorious to depose the said king; considering also his own confession of his insufficiency, and other things contained in his said renunciation and cession, openly delivered; all the said states did unanimously consent, that ex abundanti, they should proceed unto a deposition of the said king; for the greater security and tranquillity of the people, and benefit of the kingdom. Whereupon the said states and commons unanimously constituted, and publicly deputed certain commissioners, viz. the bp. of st. Asaph, the abbot of Glastonbury, the earl of Gloucester, the lord Berkeley, sir Tho. Erpyngham, and sir Tho. Grey, knights, and sir Wm. Thirnyng, one of the justices, to pass such sentence of deposition; and to depose the said king Richard, from all kingly dignity, majesty, and honour, on the behalf and in the name, and by the authority of all the said states, as in like cases, from the antient custom of the said kingdom had been observed. And forthwith the said commissioners taking upon themselves the burthen of the said commission, and sitting on a tribunal before the said royal chair of state, having first had some debate of the matter, did on the behalf and in the name, and by the authority aforesaid, pass the said Sentence of Deposition, being reduced into writing; and caused such their sentence to be read and recited by the said bp. of st. Asaph, their colleague, by the will and command of the rest of the said commissioners: in these words;—

Sentence of Deposition passed upon Richard.]

"In the name of God, amen. We John bp. of st. Asaph, John Abbot of Glastonbury, Thos. earl of Gloucester, Thos. lord Berkeley, Thos. de Erpyngham, and Thos. Grey, knights, and Wm. Thirnyng, justice, commissioners specially deputed to the matters under-written, by the peers and lords spiritual and temporal of the kingdom of England, and the commons of the said kingdom, representing all the estates of the said realm, sitting in tribunal; and having considered the multiplied perjuries, cruelty, and very many other crimes of the said Richard, touching his govt. committed and perpetrated in his kingdoms and dominions aforesaid, during the time of his governance; all of them before the said states, openly and publicly propounded, exhibited, and recited; which have been and are so public, notorious, manifest, and scandalous, that they could not nor can be concealed with denial or excuse. And considering likewise the confession of the said Rd. acknowledging and reputing, and truly, and of his own certain knowledge, judging himself to have been and to be utterly insufficient and unmeet for the rule and govt. of the said kingdoms and dominions, and their appurtenances, and for such his notorious demerits worthy to be deposed; as by him the said Rd. was before declared, and by his will and command, published before the said states, and made known and exposed to them in the vulgar tongue; having already had diligent deliberation upon these things and all others, transacted in this affair before the said states and us, we do, on the behalf, and in the name, and by the authority to us in this matter committed, ex abundanti, and for caution, pronounce, decree, and declare him the said Rd. to have been, and to be unfit, unable, and utterly insufficient for, and unworthy of the rule and govt. of the said kingdoms, and the dominion, and rights, and appurtenances of the same; and for and by reason of the premises, to be deservedly deposed, of and from all royal dignity and honour, if any thing of such dignity and honour were yet remaining in him. And with the same caution we do depose him by this our definitive sentence in writing, expressly forbidding all and singular the lords, abps. bps. and prelates, dukes, marquisses, earls, barons, knights, vassals, and valvasors, and other subjects, and liege people of the said kingdoms and dominion, and other places to the said kingdoms and dominion belonging, that henceforth none of them shall any way obey or regard the said Richard, as king or lord of the said kingdom and dominion.

“Furthermore, the said states willing that nothing should be wanting which might be of value, or ought to be required touching the premises, being severally interrogated thereupon, did constitute the same persons that were before nominated commissioners, to be their procurators, jointly and severally to resign and give back to the said king Rd. the homage and fealty to him before made, and to intimate to him, if it should be requisite, all the premises, touching such his deposition and renunciation.—And then presently, as soon as it appeared by the premises, and the occasion of them, that the crown of England, with its appurtenances was vacant; the aforesaid Henry duke of Lancaster, rising up from his place, and standing so erected as he might conveniently be seen by the people, and humbly fortifying himself with the sign of the cross on his forehead, and on his breast, having also first called upon the name of Christ, did claim the said kingdom, so vacant as aforesaid, with its crown and all its members and appurtenances; in this form of words in his mother tongue:

“In the name of Fader, Son, and Holy Ghost, I Henry of Lancaster, chalenge this rewme of Ynglonde, and the crowne with all the members, and the appurtenances, als I that am descendit, be right line of the blode, comyng fro the gude lord king Henry therde, and thorghe that right that God of his grace hath sent mee, with helpe of my kyn, and of my frendes to recover it; the which rewme was in poynt to be on-done for default of governance, and undoyng of the gude laws.”

“After which claim and challenge, as well the lords spiritual as temporal, and all the states there present, being severally and jointly interrogated, what they thought of that claim; the said states with the whole people, without any difficulty or delay, did unanimously consent, that the said duke should reign over them. And forthwith, as the said king shewed to the states of the kingdom the signet of king Richard, delivered to him as a token of his will, that he should succeed him as aforesaid; the said abp. taking the said king Henry by the right hand, led him to the royal chair of state: and after the said king kneeling down before it, had prayed a little while, the said abp. of Canterbury, assisted by the abp. of York, did place the said king, and cause him to sit in the said royal seat; all the people wonderfully shouting for joy. And by and by the said abp. of Canterbury, having with much ado procured silence from the over-joyed multitude, made a short discourse, or oration in these words:—

The Abp. of Canterbury's Speech.] “Vir dominabitur populo; A man shall reign over my people, 1 Sam. ix. 17.—These are the words of the King of Kings, speaking to Samuel, and teaching him how a person should be qualified to rule, since the people desired to have a king given. And not unfitly may they be said of our lord the king, whom we behold this day; and if we but intimately consider these words, they afford us matter of great consolation; for God does not threaten us, as he did formerly his people by Isaiah, saying, Isa. iii. ‘I will make children to rule over them.’ But according to his compassion, who in his wrath remembereth mercy, he hath visited his people, and now children no more, as heretofore, shall lord it over them; for the Lord saith to them, “a man shall rule.” Of the late rulers of this kingdom or any of them, one might have fitly said that of the apostle, Cor. xiii. ‘I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child.’ The apostle repeats it thrice, ‘As a child I spake, I understood and thought.’ As to speech, tis certain that a child is unconstant in speaking, he easily speaks true, and as easily false, is ready in words to promise, but what he promises he presently forgets. Now these are things very inconvenient and dangerous in a king; nor is it possible that any realm shall stand long in happiness where these conditions bear sway. But from such mischiefs a kingdom is freed, whose sceptre is swayed by a man, for it belongs to a man to set a watch before his tongue; and such is our present happiness, over whom not a child, but a man is set, and such an one, as I hope we may say of him, that in Eccles. ix. ‘Blessed is the man that hath not erred with his tongue.’ Then saith the apostle, ‘I understood as a child:’ now a child relishes nothing but flatteries and pleasing things, and understands only baubles and trifles, and loves not one that argues according to truth, yea indeed hates him beyond all measure. But heretofore amongst us truth was trampled under foot, so that none durst speak it; and therefore tis plain and apparent enough, that he, that then reigned understood as a child.’ For a man is not addicted to such things, but understands wisdom, so that by the grace of God it may be said of him, as it is written Eccles. ix. ‘Blessed is the man that abideth in wisdom.’ For as a child is delighted in vanity, so a man has regard to truth and wisdom. Truth therefore shall enter and vanity depart, which has done so much mischief in our nation; for now a man shall rule, who seeks after truth, and not vanity or flattery.

Thirdly, it is said, I thought as a child, for a child thinks and studies only how to have his humour, and do things according to his own will, and not according to reason: therefore when a child reigns, there only self-will reigns, and reason is banished, and constancy is put to flight, and great danger ensues; from which danger we are delivered, for a man shall rule over us; to wit, one that speaks not like a child; but thus as one that has the perfection of reason.—'I come not to do my own will, but the will of him that sent me;' to wit, of God: and therefore of such a man we will say not only that he will abide in wisdom, but also that as a man, not a child, he will meditate on the circumspection of God; that is, he will every way diligently observe that God's will, not his own, be done; and so in the stead of a child wantoning in foolish stubborn humours, a man shall reign, and such a man that it shall be said of him—a king shall reign in wisdom, and he shall execute judgment, and do justice in the earth."

Henry's Declaration of Thanks.] Which harangue being ended, the said lord king Henry, to appease the minds of his subjects, did then and there utter these words:

"Sirs, I thank God and zowe spiritual and temporal, and all the states of the lond, and do zowe to wyte, it es noght my will that no man thyake that be way of conquest I wold disherit any man of his heritage, franchises, or other ryghts that hym ought to have, no put hym out of that that he has, and has had by the gude laws and customs of the rewme: except those persons that has been agan the gude purpose and the commune profit of the rewme."

And forthwith considering, that by the former vacancy of the royal throne, by the Cession and Deposition aforesaid, all power of justices, sheriffs, and other officers, throughout the kingdom was ceased: therefore, to the end that there might be no failure nor delay in the administration of justice, to the grievance of the people, he caused principal officers and justices to be made and sworn to him with the usual oaths. And it was immediately proclaimed by the king's command, that on Monday next, after the said feast of st. Michael, a parl. should be held. And that on the Monday following, should be the coronation of the said king at Westminster, and that all those that could claim any service in the said coronation should come to the White-hall of the palace, before the steward, constable, and marshal of England, on Saturday next, before the day of the said parl. to make their just demands in that behalf, and receive right therein. But as for the shortening the day assigned to the parl. there was a Protestation made by the king, "That it was not his intent that thereby any prejudice should be brought upon the states of his kingdom; nor that the same for the future should be drawn into example; but that such abbreviation of time was only made for the benefit and profit of the kingdom, and especially to save the labour and expences of several of his people, and that the grievances of the people might be the sooner remedied.' After which the king arising from his royal throne, and beholding the people with a cheerful and benign countenance, retired himself from thence, all the people rejoicing. And the same day, in the Whitehall aforesaid, made a solemn feast to the nobles and gentry, there in a vast multitude assembled.

Sir William Thirnyng's Account of the Conversation with Richard in the Tower.] And afterwards, viz. on Wednesday next following, the before-named Procurators so deputed as aforesaid, did, according as they were commanded, repair into the presence of the said late king Richard, being within the tower aforesaid; and the said sir Wm. Thirnyng the justice, for himself and his companions and fellow procurators, in the name of all the states and people aforesaid, did notify and fully declare unto the said Richard, their admission of his said Renunciation, and the manner, cause, and form of such sentence of Deposition, and presently did resign and give back to the said late king Richard, the homage and fealty formerly to him made as aforesaid. With these words:—

"The words which Wm. Thirnyng spake to monsire Richard, late king of England, at the Tower of London, in his chamber, on Wednesday next after the feast of st. Michael the Archangel, were as follow:

"Sire, it is wele know to zou, that ther was a parlement somon'd of all the states of the reaume for to be at Westmystre, and to begin on the Tuesday in the morn of the fest of st. Michel the Archangel, that was zesterday; by cause of the which summons all the states of this lond were there gadyr'd, the which states hole made thes same persones that ban comen here to zowe now, her procurators, and gaven hem full autorite and power, and charged hem for to say the words that we shall say to zowe in her name, and on their behalve; that is to wyttten, the bishop of Seint Assa for ersbishoppes and bishoppes, the abbot of Glastenbury for abbots and priours, and all other men of holy chirche, seculers and rewelers, the earle of Gloucestre for dukes and erls, the lord of Berkeley for barons and bannerettes, sir Thomas Ircpyngbam, chamberleyn, for all the bachilers and commons of this lond be south; sir Thomas Grey for all the bachilers and commons by north, and my felawe Johan Markham and me for to come with hem for all thes states. And so, sire, these words, and the doing that we shall say to zowe, is not onlych our wordes but the doyngs of all the states of this lond, and our charge in her name.—And he answered and said, that he wyste wele that he wold noght say but as we were charged.—Sire, ze remembre zowe wele that on Moneday in the fest of seint Michel the archaungel, ryght here in this chamber, and in what presence ze renounced and cessed of the state of kynge and of lordship, and of all the dignite and wyrship that longed thereto, and assoiled all your lieges of her ligeance and obeisance that longed to you uppe the fourme that is contened in the same renunciation and cession, which ye redde your self by your mouth, and affirmed it by your othe, and by your owne writing. Upon which ye made and ordeined your procuratours the ersbishop of Zork and the bishop of Hereford for to notifie and declare in your name thes renunciation and cession at Westmynstre to all the states, and all the people that was there gadyr'd, bycause of the summons aforesaid, the which thus don yesterday by thes lords your procuratours, and wele herde and understouden, thes renunciation and cession were plenelich and frelich accepted, and fullich agreed by all the states and people foresaid. And over this, sire, at the instance of all thes states and people, there were certain articles of defautes in your governance redde there, and tho wele herd and pleinelich understouden to all the states foresaid, hem thocht hem so trewe, and so notorie and knowen, that by the causes, and by no other, as thei sayd, and havynge consideration to your own wordes in your own renunciation and cession, that ye were not worthy, no sufficient ne able for to governe, for your owne demerites, as it is more pleinelich contened therein; hem thocht that was resonable and cause for to depose you, and her commissaries that they made and ordein'd, os it is of record, ther declared and decreed and adjudged you for to be deposed, and pryved you of the astate of king, and of the lordship contened in the renunciation and cession forsayd, and of all the dignite and wyrshippe, and of all the administration that longed thereto. And we procurators to all thes states and people forsayd os we be charged by hem, and by her autorite gyffen us, and in her name zelde you uppe for all the states and people forsayd, homage, leige, and feaute, and all leigeance, and all other bondes, charges, and services that long thereto, and that non of all thes states and people fro this tyme forward ne bere you feyth, ne do you obeisance os to thar king.—And he answered and seyde, that he loked not ther after, but he seyde, that after all this he hoped that is cosyn wolde be gude lord to hym."

Richard's Speech to the Committee, &c.] So far the Record. Sir John Hayward tells us, that when the committee appointed to receive Richard's resignation assembled at the Tower for that purpose, the day before the parl. was to begin, the unhappy monarch was brought forth, apparelled in his royal robe, the diadem on his head, and the sceptre in his hand; and was placed amongst them in a chair of state. He adds, that after a little pause and expectation, the king arose from his seat, and spake to the assembly these words, or the very like in effect:

"I assure myself, that some at this present, and many hereafter, will account my case lamentable; either that I have deserved this dejection, if it be just; or if it be wrongful, that I could not avoid it. Indeed I do confess, that many times I have shewed myself both less provident and less painful for the benefit of the commonwealth, than I should, or might, or intended to do hereafter; and have in many actions more respected the satisfying of my own particular humour, than either justice to some private persons, or the common good of all; yet I did not at any time either omit duty or commit grievance, upon natural dulness or set malice; but partly by abuse of corrupt counsellors, partly by error of my youthful judgment. And now the remembrance of these oversights is so unpleasant to no man as to myself; and the rather because I have no means left, either to recompence the injuries which I have done, or to testify to the world my reformed affections, which experience and stayedness of years had already corrected, and would daily have framed to more perfection. But whether all the imputations wherewith I am charged be true, either in substance, or in such quality as they are laid; or whether, being true, they be so heinous as to enforce these extremities; or whether any other prince, especially in the heat of youth, and in the space of 22 years, the time of my unfortunate reign, doth not sometimes, either for advantage, or upon displeasure, in as deep manner grieve some particular subject, I will not now examine: it helpeth not to use defence, neither booteth it to make complaint; there is no place left for the one, nor pity for the other: and therefore I refer it to the judgment of God, and your less distempered considerations. I accuse no man, I blame no fortune, I complain of nothing; I have no pleasure in such vain and needless comforts; and if I listed to have stood upon terms, I know I have great favourers abroad; and some friends, I hope, at home, who would have been ready, yea forward on my behalf, to set up a bloody and doubtful war; but I esteem not my dignity at so high a price, as the hazard of so great valour, the spilling of so much English blood, and the spoil and waste of so flourishing a realm, as thereby might have been occasioned. Therefore, that the commonwealth may rather rise by my fall, than I stand by the ruin thereof, I willingly yield to your desires; and am here come to dispossess myself of all public authority and title, and to make it free and lawful for you to create for your king, Henry duke of Lancaster, my cousin german, whom I know to be as worthy to take that place, as I see you willing to give it to him."

A Speaker chosen.] The next day the parl. met again, when the Commons presented to the king sir John Cheney, for their Speaker whom the king accepted, and he made the usual protestation, which was also allowed. But the day following the said sir John, with the commons, came again before the king, and declared, that by reason of a sudden disorder he was unable to serve, and that they had chose sir John Dorewood in his place; beseeching the king to allow the said sir John Darewood to be speaker for the commons. Which said knight, having made the usual protestation, was allowed as before.—Then the commons gave to the king for 3 years the subsidy on wools, skins, and wool-fells; that is 50s. on every sack from denizens, and 4 pounds from aliens; also one 10th and one 15th.—The next thing this parl. went upon was to pass an act of indemnity to screen those who, during the late troubles, had taken up arms in favour of the king, then duke of Lancaster; likewise to pass an act for the repealing the whole proceedings of the parl. at Shrewsbury, 21 Rd. II. and to confirm that parl. which was held the 11th of the said king, except the effect of the pardon granted by the said statute of the 21 Rd. II. which they ordained should stand, notwithstanding the rest of it was repealed. Also it was enacted, that nothing, for the future, should be esteemed or adjudged to be treason, but what was ordained to be so by the 25th of Edw. III. and that all blank charters, whatsoever, which the city of London, and 17 counties besides, had been forced to seal and give to king Rd. should be utterly void.

The abp. of Canterbury moved the house for their consent to address the king, that he would please to create Henry, his eldest son, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall and earl of Chester. Upon which the king, sitting in his royal seat, in full parl. put a coronet on the head of the said Henry, his eldest son, a ring of gold on his finger, and gave him a golden rod in his hand, and kissed him; also by a charter then given him, he was created prince of Wales, &c. His uncle, the duke of York, put the robes on the young prince, and afterwards brought him to the seat assigned, for that principality, in parl. It was also then enacted by all the estates, that the said prince should succeed his father in the realm of England; and they all promised to accept and obey him accordingly.

Motion as to the disposal of the late King's person.] The next day, the abp. of Canterbury moved, in the upper house, that the lords should in no wise disclose any thing that should then be put to them; which being promised by all, the earl of Northumberland put this important question to the house, "What they would advise was fit to be done with Rd. the late king, in order to his keeping in safe custody; for the king would have his life saved?" To which all the lords, whose names are here under-written, being severally examined, answered, "That it seemed adviseable to them, that he should be put under a safe and secret guard, and in such a place where no concourse of people might resort to him; and that he be guarded by trusty and sufficient persons, and that no person who had been familiar with him, should be about his person, and that it should be done in the most secret manner that can be devised."

The names of the Lords, who being asked, assented to the Question, are these following:

Bp. of Carlisle's Speech against it.] It is observable, that the bp. of Carlisle (a) is not in this list, and, indeed there is great reason for it; he being the only man, either in the prelacy or laity, that had the courage to oppose this usurpation at that time. Sir John Hayward has given us a speech made by this bp. on the occasion, when the last question was put in the house of Lords. We shall not contest the genuineness of it; so much is certain, that this honest man suffered greatly for his loyalty to the deposed prince; being deprived of his dignity, put under a long imprisonment, and, had it not been for his order which was then held too sacred, must have died the death of a traitor. If it be objected, that it was now too late to make speeches, when the new king was actually crowned, the aforesaid author has in some measure accounted for that, in remarking, "That this prelate was a man both learned and wise, and always used both liberty and constancy in a good cause; that in his secret judgment he never gave allowance to these proceedings, yet he dissembled his dislike until he might, to some purpose, declare it; therefore now, adds he, being in a place to be heard of all, and by order of the house to be interrupted by none, he rose up with a bold and resolute spirit, and uttered his mind as followeth:—

(a) The name of this bp. of Carlisle was Thos. Merks, alias, of Newmarket, alias Sumestre. He had been consecrated An. 1397, was deprived in 1399, but lived several years after. Walsingham says, he was made by the pope titular bp. of Samos. Sir W. Raleigh writes, that he was the only honest man in this parl. who scorned his life and fortune, in respect to his sovereign's right and his own allegiance.

“ This question, right hon. lords, concerneth a matter of great consequence and weight; the determining whereof will assuredly procure, either safe quiet, or dangerous disturbance, both to our particular consciences, and also to the common state. Therefore, before you resolve upon it, I pray you call to your consideration these two things; 1st. whether king Richard be sufficiently deposed or no; 2dly, whether king Henry be with good judgment or justice chosen in his place. For the 1st. point we are first to examine, whether a king, being lawfully and fully instituted by any just title, may upon imputation either of negligence, or of tyranny, be deposed by his subjects: 2ndly, what king Rd. hath omitted in the one, or committed in the other, for which he should deserve so heavy judgment. I will not speak what may be done in a popular state, or in a consular; in which although one beareth the name and honour of a prince, yet he hath not supreme power of majesty; but in the one, the people have the highest empire; in the other, the nobility and chief men of estate; in neither, the prince. Of the first sort was the commonwealth of the Lacedemonians, who after the form of govt. which Lycurgus framed, oftentimes fined, oftentimes fettered their kings, and sometimes condemned them to death; such were also in Cæsar's time, the petty kings of every city in France, who were many times arraigned upon life and death, and, as Ambiorix, prince of the Leodienses, confessed, had no greater power over the people, than the people had over them. Of the 2d condition were the Roman emperors at the first; of whom some, namely, Nero and Maximianus were openly condemned; others were suddenly surprized by judgment, and authority of the senate; and such are now the emperors of Germany, whom the other princes, by their aristocratical power, do not only restrain, but sometimes also remove from their imperial state; such are also the kings of Denmark and Swedeland, who are many times by the nobility dejected, either into prison, or into exile; such likewise are the dukes of Venice, and of some other free states in Italy; and the chiefest cause for which Lewis earl of Flanders was lately expelled from his place, was for drawing to himself cognizance in matters of life and death, which high power never pertained to his dignity. In these and such like governments, the prince hath not regal rights, but is himself subject to that power which is greater than his; whether it be in the nobility or the common people. But if the sovereign majesty be in the prince, as it was in the 3 first empires, and in the kingdom of Judea, and Israel; and is now in the kingdoms of England, France, Spain, Scotland, Muscovy, Turkey, Tartary, Persia, Ethiopia, and almost all the kingdoms of Asia and Africa; although for his vices he be unprofitable to the subject, yea hurtful, yea intolerable; yet can they lawfully neither harm his person, nor hazard his power, whether by judgment, or else by force. For neither one, nor all magistrates, have any authority over the prince, from whom all authority is derived, and whose only presence doth silence and suspend all inferior jurisdiction and power. As for force, what subject can attempt, or assist, or counsel, or conceal violence against his prince, and not incur the high and heinous crime of treason. It is a common saying, ‘Thought is free;’ free indeed from punishment of secular laws, except by word or deed it break forth into action; yet the secret thoughts against the sacred maj. of a prince, without attempt, without endeavour, have been adjudged worthy of death; and some who in auricular confession, have discovered their treacherous devises against the person of their prince, have afterwards been executed for the same. All laws do exempt a madman from punishment, because their actions are not governed by their will and purpose; and the will of man being set aside, all his doings are indifferent, neither can the body offend without a corrupt or erroneous mind: yet if a madman draw his sword upon his king, it hath been adjudged to deserve death. And least any man should surmise that princes, for the maintenance of their own safety and sovereignty, are the only authors of these judgments, let us a little consider the patterns and precepts of holy scripture. Nebuchadnezzar, king of Assyria, wasted all Palestine with fire and sword; besieged Jerusalem a long time; and at the last took it; slew the king; burnt the temple; took away the holy vessels and treasure; the rest he permitted to the cruelty and spoil of his unmerciful soldiers, who defiled all places with rape and slaughter, and ruinated to the ground that flourishing city: after the glut of this bloody butchery, the people that remained he led captive into Chaldea; there he erected his golden image, and commanded that they which refused to worship it, should be cast into a fiery furnace. What cruelty, what injustice, what impiety is comparable to this? and yet God calleth Nebuchadnezzar his servant, and promiseth hire and wages for his vice: and the prophets Jeremiah and Baruch did write to the Jews to pray for the life of him, and of Baltazar his son, that their days might be upon earth as the days of heaven: and Ezekiel with bitter terms abhorreth the disloyalty of Zedechiah, because he revolted from Nebuchadnezzar, whose homager and tributary he was. What shall we say of Saul? Did he not put all the priests to execution, because one of them did relieve holy and harmless David? Did he not violently persecute that his most faithful servant and dutiful son-in-law, during which pursuit, he fell twice into the power of David; who did not only spare, but also protect the king; reproveth the pretorian soldiers for their negligent watch; and was touched in heart for cutting away the lap of his garment; and afterwards caused the messenger to be slain, who upon request, and for pity, had lent his hand (as he said) to help forward the voluntary death of that sacred king? As for the contrary examples, as that of Jehu who slew Jehoram and Ahaziah, kings of Israel and Judah; they were done by express oracle and revelation from God, and are no more set down for our imitation than the robbing of the Egyptians, or any other particular and privileged commandment; but in the general precept, which all men must ordinarily follow, not only our actions, but our speeches also, and our very thoughts, are strictly charged with duty and obedience unto princes, whether they be good or evil. The law of God ordaineth, 'that he which doth presumptuously against the ruler of the people shall die;' and the prophet David forbiddeth to touch the lord's anointed; 'thou shalt not rail upon the judges, neither speak evil against the ruler of the people.' And the apostles do demand further, that even our thoughts and souls be obedient to higher powers; and lest any should imagine that they meant of good princes only, they speak generally of all; and further, to take away all doubt, they make express mention of the evil. For the power and authority of wicked princes is the ordinance of God; and therefore Christ told Pilate, that the power which he had was given him from above. For God stirred up the spirit even of wicked princes to do his will; and, as Jehosaphat said to his rulers, they execute not the judgment of man, but of the Lord: in regard hereof, David calleth them gods, because they have their rule and authority immediately from God; which, if they abuse, they are not to be adjudged by their subjects, for no power within their dominion is superior to theirs; but God reserveth them to the sorest trial; 'horribly and suddenly,' saith the wise man, 'will the Lord appear unto them, and a hard judgment shall they have.' The law of God commandeth, that the child shall be put to death for any contumely done unto the parents; but what if the father be a robber? If a murderer? If for all excess of villanies, odious and execrable both to God and man? Surely he deserveth the highest degree of punishments, and yet must not the son lift up his hand against him, for no offence is so great as to be punished by parricide: but our country is dearer unto us than our parents; and the prince is pater patriæ, the father of our country; and therefore more sacred and dear unto us than our parents by nature, and must not be violated, how imperious, how impious soever he be: doth he command or demand our persons or our purses, we must not shun for the one, nor shrink for the other; for, as Nehemiah saith, 'kings hath dominion over the bodies and over the cattle of their subjects at their pleasure.' Doth he enjoin those actions which are contrary to the laws of God? We must neither wholly obey nor violently resist, but with a constant courage submit ourselves to all manner of punishment, and shew our subjection by enduring, and not performing; yea, the church hath declared it to be an heresy, to hold that a prince may be slain or deposed by his subjects, for any disorder or default, either in life or else in government. There will be faults so long as there are men; and as we endure with patience a barren year if it happen, and unseasonable weather, and such other defects of nature, so must we tolerate the imperfections of rulers; and quietly expect, either a reformation, or else a change.—But alas, good king Rd. why such cruelty? What such impiety hath he ever committed? Examine rightly those imputations which are laid against him, without any false circumstance of aggravation, and you shall find nothing objected, either of any truth, or of great moment. It may be, that many errors and oversights have escaped him, yet none so grievous to be termed tyranny; as proceeding rather from unexperienced ignorance, or corrupt counsel, than from any natural or wilful malice. Oh, how shall the world be pestered with tyrants, if subjects may rebel upon every pretence of tyranny? How many good princes shall daily be suppressed by those by whom they ought to be supported? If they levy a subsidy, or any other taxation, it shall be claimed oppression: if they put any to death for traitorous attempts against their persons, it shall be exclaimed cruelty: if they do any thing against the lust and liking of the people, it shall be proclaimed tyranny.—But let it be, that without authority in us, or desert in him, king Rd. must be deposed: yet what right had the duke of Lancaster to the crown? Or what reason have we without his right to give it to him. If he make title as heir unto king Rd. then must he stay until king Rd.'s death; for no man can succeed as heir to one that liveth. But it is well known to all men, who are not either wilfully blind or grossly ignorant, that there are some now alive, lineally descended from Lionel duke of Clarence, whose offspring was by judgment of the high court of parl. holden the 9th year of king Rd. declared next successor to the crown, in case king Rd. should die without issue. Concerning the title from Edmund Crouchback, I will pass it over; seeing the authors thereof are become ashamed of so absurd abuse, both of their own knowledge and our credulity; and therefore all the claim is now made by right of conquest, by the cession and grant of king Rd. and by the general consent of all the people. It is a bad wool that will take no colour; but what conquest can a subject pretend against his sovereign, where the war is insurrection, and the victory high and heinous treason? As for the Resignation which Rd. made, being a pent prisoner for the same cause, it is an act extorted by force, and therefore of no validity to bind him; and seeing, that by the laws of this land the king alone cannot alienate the ancient jewels and ornaments pertaining to the crown, surely he cannot give away the crown itself, and therewithal the kingdom.—Neither have we any custom, that the people at pleasure should elect their king; but they are always bound unto him, who by right of blood is right successor; much less can they confirm and make good that title, which is before by violence usurped; for nothing can then be freely done, when liberty is once restrained by fear. So did Scylla, by terror of his legions, obtain the law “Velleia” to be made, whereby he was created dictator for fourscore years; and by like impression of fear, Cæsar caused the law “Servia” to be promulged, by which he was made perpetual dictator: but both these laws were afterwards adjudged void. As for the deposing of king Edw. II. it is no more to be urged, than the poisoning of king John, or the murdering of any other good and lawful prince: we must live according to laws, and not to examples; and yet the kingdom was not then taken from the lawful successor. But if we look back to times lately past, we shall find that these titles were more strong in king Stephen, than they are in the duke of Lancaster. For king Henry I. being at large liberty, neither restrained in body, nor constrained in mind, had appointed him to succeed; as it was upon good credit certainly affirmed. The people assented to this designment; and thereupon, without fear, and without force, he was anointed king, and obtained full possession of the realm. Yet Henry, son of the earl of Anjou, having a nearer right by his mother to the crown, notwithstanding his father was a stranger, and himself born beyond the seas, raised such rough wars upon king Stephen, that there was no end of spoiling the goods, and spilling the blood of the unhappy people, besides the ruins and deformities of many cities and holds, until his lawful inheritance was to him assured. It terrifieth me to remember how many flourishing empires and kingdoms have been, by means of such contentions, either torn in pieces with intestine division, or subdued to foreign princes, under pretence of assistance and aid; and I need not repeat how this realm hath heretofore been shaken with these several mischiefs: and yet neither the examples of other countries, nor the miseries of our own, are sufficient to make us beware.—O Englishmen, worse bewitched than the foolish Galatians! Our unstaidd minds and restless resolutions do nothing else but hunt after our own harms: no people have more hatred abroad, and none less quiet at home: in other countries, the sword of invasion hath been shaken against us: in our own land, the fire of insurrection hath been kindled among us: and what are these innovations, but whetstones to sharpen the one, and bellows to blow up the other.—Certainly I fear that the same will happen unto us which Æsop fableth to have been fallen unto the frogs, who being desirous to have a king, a beam was given unto them; the first fall whereof did put them in some fear, but when they saw it lie still in the stream, they insulted thereon with great contempt, and desired a king of quicker courage: then was sent unto them a stork, which stalking among them with stately steps, continually devoured them. The mildness of king Rd. hath bred in us this scorn, interpreting it to be cowardice and dullness of nature. The next heir is also rejected: I will not say that with greater courage we shall find greater cruelty; but if either of these shall hereafter be able to set up their side, and bring the matter to trial by arms, I do assuredly say, that which part soever shall carry the fortune of the field, the people both ways must go to wreck. And thus have I declared my mind concerning this question, in more words than your wisdom, yet fewer than the weight of the cause, doth require; and do boldly conclude, that we have neither power nor policy, either to depose king Rd. or to elect duke Henry in his place; that king Rd. remaineth still our sovereign prince, and therefore it is not lawful for us give judgment upon him; that the duke, whom you call king, hath more offended against the king and the realm, than the king hath done, either against him or us: for being banished the realm for 10 years by the king and his council, amongst whom his own father was chief; and sworn not to return again without special licence; he hath not only violated his oath, but with impious arms disturbed the quiet of the land, and dispossessed the king from his royal estate; and now demandeth judgment against his person, without offence proved, or defence heard. If this injury and this perjury doth nothing move us, yet let both our private and common dangers somewhat withdraw us from these violent proceedings.”

This speech, says the historian, now quoted, was differently taken, as men were then differently affected, between fear, hope, and shame; yet, the major part, by far, shewed themselves in the interest of their new king Henry; and the orator was instantly attached of high treason, by the earl marshal, and sent prisoner to the abbey of saint Albans.

Farther Proceedings of this Parl.] The commons appeared again with their Speaker, and declared to the king, that the duke of Britany had sent word that he was ready to do all which the king would desire him, and therefore prayed that the earldom of Richmond, being his own inheritance, might not be granted away by any letters patents, which petition was made a request from the commons.—The duke of York, the earl of Northumberland, and others of kindred to the abp. of Canterbury, prayed the king that the said abp. might have his recovery against Roger Walden, who had been made abp. of Canterbury during the others exile, for sundry wastes and spoils, done by the said Roger in the archbishopric aforesaid, which the king instantly granted, and thanked them for their motion. But the commons, upon hearing of this award, prayed the king that, since they were not made privy to the judgment aforesaid, no record might be made to charge or make them parties therein. To which the abp. of Canterbury, by the king's command answered, "That the commons were only petitioners, and that all judgments belong to the king and lords; unless it was in statutes, grants of subsidies or such like;" which ordinance the king willed should be from that time observed.

Sir Wm. Rickhill, one of the judges to the late king, but now a prisoner, was brought before the parl. and required to answer by what warrant he took and certified the Confession of the late duke of Gloucester, in the 21st of Rd. II. (see p. 229); and by order of the king, sir Walter Clopton, chief justice, was put to examine him. But Rickhill, answering at full, and producing sufficient authority for what he had done, and his sincere dealing therein, the lords unanimously declared that they thought he had acted justly; and upon this the chief justice adjudged the said sir Wm. acquitted thereof for ever.

Petitions of the Commons, with the King's Answers.] P. That the liberties of the church, the great charter, and charter of the forests, be confirmed. A. The king willeth the same.—P. That the lords spiritual, temporal, and the judges, do not from henceforth plead, in excuse, that they durst not for fear of death to speak the truth. A. The king reputeth them all to be just, and that they will not give him council to the contrary; but if they do, let complaint be made.—P. That all the king's chief officers be sworn to shun all bribery, and such as are attainted thereof to lose all they have. A. Every such officer, upon attain, shall be punished for his misdoing; otherwise the statutes already made may suffice.—P. That no part of the crown-lands may be sold, given, or exchanged: and that there be a resumption of such as are. A. The king will be advised of this.—P. That every man may pursue his remedy for all havock and spoils, committed since the coming of the king. A. For spoils done where the king's army hath been, he will be advised; for the rest he granteth.—P. That all men dispossessed of any tenements, without process of law, may be restored, if done since the king's coming in. A. They are remitted to the common law.—P. That, in consideration of the great plague in the North, it would please the king to lie with his army in the midst of the kingdom. A. The king will be advised.—P. That the king will appoint able captains, as well in England as in Wales. A. The king meaneth no less.—The commons grant to the king, that he shall be as free and enjoy as great liberties as any of his progenitors had before him; whereupon the king, in parl. promised that he would not turn the same contrary to the laws.—P. The commons pray the reversal of the judgment given against Rd. earl of Arundel in the 21st of king Rd. and that restitution be made to Thomas his son and heir. A. The king hath shewn favour to Thomas now earl, and to others.—P. That such records, touching the inheritance of the said earl of Arundel and Surrey, late embezzled, may be sought for and restored. A. The king willeth.—P. They make the like request for restitution to be made to Tho. earl of Warwick. A. The king hath shewn favour to him also.—P. They require a repeal of the act made 21 Rd. II. with a general restitution of lands and goods, to all such as lost thereby. A. The king has been gracious in this also, and for the rest he will be advised.

Proceedings against the Lords' Appellants.] The commons prayed the king, that the lords, who were Appellants in the parl. held the 21st of the late king Rd. may be called on to answer for their acts done at that time. The records of which were brought and read in parl. in the presence of Edw. duke of Albemarle, Tho. duke of Surrey, John duke of Exeter, John marq. of Dorset, John earl of Salisbury, and Tho. earl of Gloucester. These were all the accusers of the abp. and the rest of the lords, in the parl. of the 21st of Rd. II. that were spared from execution; except king Henry himself, then earl of Derby, who was the principal person concerned in that affair.—The duke of Albemarle was called on first, who pleaded in excuse, "That he was no contriver of the said appeal; and what he then did, was by the king's command, whom he durst not disobey. That in relation to king Henry's exile, and revocation of his patent, it was entirely against his will, and he called certain lords to witness the same; he also endeavoured to excuse himself from advising, or being any ways privy to the death of the duke of Gloucester."—The duke of Surrey prayed the king to consider the tender age, and small reputation he was in, at the time the appeal was made. Afterwards, he answered in all points, as the former duke had done; all which he offered to prove when the king should appoint.—The duke of Exeter pleaded also as above; only, in relation to the duke of Gloucester, he added, that he heard king Rd. say, that he should be slain.—The marq. of Dorset affirmed, as before, only he made no mention of the duke of Gloucester.—The earl of Salisbury said, that he was drawn into the appeal, for fear of his life; and for that he was accused by the duke of Norfolk, that he should have meant to have slain the duke of Lancaster, the king's father. Albeit, he was ready by the king's order, to have disproved the charge; but, for that he had not yet offered to acquit himself thereof, he asked pardon for the same.—The earl of Gloucester affirmed the same with the duke of Albemarle.—After these noblemen had answered the several questions, they were all ordered to withdraw, whilst the king and parl. consulted what sentence to award for them. And the king and lords did adjudge, "That the said dukes, marq. and earls, should lose their names and titles, and all the honours thereto belonging; and that they should forfeit all the lands and goods, which they, or any of them had given them at the death of the said duke of Gloucester."

ter, or at any time since; and that if they, or any of them, should espouse the quarrel, or assist the person of king Rd. lately deposed, that then the same should be treason." Which sentence or judgment, by the king's command, was pronounced by sir Wm. Thirning, lord chief justice of the king's bench.—But after all, we find that as to their lands, it was left to the king either to continue them in possession, or turn them out if he pleased. Yet Henry not only left them their estates, but also restored them to their honours.

On the 29th of Nov. the commons required, that the arrest and judgment against Wm. le Scroop, earl of Wiltshire, sir Hy. Green, and John Bussy, knights, who had been executed without any process at Bristol, might be confirmed in full parl. On which sir Rd. le Scroop petitioned the king that nothing might be done to disinherit him or his children, considering the said Wm. was his son. The commons asked sir Rd. if the judgment against his son was lawful? Who answered, that it was lawful. Upon which the king said, that he would have all the lands of the persons aforesaid forfeited to him by way of conquest, as of those who had been the chief actors in the parl. of the 21st of Rd. II.

Inquiry into the Murder of the Duke of Gloucester.] The last thing which we shall mention in the proceedings of this parl. is some farther enquiry made there in relation to the duke of Gloucester; which though not all mentioned in Cotton's Abridgment, our older Chroniclers, particularly Hollingshead, are very exact in describing. Sir John Baggot, then a prisoner in the tower, was brought to the bar of the house, and there examined on the affair of that murder; who there declared, in a bill, then delivered in, "That it was by the advice and instigation of the duke of Albemarle, that the lords were apprehended by the king, and that the duke of Gloucester was inhumanly murdered at Calais. That the duke of Norfolk did keep the duke of Gloucester alive 3 weeks against the king's will; but, for fear of the king's displeasure, the said duke and himself, with several of the king's servants, went over to Calais, and saw him put to death." After this declaration was openly read, the duke of Albemarle rose up and said, "That he utterly denied the charge to be true against him, and offered to justify his innocence by combat, in such manner as should be thought requisite." But Baggot, not being at liberty to accept the challenge, the lord Fitz-Walter, and 20 other lords, offered to make it good by their bodies, that he was the cause of the duke of Gloucester's death. The duke of Surrey stood up against the lord Fitz-Walter, and having affirmed that what the duke of Albemarle had done against the duke of Gloucester, was by constraint, he offered to vindicate him by fight; and all their hoods, which they flung down as pledges of their intentions, were delivered to the constable and marshal to be kept. But all these differences the king thought proper to accommodate, in a way more politic and more consistent with the exigency of the times, than suffering them to go on to a martial trial.—Baggot, in one of his examinations before the house, mentioned one John Hall, then a prisoner in Newgate, who could say much more than he, relating to the death of the duke of Gloucester. Which Hall, being sent for and examined, confessed the whole matter; whose examination, confession, and sentence passed against him, being on the rolls, we shall give from sir Robert Cotton's own account of it.

"John Hall, a servant of the duke of Norfolk, being examined by sir Walter Clopton, chief justice, in full parl. confessed upon his oath, that in the month of Sept. 21 Rd. II. the duke of Norfolk charged the said John, among others, to murder the duke of Gloucester, there being present one John Colfox, an esq. of the said duke of Norfolk; and that they two then being at Calais, went together to Our Ladies church, where they found Wm. Hemsley, esq. as aforesaid, — Bradshaw, esq. as aforesaid, Wm. Servadlet, of the chamber of the late king Rd. Francis Vadlett, of the chamber of the duke of Albemarle; Wm. Rogers, Wm. Dennice, and — Cockle, servants to the said duke of Norfolk; all whom were sworn upon the body of Christ, before one Sir Wm. Chaplain, of st. George's, in the church of our lady, that they should not disclose the said fact or murder. That after this oath made, they altogether went with the duke of Norfolk, towards the house called the Princes Inn, and when they were come, the said duke of Norfolk caused the persons aforesaid to enter into a lodging within the same house, and so departed. After which John Lovetofte, with sundry other esqrs. brought the duke of Gloucester, and delivered him to the said Searl and Francis, in an inner parlour, and said, 'There is Searl and Francis;' whereupon the duke of Gloucester said, 'Now I see I shall do well,' and so asked Searl how the king did? who said 'well;' and sent to him commendations, and so the said John Lovetofte departed. Whereupon the said Searl and Francis, took the said duke of Gloucester into an upper chamber, saying, 'That they would speak with him;' unto whom when they were come there, they said, 'That the king's will was, that he should be slain;' the duke answered thereto, 'If it be so it is welcome;' that Searl and Francis willed the duke to take a chaplain, whom the duke there took, and was confessed. After which confession they caused the duke to lye upon a bed, upon whom so lying, the said Searl and Francis threw a feather-bed, the sides whereof the said Wm. Rogers, Dennice, and Cockle of the chamber, held; and Searl and Francis lay on the mouth of the said duke until he was dead; Colfox, Hemsley, and Bradshaw, sat that night by the duke on their knees, weeping, and praying for the soul of the said duke; and Hall, this examinant, kept the door until the duke was slain. After the death of which duke, the duke of Norfolk came in, and seeing him dead, said, 'It were a great matter to have the said duke living again.' By whose confession it seemed to the lords, that he the said John Hall, had deserved a grievous death; whereupon they adjudged, by the assent of the king, that the same Hall should be drawn from Tower-Hill to Tyburn, his bowels to be burned before him, his body to be hanged, headed, and quartered, and his head to be sent and set upon Calais, and his quarters at the king's pleasure; and the marshal the same day did execution accordingly."

A Parl. called.] Writs of summons were sent out, directed to Henry prince of Wales, &c. and dated at Westm. the 19th of Sept. 1400, for a parl. to meet at York, on the feast of All Souls, next coming. Cotton has given us no more than the names of the peers that were summoned to this parl.; it is probable that the business of it was interrupted by the insurrections, then made in the nation, in favour of king Richard.

A Parl. called.] After these commotions were, in some measure, quieted, another parl. was summoned to meet on the 21st of Jan. 1401, when the knights and burgesses were called into the chancery court, in Westminster-Hall, before the chancellor and the steward of the king's household, by name; upon whose appearance, the chanc. put off the parl. to the next day, by the king's authority. On the said day sir Wm. Thyrning, chief justice of the king's bench, by the king's command, declared, "That this parl. was called to the end that Holy Church, and other corporations and persons should enjoy their liberties; that all good laws should be executed, and justice truly ministered; and that nothing should be done in derogation of the common law." He then rehearsed, "What great charges the king had been at for his coronation; for suppressing the late rebellion attempted by the nobles; for his expedition against the Scots; and, lastly, for resisting the rebels in North Wales; all which adventures he had undertaken in his own proper person." He further told them, "That the king was bound to return the queen into France, with all such jewels and riches as king Richard had with her in marriage. He put them in mind of the charges for keeping of Calais, and the king's other fortresses abroad; especially for the duchy of Guienne, being annexed to the crown, for the which war was likely to ensue, because the king of France had created his eldest son duke of Guienne; and, lastly, for the wars in Scotland and Ireland. For the support of all which great charges he urged the lords and commons to consult and to consider the importance of them: he concluded with desiring the commons to choose a Speaker, and to present him the next day to the king."

Sir A. Savage chosen Speaker.] On the 23d of Jan. the commons presented to the king sir

Arnold Savage for their Speaker, who made the accustomed protestation, for himself and the commons, which was accepted and enrolled. On the 25th, the commons by their speaker, in full parl. "gave the king most hearty thanks for his promise of maintaining the catholic faith. They desired that the king would not give an ear to any slanderous and untrue reports concerning their proceedings, but let the event shew the same." Which being promised, the speaker went on and declared to the king, "That to every good govt. 4 things appertained, viz. wisdom, prowess, manhood and riches; all which he affirmed was in the king and his nobility, as the world very well knew, and they would approve; for the hearts and good-will of subjects, which his maj. had, were the riches of a king. Therefore, for certain reasons, the commons would persuade the king not to agree to the challenges, which the French had made to him and the lords." This the king promised not to attempt without their advice, and gave them thanks for their tender good will to him.

Petitions of the Commons.] Jan. 31, the commons, by word of mouth prayed, that certain Petitions might be answered by the king, which he, again, desired might be put in writing, and then he promised to answer them. Feb. 21, the commons prayed the king to execute the ordinance of king Rich. II. upon the conquest of Wales, viz. that no Welchman born should bear any office in that country, &c. The king promised to send for the ordinance, and cause execution of it. They then required the king, that, according to the laws and customs of the realm, he would seize into his hands the houses and lands of all alien priories, and donatives, during the wars. To this the king required advice, and promised to do therein as the bps. and peers should instruct him. The same day, on a like motion, the king revoked all annuities granted out of the custom of wools; and at the same time they required the king to commit the charge of wool-weighing, and the inventory of king Richard's goods, which the treasurers had delivered to them, to some persons as might make due enquiry thereof, and discharge the commons of it. They also desired, "That all matters transacted in this parl. might be engrossed before the departure of the justices." It was answered, "That the clerk of parl. had orders so to do." At the same time the commons declared, "That it was not the usual custom for them to grant any subsidy before they had received answers to their petitions; and prayed the observation of that custom from thenceforth." Upon this the king required a conference with the lords; and, on the last day of the session, gave the commons this answer, "That there was never any such use known, but that they should first go through with all other business, which ordinance the king intended not to alter." After which a subsidy was granted of 1-10th, and 1-15th;

2s. on every tun of wine, and 8d. in the pound on merchandize.

Proceedings against several Lords for Treason, &c.] The lords temporal, with the king's assent, adjudged Tho. Holland late earl of Kent, John Holland late earl of Huntington, John Montagu late earl of Salisbury, Tho. le Despenser and Ralph Lumley, knights, and several others, who were, for their treasons and rebellions, taken by certain of the king's subjects, and beheaded as traitors, that they should forfeit all such lands as they had in fee, Jan. 5, in the 1st of this king, or at any time after, together with all their goods and chattels. But the commons coming before the king, March the 5th, their Speaker in an oration he made to the throne, took occasion, "to liken the 3 estates of the realm to the Trinity, as consisting of king, bps. and lords, and the commons; wherein, adds he, ought to be unity; and therefore prayed the king to reconcile the earl of Rutland and the lord Fitz-walter." These lords kneeling, at the same time, and submitting themselves to the king's will, were both pardoned. The commons first, and the lords after, pray that the earl of Somerset might have the same mercy extended to him as the earl of Rutland, and be both restored to their goods, names and liberties, notwithstanding the judgment given against them, primo Regis; which, the king, with thanks for their motion, also granted.

An affair of the like nature with the preceding deserves also our notice. It seems that Henry le Spenser, the bp. of Norwich so much spoken of in the beginning of the last reign, had been accused by sir Tho. Erpingham, then vice-chamberlain to the king, of being a stirrer in the last insurrections, or at least a favourer of that cause. The bp. was sent for, to come before the king in parl. and on his appearance the king ordered him to be placed in his accustomed seat: then his maj. declared, "that he took the accusations of the said sir Tho. against the said bp. to be just, and to proceed from the great zeal the accuser had for him; nevertheless, considering the order of the said bp. and that he was of the king's lineage, and to oblige him to better behaviour for the future, he pardoned the said bp. all his misprisions done against his person." The whole bench of bps. stood up at this, and gave his maj. their thanks in open parl. and desired him to cause the said bp. of Norwich and sir Tho. Erpingham to shake hands and kiss each other, in token of amity.

Act for putting Heretics to Death.] The commons required the king to assist in pacifying the schism then in the church of Rome, which had continued a long time, if it could be done without any charge to this realm. The lords also desired the same.—The king answered, "that the bps. should consider of it." And at home, in order to suppress the Reformers, or the followers of Wickliffe's doctrine, which was still adhered to by many, a writ is mentioned in the Records of this parl.

to be sent to the sheriffs, of London, for the burning of Wm. Sawtre, a clerk, convicted of heresy by his clergy, and by them adjudged to be burnt. There was also a statute made in this session of parl. touching the imprisoning, or punishing with death, such as held any erroneous opinion in religion; but Cotton remarks, "that the printed statute differs greatly from the record, not only in form, but much more in matter, in order to maintain ecclesiastical tyranny." His publisher, Prynne, has this note upon it: "that this was the first statute and butcherly knife that the impeaching prelates procured or had against the poor preachers of Christ's gospel." Fox writes also, that Henry IV. who deposed Rich. II. was the first of all English kings that began the unmerciful burning of Christ's saints.

Act against Provisions from Rome.] However, some other laws were made in this parl. of great use and advantage to the state; viz. "that no provisions should be brought from Rome, by any religious person, to exempt them from obedience to the secular power; and that all such persons, who shall bring any such provisions into the nation, shall incur a præmunire. That no person shall carry any gold or silver coin out of the nation, without a special licence from the king; and if any one shall presume to do to the contrary, he shall forfeit all the said coin to the king. That the chirographer of the Common-Pleas, the clerk of the Crown and King's-Bench, and the marshal of the Marshalsea of the king's house, should take no greater fees than what are prescribed and limited by the statutes."

A Subsidy granted.] On the 10th of March, being the last day of this parl. the commons all kneeled before the king, and besought him to pardon them, if, through ignorance, they might have offended him; which the king readily granted. Then the whole assembly heard mass together, when the abp. of Canterbury read the epistle and gospel; the king did the sacrifice by promising to maintain the faith of holy church; and when they were come to say, Ite, missa est, et Deo gratias, the commons offered their granted subsidy; for the which the king returned them all thanks, and the chancellor dismissed them to their own home.

A Parl. called.] A parl. was summoned to meet at Westminster, on the 30th of Sept. 1403; which being assembled, and the knights, &c. called over, as usual in the court of Chancery, the next day the lord high chanc. in the presence of the king, declared the cause of their meeting to be, "1st. for preserving the rights and liberties of holy church, and of all corporations and persons." Then he took for his theme, pax multa diligentibus legem; from which he took occasion "to commend peace, and to shew the great blessings of it. He said, that peace was always with those that obeyed the laws; and, contrarily, he urged the gall and mischief of dissension and disobedience; and that there was no other way to check peace-breakers than by war. He declared, that by dissension and private discord, the flower of all chivalry, the stock of nobles within this realm, was in a manner lately consumed; and that the whole nation was in danger of being subverted, had not God, as a deliverer, raised up the king. He put them in mind of the king's late great victory against the Scots; he much lamented the great schism in the church, by having two popes; and told them, that the king intended to do his part towards healing the same. He then desired them to provide Ways and Means for maintaining the war against Scotland; for subduing the enemies in Wales; for conquering Ireland, and putting a stop to their prince in that country; for defending Guienne, Calais, and the marshes thereof; and desired the commons to choose a speaker, and to present him on the morrow for approbation".

Sir H. de Redford chosen Speaker.] The next day the commons presented sir Henry de Redford for their Speaker, who, making the usual protestation, it was granted. This house took several days to consider of the lord chancellor's charge to them. On the 10th of Oct. the chancellor acquainted the king that the commons desired to have certain of the lords sent to them, with whom they might confer. The king granted their request, with this protestation, "that the same was done out of favour, and not of duty;" which protest was enrolled by the clerk. Then the king sent the steward of his household and his secretary to the commons, to acquaint them with it; who returned for answer to the king, that they accepted of his protestation; and accordingly 4 bps. 4 earls, and 4 barons were ordered to attend them.

On the 16th of Oct. the commons in full parl. by the mouth of their Speaker, "gave to the king their most humble thanks for his many valiant exploits; namely, for his last expedition into Scotland, and for his three several journies into Wales, since the former; wherein they took occasion to praise the valour of the prince; and forgot not to mention the noble service performed by the ld. Thomas, the king's 2nd. son, in Ireland. As for the victory in Scotland, they humbly hoped, that by good policy it might be made to turn to the advantage and ease of the commons; and because in that battle the earl of Northumberland behaved gallantly, they prayed the king to give him thanks."

A Subsidy granted.] On the 25th of Oct. the commons, with the assent of the bps. and the lords, granted to the king the usual subsidy on wools, wool-fells, and skins, for 3 years; also 3s. on every tun of wine, and 12d. in the pound on merchandize, besides a 10th and a 15th. This large and extensive grant put the king into such good humour, that he sent the earl of Northumberland to invite the whole body of the commons to dine with him the next day.

A Parliament called.] Another parl. was summoned to meet at Westminster, Jan. 14th, 1404. Being all assembled, the bp. of London, the king's brother, and then lord chanc. in the presence of the king, lords, and commons, declared the cause of the parl. for the preservation of holy church, &c. He then took for his text these words, multitudo sapientium, &c. and thereby learnedly argued, "that by council every realm was governed: he resembled every state to the body of a man, and applied the right hand to the church, and the left to the temporal lords, and the rest of the members to the commonalty: of all which members and estates, the king, as the head, was desirous to have their advice, and had called the said parl. on divers occasions, for that purpose. The first thing that he put them in mind of, was the utter suppression of the Welsh rebellions; for repelling the malice of the duke of Orleans, and the earl of st. Paule, who had bent themselves wholly against the king and realm, as appeared by their late descent upon the Isle of Wight, where they were repulsed. To consider also the imminent danger that the marshes of Calais, Guienne, and other dominions beyond sea, were then in; to remember the wars in Ireland and Scotland, and likewise to take order touching the late rebellion under Henry Peircy, and others his adherents, at the late battle at Shrewsbury; and then desired the commons to choose, and the next day to present, their Speaker."

Sir A. Savage chosen Speaker.] Accordingly the next day the commons came before the king, and presented sir Arnold Savage for their Speaker; whereupon the said sir Arnold made the usual protestation for himself and the commons, which was allowed. The first things we find that the commons in this parl. went upon were these: "they desired the king to have regard to the charges for repressing the Welsh rebels, and safe keeping of the sea; to consider the great expences of his own household; and that both the king and prince might give liveries according to the statute made for that purpose. That the king would provide for the repairs of his castles and houses, and, namely, for his castle at Windsor, which were all greatly in decay; and not grant away the profits of those castles and houses, and stand to the repairs of them himself; by doing which, he must be obliged to charge his commons greatly, which might endanger the whole estate."

The earl of Northumberland pardoned.] On the 18th of Feb. the earl of Northumberland came into parl. before the king and lords, and there by his Petition to the king, acknowledged to have acted against his allegiance; namely, for gathering of forces and giving liveries, for which he craved pardon; and the rather, for that on the king's letters he yielded himself, and came to the king to York, whereas he might have kept himself away. The king delivered this petition to the judges, to be by them considered; but the lords made protes-tation against it, and that the ordering thereof belonged to themselves. Accordingly they, as peers of parl. to whom only such judgment belonged, in considering well the statute of the 25th of Edw. III. touching treasons, and the statute of Liveries made in this king's time, adjudged the earl's crime to be no treason nor felony, but only a trespass fineable to the king. For which judgment the said earl gave great thanks to the king and lords; and at his own request he was sworn to be a true liegeman to the king, to the prince, and to the heirs of his body begotten, and to every of the king's sons, and to their issue succeeding to the crown of England, according to law. That done, the king pardoned the said earl his fine and ransom.—The abp. of Canterbury prayed the king, that forasmuch as he and the duke of York, with other bps. and lords, were suspected by many to be in the confederacy with Henry Percy son to the earl of Northumberland, that the said earl would speak the truth; on which the earl, by the king's command, on his oath, purged them all from that matter. But the same day, the levying of war by the said sir Henry Percy was adjudged treason, by the king and lords, in full parl.

Several of the King's Officers removed upon Address of Parl.] The commons proceeded in their first design of regulating the king's household, with whom the lords accorded; and they required that 4 persons should be removed out of the king's house, viz. the abbot of Dore, the king's confessor, with Durham and Crosbie, gentlemen of his chamber. On the 9th of Feb. the confessor, Durham and Crosbie, came into parl. before the king and lords, when his maj. took occasion to excuse those officers himself, saying, "That he knew no cause why they should be removed, but only because they were hated by the people." Yet he charged them to depart from his house according to the desire of the commons, and would have proceeded in the same manner against the abbot, had he been present. The commons prayed, also, "That such might be appointed officers of the king's household, as were known to be of virtuous life, and that the lords and themselves might be privy to the taking of them."—And a war with France being suddenly expected, the commons desired, "That the Commission for arraying and mustering of men, and watching of beacons, might be amended; and that from thenceforth there should be no other alteration in the form of it." To which the king, with the assent of the lords, and, after consultation had with the judges, consented. This Commission the reader will find much canvassed, both by king and parl. in our later civil dissensions.

Regulations in the King's Household.] At the request of the commons, a committee of lords were particularly appointed to make some farther regulations, who agreed on these articles:—"1st, that all foreigners, in the interest of the anti-pope, be not suffered to be about the king's person, but be banished the realm. And that other strangers who were Catholics, and particularly those of Dutchland, be appointed to remain upon such of the frontiers of the kingdom where garrisons are. Next, that all French persons, Bretons, Lombards, Italians, and Bavarians whatsoever, be removed out of the house from the king and queen; except the queen's two daughters, Maria and St. Miches; Alder and John Purian, and their wives. And that no Welchman be about the king's person." These articles were read in full parl. Feb. the 21st, and confirmed by the king, with the lords assent; and full charge was given to the chief officers of the household there named, to put them in execution.—The king's letters patents were confirmed by act of parl. by which a commission was granted, that certain revenues and customs there expressed, and amounting to 10,000l. should be yearly paid to the treasurer of his house, for the expences of the family. In which grant it appears, that the profits of the hanaper, in chancery, was then worth only 2000l. per ann.—After settling the king's household, the commons went upon restoring peace and unanimity amongst the peers and great men of the land. They returned his maj. hearty thanks for extending his favour to the earl of Northumberland; and, at their request, the king commanded the said earl and the earl of Westmoreland, in token of perfect amity, to kiss each other, in open parl. thrice, and to shake hands as often; also to promise that their friends and tenants should do the like. The earls of Northumberland and Dunbar were likewise commanded to perform the same ceremony.—The same time, at the request of the commons, the king in open parl. affirmed, that the abp. of Canterbury, the duke of York, the earl of Northumberland, and the other lords, who were suspected to be in the confederacy with sir Henry Percy, were all his true liegemen; and that neither they nor any of them should ever be impeached thereof by the king, or his heirs, at any time hereafter.

Dutchy of Cornwall re-annexed to the Crown.] The commons reported that Edw. III. in a parl. held in the 11th of his reign, created his eldest son duke of Cornwall, and annexed the said dutchy to the crown, with divers hereditaments, by letters patents; and by authority of the same never to be dismembered or sold away (see p. 65). They therefore pray the king to resume, seize, and unite again to the said dutchy such lands as were sold away by prince Edw. king Rd. or by himself. Which Petition was answered in effect following:—"It is agreed by the king and lords, that the prince, by the advice of his counsel, shall have his scire facias, or other his best means of recovery; wherein shall be allowed no protection, or praying in aid of the king, unless it be for sir John Cornwall, and Eliz. his wife, late wife to John Holland, late earl of Huntington; and for such persons to whom the king is bound by warranty; and in order to render the value, in such cases, the prince shall sue to the king."

Several Annuities granted.] At the petition of Joan, queen of England, the king granted that the said queen should enjoy, during her life, in lands and tenements, to the full sum of 10,000 marks by the year; for and in consideration of her dower, according as other queens of England had done.—Upon the petition of Edw. duke of York, touching 1000l. a year, granted by Rd. II. to him, and his heirs male, the king granted to Edw. the said duke 400l. out of the customs of Kingston upon Hull, and 289l. 6s. 8d. out of the customs of London, as parcel of the said 1000l. to him and his heirs lawfully begotten.—John earl of Somerset, captain of Calais, and of the marshes thereof, declared, that whereas by indenture between the king and him, he stood bound to keep the town and castle aforesaid, taking therefore, for himself and his soldiers, in time of peace or truce, 6301l. 11s. 8d. and in time of war 10,509l. 6s. 8d. whereof he was unpaid 12,423l. 12s. 4d. he therefore for want of this is much streightened, and prayeth due payment for the future. By this the reader may see how much money it cost the govt. in those days, to keep that important fortress in possession.—On the petition of Joan, late wife to Thos. earl of Kent, to have 1000l. a year during her life, out of the hereditaments of the said Thos. the king, by the consent of Edm. earl of Kent, brother to the said Thos. granted to the said Joan, during life, certain manors and hereditaments, there named, to the value of 300 marks over and above her jointure, for the which the said Joan released to the said Edm. all her dower.

Sheriff fined for a false Return.] The sheriff of Rutland having returned one Wm. Ondebey, for knight of the same shire, and not Thomas de Thorpe, who was chosen, he was commanded to amend the same return, by returning Thos. Thorpe; and farther was committed to the fleet, and to fine and ransom at the king's pleasure.

Privilege of Parliament.] In this parl. the Commons presented the following Petition to the king relative to their privileges.—See Rot. Parl. Vol. III. p. 541.—'Item priout les communes, q come "solone la custume de Roialme," seigneurs, chivalers, citezeins & burgeises, a voz parlamentz de vre commandement "venantz, illecoques demurrantz, & a lour propres retournantz," & "lour hommes & servantz ove eux en le dit parlement" desoutz vre especiale protection & defense, ne devoient pur ascun dette, accompt, trespas, ou autre contract qconque, estre arestuz, ou en ascun manere emprisonnez en le mesme temps; & ja soit ensy q sovent foitz plusours de autiels hommes venantz a voz parlamentz, & autres lour hommes & servantz durant le dit parlement, ont este arestuz par ceux q'ont eu plein conisance q ceux ensy arestuz furent de parlement, ou des hommes & servantz d'iceux de parlement, come est dit;

The Record of a Subsidy burnt by order of Parl.] It is observable that not one tax or subsidy appears on the Record to have been either asked or granted by the king or parl. at this session. But Walsingham has assigned a reason for this omission, by telling us, that the record of the subsidy, which he says was new and very pernicious to the country, was ordered to be burned by those that granted it. This tax is said, by some, to be 20s. of every knight's fee, and 20d. of every one that had 20 pounds lands a year, and 1s. in the pound for money or goods, and so upwards according to that rate.

A Parliament called.] In the same year, new writs were issued out, directed as usual for a parl. to meet at Coventry, on the 3rd of Dec. though there is no account of any proceedings at it on record. But in the next year writs were issued for summoning another parl. to meet at the same place, dated at Litchfield, Aug. 25, and returnable the 6th of Oct. 1405. Being all met in the Great Chamber within the priory of Coventry, Hy. Beaufort, then bp. of Lincoln, and lord chanc. the king's brother, in the presence of the three estates of the realm, declared the cause of the summons, in the usual preamble; for holy church, corporations, and persons enjoying their liberties; and then gave out this text, Rex vocavit seniores terra, on which he learnedly argued. "That for the safety of the realm, both within and without, and particularly for repressing the Welch rebels; for resisting their enemies in France and Brittainy, who were daily getting reinforcements, in order to invade the nation, and to subvert the state; for the due observation of the peace and administration of justice, the king had called the wise men of the realm to be by them advised for the best. That the last parl. had not provided a sufficient force for subduing the Welch, neither was there a competency granted for the performance of such great exploits; and because the French had determined to make war upon England, and had then actually invaded Guienne, they could not wonder at the sudden calling of this parl. since they ought speedily to determine for the avoiding of these so great mischiefs and imminent dangers." He then urged the Commons to chuse a Speaker, and present him the next day to the king.

Sir Wm. Sturmei chosen Speaker, and a Subsidy granted.] This urgent demand was as speedily complied with by the commons; for the next day having presented sir Wm. Sturmei for their Speaker, the very day after, Oct. 8, they, with the assent of the lords, granted the king two 10ths and two 15ths, also the subsidy on wools, wool-fells, and skins; that is, of every denizen, for each sack of wool 48s. 4d. for every 240 wool-fells the like sum, and for every last of skins 5l.: of aliens 10s. more, to subsist for 2 years; 3s. on every tun of wine, imported or exported, and 12d. in the pound on merchandize. On condition that the same should be employed only towards the maintenance of the wars, and defence of the realm; and the lord Furnival, and sir John Pelham, knights, were appointed treasurers of war, who were then sworn to execute their offices according to the intention of the grant.—Several bps. and lords offered to lend certain sums of money, in order to raise forces for rescuing the lord of Coytiff, who was then besieged in his castle by the Welch rebels; the king appointed, by consent of parl. that such loans should be repaid out of the first payments of the subsidy then granted.

Several Grants.] On the 26th of Oct. the commons came before the king and lords, in full parl. and begged leave to recommend the young lords John and Humphry, two of the king's sons, for his advancement of them to honourable estates and livings. They also prayed the king to remember the duke of York's late service in Guienne and elsewhere, so as he might be paid the arrears due to him. The like request they made for the earl of Somerset, and sir Tho. Beaufort his brother. Lastly, they beseeched the king to restore to Richard, brother to the duke of York, certain jewels, to the value of 4000l. which were in the hands of king Rd. II. They likewise concurred in the request above, for the rescue of the lord of Coytiff.

Motion for applying the Revenues of the Church to the Service of the State.] When the king first represented to this parl. his great want of an extraordinary aid, the Commons went in a body, and, by their Speaker, addressed him, remonstrating, "That without burthening his people, he might supply his occasions by seizing on the revenues of the clergy." They set forth, "That the clergy possessed a 3rd part of the riches of the realm, and not doing the king any personal service, it was but just they should contribute out of their revenues, towards the pressing necessities of the state: that it was evident the riches of the ecclesiastics made them negligent in their duty, and the lessening of their excessive incomes would be a double advantage both to the church and state." The abp. of Canterbury being present, thought it his duty to speak on an occasion where his own and the interest of the whole clergy was concerned. He represented to the king, "That though the ecclesiastics served him not in person, it could not be inferred that they were unserviceable, since they sent into the field their vassals and tenants whenever there was occasion. That the stripping the clergy of their estates, would put a stop to their prayers, night and day, for the welfare of the state; and there was no expecting God's protection of the kingdom, if the prayers of the church were so little valued." Upon this, the Speaker of the Commons seemed to smile, and said openly, "That he thought the prayers of the church a very slender supply." To which the abp. answered, with some emotion, "That if the prayers of the church were so slighted, and that other considerations were not capable of suppressing the plots against the clergy, it would be found difficult to deprive them of their estates without exposing the kingdom to great danger; and, so long as he was abp. of Canterbury, he would oppose this injustice to the utmost of his power." Then, suddenly falling on his knees before the king, "he strongly pressed him in point of conscience, and endeavoured to make him sensible that, of all the crimes a prince could commit, none was so heinous as an invasion of the church's patrimony." Whether Henry was moved with the archbishop's speech, or that he foresaw the strong opposition the clergy would make, he suddenly changed his purpose, and told the abp. "That, though he blamed not his zeal, he could not help saying, that his fears were groundless; for when he mounted the throne, he made a firm resolution to support the church with all his power, and hoped by God's assistance to leave her in a better state than he found her." The abp. encouraged by this answer, turned to the Commons, and spoke to them in a manner not very proper to gain their goodwill, telling them their demand was built wholly on irreligion and avarice. "You," said he, "and such like as you, have advised both our lord the king and his predecessors, to confiscate the goods and lands of the alien priories and religious houses, on pretence he should gain great riches by it, as, indeed, they were worth many thousands. Notwithstanding, it is most true, that the king is not half a mark the richer for them all; for you have extorted, or, at least begged them out of his hands, and have appropriated the said goods to your own uses. So it may well be conjectured that your request to have our temporalities, proceeds not so much for the king's profit, as for your own covetousness. For, without doubt, if the king, as God forbid, should fulfil your wicked purpose, he would not be one farthing the richer for it at the year's end. "And, verily," added he, "I will sooner have my head cut off, than that the church should be deprived of the least right pertaining to it." The Commons made no reply to this severe reprimand, but when they came back to their house, they resolved to persist in their petition, and brought in a bill to seize the clergy's revenues. But there was no probability of succeeding in their project; the solicitations of the abp. and the rest of the prelates, were so prevalent with the lords, that they threw out the bill; and so the commons were forced to find other means to supply the king's occasions. Walsingham says, that the knights and burgesses were so ashamed of themselves, that they confessed their fault to the abp. and asked his pardon. And that the clergy granted the king at this time a 10th and an half, notwithstanding that the half of the last granted 10th was yet unpaid.

Petitions of the Commons.] In this parl. the Commons petitioned, that all hereditaments, liberties, and customs as pertained to the crown in the 40th of king Edw. III. and have been since by any means granted, be resumed into the king's hands for ever; provided that all towns shall enjoy their liberties, except also the lands of such as were forejudged in the 11th of Richard II. and sold away.—P. That all tuns and pipes of wines granted to any person by the king, or any of his progenitors, be also resumed.—P. That the queen may be endowed of all such hereditaments as Anne the late queen was, in whose hands soever the same be, and by what grant soever.—P. That all grants of Edw. III. or any of his progenitors, and before the said 40th year, may be confirmed by parl.—P. That no man be restrained of any warrant granted to build any castle, or caslet, or to inclose any park. Answer. The king will execute their requests, as far forth, as by the law, and his prerogative he may do, and for that the lands of the crown in the 40th of Edw. III. were not certainly known: he would appoint certain commissioners to enquire, and execute the same.—'Tis enacted, that proclamation be made, that all such as have any patents granted since the 40th of Edw. III. of any annual value for life, or years, do, on pain of forfeiting the same, bring them in by a day there prescribed, to the end that such as deserve the same, may have continuance, and the rest revoked.—Upon the petition of Henry prince of Wales it was enacted by the lords, that the said prince should have due payment made of 1000 marks granted to him for the keeping of certain men at arms for the defence of Wales.—On the last day of this parl. the Commons prayed, "That the money borrowed for saving of the honour of the lord John, the king's son, and the estate of the realm, may be answered: That the king would consider the painful service of the duke of York, whilst he was the king's lieut. of Guienne, and that he may be paid what to him is due; and also to remember sir Tho. Erpingham, sir Tho. Bempson, John Northbury, and other valiant knights and esquires, who adventured themselves with the king at his coming into the kingdom. Likewise, That no stranger born be a customer, or the like officer, neither enjoy any benefice within the realm. And, that no members of the commons house be collectors of subsidies." The king's answer to the 4 first was, "The king will be advised:" and to the last, "It shall be as in the reign of Edw. III." Lastly, at the request of the commons, the king remitted 6s. 8d. of every sack of wool, and the like of other staple commodities of the grant made in the 4th of Henry IV. by reason that so much was mis-entered in the roll.

A Parliament called.] On the 21st Dec. writs were issued for a parl. to meet at Coventry on the 15th of Feb. 1406, but on the 1st of Jan. writs were issued for their meeting at Gloucester on the day first appointed: and on the 9th of Feb. writs were a third time issued for their assembling at Westminster on Monday the 1st of March. Being met at Westminster, according to the last prorogation, in the Painted Chamber of the king's palace there, Tho. de Langley, clerk, then lord chanc. opened the cause of the summons, and after making the usual declaration about the liberties of holy church, &c. he took for his subject these words, multorum consilia requiruntur in magnis; and said, "That in the weighty affairs relative to the good govt. of the realm, and safety of the subjects, which were annoyed by the rebellion of the Welch, and likely to be invaded by the French and Scots, who ceased not to infest Guienne and the marshes of Calais; besides the troubles raised by the Irish, he had called the same parl. as meaning to follow the counsel of the wise, saying, fili nil sine consilio facias, et tunc post factum non penitebit; wherein he purposed to begin also, with the example of Ahashuerus, Qui interrogavit sapientes, et illorum cauta faciebat consilia. In which consultation, he declared to the king, lords and commons, that if they would observe the laws of God, they might then assure themselves to find peace at home, and victory abroad."

Sir J. Tibetot chosen Speaker.] The receivers of petitions being appointed, the next day the Commons came before the king and lords, and presented sir John Tibetot for their Speaker, who excused himself on account of his youth, and other causes; but the king confirmed the election. The very same day the commons, with the assent of the bps. and lords, granted a subsidy of one 10th and one 15th, to be levied on the laity for one year; and, besides, they gave to the king, in other matters, the same that was granted in the last parl.

The Speaker proposes several Regulations in the Govt.] On the 23rd of March, the Commons came before the king again, when sir John Tibetot, their Speaker, made the common protestation, and required a confirmation of all their liberties and privileges, and that they might at any time send for any of their bills from the lords, for amendment of the same; which was granted. The same day the said Speaker, before the king, made several Memorandums for good government, namely, for confirming all their liberties, for safe keeping of the sea, and for providing for the defence of Guienne, which was in danger to be lost. On the 3rd of April, the Speaker required of the king, that the following Regulations might be entered on record, viz.

"That for the better resisting of the Welch rebels, the prince might reside in Wales, and have sufficient power given him, by commission, for that purpose."—"That no heritages, conquered from the Welch, be given away till one quarter of a year after." The king answered, "that he would not grant any without advice."—"That the time for banishing all Frenchmen and Bretons out of the realm be appointed." It was answered, "it shall with all convenient speed."—"That it would please the king to excuse the commons, in that it had been reported, they had talked of the king's person otherwise than beseemed them, which was untrue." The king answered, "he believed the same." Then a committee of both houses was appointed, to treat about the safeguard of the sea, who agreed upon the Articles following:

"I. That the merchants, mariners, and owners of English ships, shall find and provide sufficient and able ships for 2000 fighting men, and 1000 seamen, for a year and a half. To answer which expence, they shall have allowed, upon account, 12d. in the pound on merchandize, and 3s. 5d. upon every tun of wine; with the fourth of the subsidy on wools, wool-fells, and skins, granted in the last parl.; and that the merchants, in levying the said sums, should have warrants under the privy seal as oft as there was occasion.—II. That the merchants shall enjoy all such prizes as they shall take, having due consideration for the king's captains when he shall appoint any.—III. That if the royal navy of the enemy shall happen to be at sea, and the king make out against them, then the merchants aforesaid shall have one month's notice to provide.—IV. The merchants aforesaid shall have reasonable warning of any peace or truce to be made; after which, they shall have due consideration for all their charges.—V. That the merchants name two persons, one for the south and the other for the north, who, by commission, shall have the same power as other admirals have had on the like occasion.—VI. The merchants demanded 4000*l.* for the present; but the answer was, the king had it not."

The same day the king, for certain weighty reasons, as the record expresseth it, adjourned the said parl. from that day, unto the quindene of Easter, next ensuing, to be holden at the said place at Westminster; and licenced the lords and commons to depart for that time. The day appointed was the 25th of April, that year; when, because the abp. of Canterbury, with several other bps. and lords, were not yet come, the parl. was again adjourned for four days more. At the meeting, the Speaker of the Commons prayed the king, that under his protection he might be allowed as great a liberty of speech as any of his predecessors ever had, which was granted. They then requested the king to appoint certain persons by name, to be of his council; and that by authority of parl. They required, that provision should be made for the great dearth at Calais; that all captains beyond the seas be commanded to repair speedily to their forts and ports, as the earl of Somerset was about to go to Calais; and that Rd. Childero, one of the admirals for the sea, might be ordered to go thither; all which the king granted.

The Crown entailed by Act of Parliament.] This parl. continued sitting till the 7th of June, when the famous act was passed for entailing the crown of England, with all the hereditaments and rights whatsoever, on the present king, and the heirs male of his body, lawfully begotten. In like manner, it was entailed on the prince of Wales, and, for default of his issue, on the lords Thomas, John, and Humphrey successively. Cotton remarks, that the Conveyance is crossed in the Record; and on the margin of it is wrote Vacat; yet this Conveyance, he adds, was exemplified under the great seal at that time.

Parl. adjourned.] On the 19th of June the king again adjourned this parl. to the 15th of Oct. following. On which day the parl. being again assembled, was farther adjourned for four days more, to give time for some lords and commons yet to come up. And it was not till Nov. 17th, that sir John Tibetot, Speaker of the Commons, came before the king, and required a confirmation of his first protest, which was granted. And, upon a motion of the said Speaker, the king charged both lords and commons, on their allegiance, that they should particularly enquire concerning any evil government, and prevent it for the future. The same day the Speaker required that the castle of Maulion, which was the key of the three kingdoms, and which was kept by sir Ch. de Navarre, a foreigner, might be kept by Englishmen only. "That all fines and ransoms of the Welchmen may be employed in those wars. That the prince may be sent into Wales with all speed, considering the rebellion of the earl of Northumberland and others. That certain castles might be kept as hostages for the earl of Douglass; and that the other Scotch prisoners should not be slightly given up, considering, as they said, that they were the flower of all Scotland."

Act of Settlement repealed.] In this session of the same parl. the Conveyance or Act of Settlement, mentioned before, was repealed; and another act was made upon it, whereby the crown is entailed upon the king and his sons, in general tail, &c. As a matter of such great moment as the Succession to the Crown of England, settled by act of parl. ought not to be slightly passed over in these enquiries, we shall present the reader with an Abstract of the Statute itself, as it is published in the Collection of public acts, translated from the Latin; together with the Names of the Bishops, Abbots, and Lords, &c. who signed the said act.

"Henry, by the grace of God, &c." It begins with a recital of the act made last session of parl. for settling the succession on the male line only as aforesaid. Then adds, "nevertheless, because the prelates, lords, clergy, and the whole community of England, considering that the said statute, by excluding the female line, too much contracted the right of succession, which they rather sought to enlarge; they unanimously petitioned us, with more than ordinary zeal, to annul and make void the said statute, and to pass an act for settling the right of succession in Henry, my son and heir, and the rest of my sons, and their children, lawfully begotten, successively. We, therefore, judging the said request to be consonant to our right, do annul and make void the said former statute; and with the consent, and by the authority of the said prelates, lords, &c. in parliament assembled, do ordain, establish, &c. the said Henry, our first-born son, our true, lawful, and undoubted heir, and universal successor, to our crowns and kingdoms of England and France, and to all our dominions beyond the sea whatsoever; with all their rights, appurtenances, privileges, &c. belonging thereto; and after him successively, to the heirs of his body, lawfully begotten, for ever." For failure of this, in like manner, the settlement establishes it on Thomas, the king's second son, and his heirs, &c. then to John and Humphrey, his 3rd and 4th succeeding." Provided, that by this statute or ordinance, we intend not to change or alter the succession to the rights, possessions, honours, and customs, with all other appurtenances, belonging to the duchy of Lancaster; but that the said rights, &c. may remain as they have been accustomed, this or any other statute made in this parl. notwithstanding. In testimony of which, not only our seal, but the seals of all the lords spiritual and temporal aforesaid, for themselves, the clergy, and community aforesaid, are put to these presents:

The Lords Address against the Lollards.]—

"At this time," says sir Robert Cotton, or rather his publisher, Mr. Prynne, "the clergy suborned Henry prince of Wales, for and in the name of the bps. and lords; and sir John Tibetot, the Speaker, for and in the name of the commons; to exhibit a long and bloody bill against certain men called Lollards, namely against those that preached or taught any thing against the temporal livings of the clergy. Other points touching Lollardy, I read none; only this is to be marked for their better expedition in this exploit, they joined prophecies touching the king's estate, and such as whispered and bruited that king Richard was still living; all which they inserted, to the end that by such subtilty they might better gain their ends against the poor Lollards aforesaid. Wherein, note a most unlawful and monstrous tyranny; for the request of the said bill was, that every officer, or other minister whatsoever, might enquire after, or apprehend such Lollards, without any other commission, and that no sanctuary should protect them."—But it will not be amiss to present the reader with an abstract of this bill, which Mr. Fuller, in his Church History, Book IV. p. 162, says, he carefully took from the Records in the tower.

That the church of England hath been, and now is, endowed with Temporal Possessions, by the gifts and grants, as well of your royal progenitors, as by the ancestors of the said lords temporal, to maintain divine service, keep hospitality, &c. to the honour of God, and the soul's health of your progenitors, and the said lords temporal.—Yet, now of late, some, at the instigation of the enemy, against the aforesaid church and prelates, have, as well in public sermons, as in conventicles and secret places called schools, stirred and moved the people of your kingdom to take away the said temporal possessions from the said prelates, with which they are as rightly endowed, as it hath been, or might be, best advised or imagined by the laws and customs of your kingdom; and of which they are as surely possessed, as the lords temporal are of their inheritances.—Wherefore, in case that this evil purpose be not resisted by your royal majesty, it is very likely, that in process of time they will also excite the people of your kingdom for to take away from the said lords temporal their possessions and heritages, so to make them common to the open commotion of your people.—There be also others who publish, and cause to be published, evilly and falsely, among the people of your kingdom, That Richard, late king of England (who is gone to God, and on whose soul God through his grace have mercy), is still alive. And some have writ and published divers false pretended prophecies to the people; disturbing them who would, to their power, live peaceably, serve God, and faithfully submit and obey you their liege lord.—Wherefore, may it please your royal maj. in maintenance of the honour of God, conservation of the laws of holy church, as also in preservation of you, your children, and the lords aforesaid, and for the quiet of all your kingdom, to ordain by a statute in the present parl. by the assent of the lords aforesaid, and the commons of your kingdom, That in case any man or woman, of what estate or condition they be, preach, publish, or maintain, hold, use, or exercise, any schools; if any sect or doctrine hereafter against the Catholic faith, either preach, publish, maintain, or write a schedule, whereby the people may be moved to take away the temporal possessions of the aforesaid prelates; or preach and publish, That Richard late king, who is dead, should still be in full life; or that the 'fool in Scotland,' is that king Richard who is dead; or that publish or write any pretended prophecies to the commotion of your people; That they, and every of them, be taken, and put in prison, without being delivered in bail, or otherwise, except by good and sufficient mainprize, to be taken before the chancellor of England, &c."

Articles for the Regulation of the Govt. presented by the Speaker, and sworn to by the King's Council.] The Speaker of the House of Commons came again before the king and lords, and required, in the name of that body, that all the lords of council might be sworn to observe certain Articles, which they had drawn up, for the better Regulation of the public affairs of the kingdom. The abp. of Canterbury, for himself and others, refused to swear to them, but offered to do what they could towards their observance. Upon this the king charged the said abp. with the rest, on their allegiance, to take the oath, which accordingly they did; and further, the king caused all the officers of his household, and of all his courts of justice, to be sworn to fulfil the said oath. The articles were these:—

"I. That worthy counsellors and officers be appointed, and not to be removed without good proof of their ill management.—II. That no due grants be stayed at the great or privy seal.—III. That none about the king's person do pursue any suit or quarrel, by any other means than by order of the common law.—IV. That no officer be appointed by any mediation contrary to the laws.—V. That order be taken for the governance of the king's house, chamber, and wardrobe.—VI. That the revenues and profits of the crown and realm be employed towards the charges next aforesaid.—VII. That no person, under a penalty, do receive, or take by way of gift, any of the profits aforesaid.—VIII. That two certain days in the week be appointed for all suitors to exhibit their petitions to the king: and that some persons may be also appointed to receive and give answers to the same.—IX. That no man whatsoever do prefer any bill or suit to the king on any other days.—X. That none of the council hold pleas of any matter determinable at common law.—XI. That all statutes touching buyers and purveyors may be executed.—XII. That no one of the king's council shall give encouragement to any suitor before determination had in full council.—XIII. That no matters of council may be dispatched, but by full assent, unless the same require great haste; in which cases, word shall be sent to such counsellors as are absent, to the end that their advice may be known.—The XIV. XV. XVI. XVII. XVIII. and XIX. articles ordain, That none of the king's higher officers, or other under officers, or clerks of any of his courts, or of his household, shall take any but their accustomed fees, or appoint any minister under them to do the same.—XX. That the queen do pay for her journey to the king's houses, as queen Philippa lately did.—XXI. That none of the officers of the marshalseas of the king's house, or clerk of the market, do hold any plea otherwise than in the time of Edw. I.—XXII. That all the sheriffs, before the election of knights of the shire, shall by open proclamation in their several counties, give 15 days respite to the time and place.—XXIII. That all the king's great officers of every court, and of his household, shall maintain the common laws.—XXIV. That all foreigners who are not denizens do make fines, by a day, with the king.—XXV. That the steward of the king's house, with the treasurer, have full power to discharge the serjeants, and other officers, for their misdemeanors.—XXVI. That the said officers, and chamberlain of the household, do execute their trusts according to the statutes of the king's house.—XXVII. That no judicial officer, or other minister within the king's house, or in any of his courts, enjoy any of the said offices, but at will.—XXVIII. That all the chief officers of the king's house and courts do make yearly strict enquiries of all misdemeanors and misprisions done under them, and make report thereof to the king's council.—XXIX. That the array of the special assize challenged, be tried at large, as in general assizes; and that the sheriff do take nothing for any pannel between party and party.—Lastly, That all the articles aforesaid shall only continue to the end of the next parl."

Whoever considers well the foregoing Articles, delivered by the Speaker, will find that there is scarce a trifling one amongst them; which evidently shews, that the commons of England were neither fools nor knaves in those days. Nor was the king less obliging and condescending on his part, than the commons had been resolute and presumptive on theirs; not only suffering the said articles, which struck sufficiently at his prerogative, to pass into a law, though but a temporary one; but also compelling the abp. with the rest of the council, &c. to swear to the observance of them. Which also demonstrates, that whatever indirect steps Henry took to acquire the diadem, he was resolved to keep it; and is a strong instance, that the best laws for the subject, have been often gained under the weakest titles of our kings.

Act relating to County Elections.] In this parl. the king gave his assent to an act for securing the freedom of elections. This act is still extant in our statute-books; by which it was enacted, "that at the next county-court, after the delivery of the writ of parl. all there present, as well suitors summoned for the same cause, as others, shall attend to the election of the knights for the parl. and in the full county they shall proceed to election freely and indifferently, notwithstanding any request or commandment to the contrary. And after they are chosen, their names shall be written in an indenture, under the seals of all those that did chuse them, and tacked to the writ of parl.; which indenture shall be holden for the sheriff's return of the said writ."—There are many Petitions, Answers, &c. in Cotton's Abridgment of the proceedings of this parl. which, because they relate to lesser affairs, or private property, are here omitted. It is observable, however, how anxious the Commons were that all these matters should be carefully recorded; for at their own request it was enacted, that certain members of their house should be present at the engrossing the roll of this parl.

Grants made by the King to Sir John Tibetot the Speaker.] The king, to shew his generosity and gratitude to sir John Tibetot, the young Speaker of the house of commons, granted to him, in fee, all the lands and hereditaments of Rd. ap Griffith ap Voethus, in the counties of Carnarthen and Cardigan, and elsewhere in the principality of South Wales, forfeited to the king by his being an adherent to Owen Glendour, rebel and traitor; and also the office of keeper of the forests of Waybridge and Sapley, in the county of Huntingdon, without any fee or out-payment. And further, the goods and chattels of Peter Prisswick, carpenter, a felon, amounting to 150*l*. He was afterwards made earl of Worcester. Mr. Prynne makes an observation at the end of this session of parl. to this purpose: "that the Commons' young Speaker took more upon him, and spoke more boldly and fervently to the king and lords, than any Speaker had done before him. Which innovation beginning to grow in fashion, the king and lords thought proper, in a succeeding parl. to put a check upon, as a novelty inconsistent with the king's prerogative. That the Speakers afterwards became more modest, and did not say any thing that was displeasing to the king; or, if they casually did, to pray that it might be imputed only to their ignorance, and not unto the commons." It is further remarkable, that this is the longest parl. we have yet met with; for though it is not expressly said when it was dissolved, yet we may well suppose, by the three prorogations, that it continued near a year; which was an innovation in the ancient constitution taken notice of by several historians as a great blot in this reign. Hollingshead in particular says, that "the long continuance of this parl. was a great loss and damage to the commonalty; for the expences of their representatives was almost equal in value to the sum demanded that was for the subsidy."

A Parl. called.] On the 20th of Oct. 1407, another parl. met, by summons, at Gloucester; but, upon calling over the house of commons, several defaulters being found, it was put off for 4 days longer. On that day, the abp. of Canterbury, Arundel, still lord chanc. opened the session with a speech, and took this text for his subject, regem honorificate; in which he endeavoured to prove, "that for 3 especial causes the king ought to be honoured. 1st, for that the king, by maintaining the liberty of holy church, honoured God, and therefore ought himself to be honoured; 2nd, for his great care towards his subjects, as well in the observation of the laws, as in his defence of them against foreign enemies; and, 3rdly, because that, ever since his coronation, he had shewn favour and pardon to all that asked them; and added that, as in necessity, every member of man's body would seek comfort from the head, as the chief; so he applied it to the honouring of the king, who was the head of the constitution. He desired the house of commons to choose a Speaker that afternoon, and present him the next day to the king; and, lastly, he required them all to consider on proper means to end the rebellion in Wales; to take care for the safe guarding of the sea; for defending of Guienne, Calais, and Ireland, and the northern marches, and how by their aid the same might be best accomplished."

Sir T. Chaucer chosen Speaker.] The chancellor having finished his harangue, the receivers and triers of petitions were constituted; and the next day the commons presented sir Thomas Chaucer for their Speaker; who, after excuse for himself and confirmation, made the common protestation, which was granted. On the 9th of Nov. the commons came again before the king, where the said Speaker repeated his former protestation, and began to rehearse the grant of the last subsidies, and the oaths of the lords and others for the disposition of the same. But the chancellor interrupted him, and said, that no accounts were yet made for the disbursements of the same to the commons; and that the lords, having little thanks for the last, would by no means take the like oath again; which the king, at his request, excused them from. Then the said Speaker made great complaints against purveyors; to which the steward and treasurer of the king's house answered, "that the same should be remedied."

Nov. 14, upon the coming of the commons before the king and lords, the Speaker told them of the great disadvantage the nation suffered by not guarding the sea; and that those who had lands on the marches of Wales never dwelled thereon; of which he desired that due consideration might be taken, which was promised: and that certain lords, by name, might be appointed to confer with the commons on these and other matters. But, at the request of the merchants, made last parl. the king granted to Wm. Childero, late admiral of the south and west seas, the allowance of 2668l. which was due to him, and that he be discharged of all accounts.

Nov. 21st, which was the last day of this parl. the Speaker desired the king to give public thanks to the prince of Wales, for his great fatigue and good conduct in Wales; for which both the king and the prince returned back their compliments to the commons. After which the prince, kneeling before the king, cleared the duke of York from disloyal reports spread against him, and in open parl. averred him to be a true and loyal knight. At the same time, the Speaker moved the king to advance his sons the lords Thomas, John, and Humphrey, to some honourable titles and fortunes.

A Subsidy granted.] The lords and commons on the same day granted to the king one 10th and a half; with the like subsidy for staple and other merchandizes, as was granted in the last parl. for 2 years. And, in consideration of the subsidies aforesaid, the king promised, that for 2 years next ensuing, he would require no other subsidies or charge on his subjects; and, for more assurance thereof, desired that this might pass into an act, and that every member might have a copy of it.

An Order to prevent the Lords from communicating the Commons private Debates to the King.] It appears, by the Record, that the lords and commons did not agree so well as formerly, in this parl. for a difference that happened between the two houses about granting the subsidy, gave rise to the following ordinance, viz. "That in all future parliaments, in the absence of the king, it should be lawful as well to the lords by themselves, as to the commons by themselves, to debate of all matters relating to the realm, and of the means to redress them; without disclosing the same to the king before a determination made thereof, and that to be done only by the mouth of the Speaker. Which ordinance was made, because part of the aforesaid displeasure arose on account of the lords making the king, several times, privy to their debates on the subsidy, and brought messages from him; which the commons said was absolutely against their liberties."

A Parliament called.] Another parl. was called to meet at Westminster, on the 18th of Jan. 1410, but they did not sit to do business till 9 days after. When the bp. of Winchester, the king's brother, there being then no chance, declared the cause of the summons to be for the preservation of the church's liberties, &c. and then took for his subject, Decet nos implere omnem Justitiam, on which he dicated to this purport:—"That this parl. was summoned for two causes; the 1st for the inward governance of the realm, as in the due observance of the laws; the 2nd for outward governance, as in a proper defence against a foreign enemy; and in this he touched upon the duke of Burgundy, then governor of France, who he said meant to besiege Calais, with a great army, and then to conquer this kingdom."—He told them, "That there were two kinds of govt. the jus regiminis, and jus subjectionis; allowing the first to be better, according to the answer of Aristotle to king Alexander, who, being asked in what manner the said king might strongest fortify the walls of a new fortress, or frontier town, which he had built, answered, that the strongest walls were the hearty good-will of his subjects, and obedience to the laws."—He said, "That all true subjects owe to their sovereign three chief points, viz. honour and obedience, reverence and benevolence, and hearty assistance. And because the present necessity required ready assistance, and speedy dispatch, the king had called this assembly for a full consultation; which he wished might redound to the glory of God, the honour of the king, and the safety of the whole realm. For which good end he willed the commons to go to an election of their Speaker, and present him the next day to the king."

Sir T. Chaucer chosen Speaker.] On the 28th of Jan. the Commons presented sir Tho. Chaucer again for their Speaker, who, making the common protestation, the king, by his own mouth, allowed of it; but added, "That since now the lords and commons were come to an agreement, he expected that they, the commons, would speak no unbecoming words, or attempt any thing that was not consistent with decency."—Feb. the 7th, at the request of the commons the assizes were prorogued, by the king, during the sitting of parl. But nothing more is said of their proceedings till the 15th of March, which, being at that time in Palm-Sunday week, at the desire of the commons, the parl. was adjourned to the 7th of April. At that day, being reassembled, the king granted that certain of the most learned bps. and worthy lords, should be assigned to be of his council; and that they and all the judges should be sworn to give good counsel and upright judgment.

Acts passed for the Security of the Kingdom.] It was enacted, that all such as had castles and towns in the marshes of Scotland, should furnish them with necessaries, and keep guard there in proper person. The same order was taken for the castles and towns in Wales. Also that the revenues of the king's dominions beyond sea should for 3 years be employed on the soldiers there; and that no officer there, who is immediately accountable to the king, shall enjoy the same during life.—It was also enacted, that three parts of the subsidy on wools shall be employed upon the defence of Calais, the castle there, the new tower on Rochbank, and on the marshes of Calais, and for the payment of certain debts there. That such subsidies as should be granted this parl. should be employed according to the grant, and not otherwise. And, on a remonstrance from the commons, the king ordered that all foreigners who are come into the realm, except merchants, shall make protestation to live and die in the king's quarrel; shall serve in the wars if they are able; and shall not be lodged but in Englishmen's houses. Also, that none of them shall be brokers, and that no broker shall be a merchant to his own use.

Respect paid by Parl. to the P. of Wales.] On the 2d of May, upon the earnest request of the commons, such lords as were before appointed to be of the king's council, were again declared; all of whom, with the judges, were then sworn to do justice; except the prince of Wales, who, "for his worthiness," was excused that ceremony.

The Commons renew their Project for reducing the Revenues of the Clergy.] In this parliament there was some relaxation demanded of the late severe act against Lollards and Heretics; for now it was requested by the commons, "That all such persons as should be arrested by force of the statute, made against Lollardy in the 2nd year of this reign, may be bailed and freely purge themselves of it; that they be arrested by no others than the sheriffs, or such like officers; and that no havock be made of their goods." Answer. "The king will be advised."—Thus far the Record. But Rapin relates, that on passing the act for regulating Elections, the commons were encouraged, before they granted an aid, to renew their former instances in regard to the Clergy. Wickliff's doctrine had gained so much ground, that the majority of the house of commons were then in that way of thinking; and, thus biassed, they presented two petitions to the king, one against the Clergy, and the other in favour of the Lollards. In the first they set forth, "That the Clergy made an ill use of their riches, and consumed their incomes in a very different manner from the intent of the donors. That their revenues were excessive, and consequently it was necessary to lessen them. That so many estates might easily be taken from them as would serve to provide for 150 earls, at the rate of 3000 marks, yearly, each; 1500 barons at 100 marks each; 6200 knights at 40 marks; and 100 hospitals, at as many marks yearly, for each hospital. That, by these means, the kingdom's safety would be better provided for, the poor better maintained, and the clergy more attached to their duty." This is Rapin's account of the contents of this bill; but could so learned and judicious an author ever suppose that such a number of earls, barons, and knights, were likely to be supported at such a calculation; provided that the commons were willing to raise so many new lords and masters amongst them? His marginal note refers us to Walsingham for his authority; but, unfortunately for him, that very authority contradicts it. Walsingham's account of the contents of the bill, which the commons now exhibited against the clergy, is this, "That the temporalities, disordinately wasted by men of the church, might well suffice to find the king with 15 earls, 1500 knights, 6200 esquires, and 100 almshouses, for the relief of poor people, more than there were then in England. That every earl should have, of yearly rent, 3000 marks; every knight 100 marks, and 4 plough lands; every esquire 40 marks and 2 plough lands; and every almshouse 100 marks; and be overlooked by two true secular priests to each house. And, over and above all these, the king might put yearly, into his own coffers, 20,000l. Provided also, that every township should maintain their own poor, that could not labour; on condition, that if any was overburthened with them, then the said townships to be relieved by the alms-houses aforesaid. And, for to bear the charges of all these things, the commons affirmed, in their bill, that the temporalities, then in the possession of spiritual men, amounted to 322,000 marks, yearly rent." The commons also alledged, "That over and above the said sum of 322,000 marks, several houses of religion in England possessed as many temporalities as might suffice to find 15,000 priests; every priest to be allowed, for his stipend, 7 marks a year." This is a genuine account of this extraordinary attack on the clergy, in those days; the bill was brought into the house by sir John Oldcastle, lord Cobham; which drew upon him the hatred of that vast body of men, and terminated at last in his own destruction.

The second Petition is mentioned in the Record, wherein the commons prayed that the statute passed against the Lollards, in the 2d year of this reign, might be repealed; or, at least, qualified with some restrictions. Mr. Rapin here again makes this reflection on these two petitions; "That if the parl. which first moved the lessening the Clergy's Revenues was called the unlearned, it may well be supposed that this met with no better treatment. The name of lollard and heretic was plentifully bestowed; and the clergy considered these petitions as tending to undermine all religion. This was industriously insinuated to the king, with all the aggravation which parties concerned are capable of displaying on such an occasion. It is hard to know, whether the king himself was of this mind; but, however, he openly declared, that he had the interest of the church no less at heart than the clergy themselves. And, being now very easy from his enemies, both at home and abroad, he had no mind to provoke so great and dangerous a body against him." For this reason he rebuked the commons very sharply, and said, "That he neither could nor would consent to their petitions, and expressly forbade them to meddle any more with the Church's concerns. As for the Lollards, he added, that far from permitting the statute against them to be repealed, he wished it more rigorous, for the utter extirpation of heresy out of the land." The commons being again defeated in their expectations in these higher matters, contented themselves with petitioning, that clerks when convicted, might be put into the king's prisons, or those of the temporal lords; alleging, for reason, that clerks by those means frequently escaped the punishment they deserved. This point had been often attempted by the laity against the clergy; particularly, as high as the reign of Henry II. when that prince, and all the peers of the realm, maintained this point so stoutly against abp. Becket and pope Alexander III. But Henry, fearing to be exposed to the same troubles his predecessor had been, refused, also, to give his assent to this bill; and, to shew the commons how far he was from giving any countenance to these proceedings, he signed a warrant for the burning of one Tho. Badby, who had been before convicted of heresy.—The Commons considered this execution as an insult, and great aggravation of the king's other refusals; and accordingly, when Henry demanded a power to levy every year a certain subsidy, which was a 10th from the clergy, and a 15th from the laity, without a meeting of a parl. this demand was boldly rejected. The commons would have even refused the supply for his necessary occasions, if he had not forced them to it, by prolonging the session till he got his desire.

Petition of Rd. de Hastings.] A matter of more private concern came also before this parl. which since it bears respect to an ancient and noble family, which we shall hereafter, have repeated occasions to mention, we cannot omit Cotton's account of it. The Petition of Rd. de Hastings, sheweth, that Ralph de Hastings, his brother, who was attainted and beheaded for high treason, in the 6th year of the king, died without issue; and prayeth to be restored as well to his blood, as to all such lands as the said Ralph had at the time of his death, without any further suit. Which petition, by the assent of the whole parl. was granted.

A Subsidy granted.] On the 9th of May, and the last of this parl. the Speaker of the commons required the certain knowledge of the counsellors names; whereupon two of them were changed. They then, with the assent of the bps. and lords, granted the king the like subsidy as in the 9th of this reign, so as express mention should be made in the grant, 'that it was provided of their own good wills;' whereof they gave 20,000 marks to the king, to dispose of at his pleasure. After which the Speaker recommended to the king the persons of the queen, the prince, the lords Thomas, John, and Humphrey, the king's sons, and prayed their advancement; for which the king thanked them, and promised satisfaction in this matter at a proper opportunity.

A Parl. called.] Another parl. assembled at Westminster, on the 2d of Nov. 1411. At which time, the commons being called over, as usual, sir Tho. Beaufort, another half-brother of the king's, then chancellor, by virtue of letters patent there read and enrolled, began, prorogued, and continued the said parl. for a week longer. At which time the said chancellor, by the king's command, in his presence, and in the presence of all the lords and commons, declared, "That this parl. was called for 3 causes: for the good govt. of the realm, due execution of the laws, and the defence of the kingdom, with the safe keeping of the seas." From these he argued, "That to the good governance of the realm belonged faithful council without flattery, and due obedience without grudging. To the due execution of the laws did appertain sincere keeping of the same, and speedy redress for fear of abuse. To the defence of the realm there needed their hearty willing relief to the king in his distress, with discreet and speedy provision; for all which causes they were then assembled." He added, "That it was the king's pleasure the church, with all corporations and persons, should enjoy their wonted liberties; and, for expediting these matters he desired the commons to chuse a Speaker, and present him the next day."

Sir T. Chaucer chosen Speaker.] Accordingly, the commons presented sir Thos. Chaucer once more their Speaker; whose excuse not being allowed, he prayed that he might speak under the usual protestation. It was granted that he might speak as others before had done; but that "the king would have no novelties introduced, and would enjoy his prerogative." Upon this, the Speaker desired a respite for 3 days to give his answer in writing, which was, "That he desired no other protestation than what other Speakers had made; and, that if he should speak any thing to the king's displeasure, it might be imputed to his own ignorance only, and not to the body of the commons;" which the king granted.

A Supply granted.] Then the commons, by assent of the bps. and lords, granted to the king the same subsidy, as to tonnage and poundage, as in the two last parliaments; so also that it might be expressed to proceed "from their own good-will, and not of duty." They also granted, that every person possessed of 20l. by the year, above all charges, shall pay 6s. 8d. except lands purchased in Mortmain before the 20th of Edw. I. and lands purchased in Frank Almoigne since the said 20th year. This is the first tax upon land that we have yet met with.

Act for regulating the Coin.] It was enacted, "That the mint-master within the tower of London, and other minters within the king's grant, may coin of every pound of gold of the tower weight 50 nobles; and of the same weight of silver 30s. sterling, during two years; provided that the said gold and silver be of good alloy as the old coin was."—About this time the current coin of the nation was much debased by foreign money being added to it; whereupon a law was made this parl. for prohibiting a certain bad coin, called Galley Halfpence, to pass current, as also all foreign money, as well of Scotland as other nations. Daniel writes, that though the king had no tax granted this parl. (we suppose he means no 10ths nor 15ths) yet he so well managed the business of the coinage, that he raised as good a fund by it. For partly by seizing the forfeited money, and partly by coining new nobles, which he made a groat lighter than the old, he much enriched his own treasury.

The Abp. of Canterbury's Power of visiting the University confirmed by Parl.] A church affair of some consequence came before this parl.; Thomas, of Canterbury, by a long instrument, in Latin, showed, that in the time of Rd. II. the university of Oxford had purchased a Bull to be clearly exempt from the visitation of the said abp. to the end that they might better support hereticks and lollards; and that the said king Rd. took order that they should still be subject to the said abp.'s visitation, notwithstanding the said bull. Yet, he added, that in this king's time he had been disturbed in his visitation aforesaid by Richard Courtney, the chancellor, Bennet Brett, and John Birch, the proctors of the said university; and that by their submission to the king's order, it was by him, in chancery, decreed, that the whole university aforesaid, and all orders, persons, and faculties in the same, should be fully subject to the visitation of the said abp. and his successors, and to his and their officers. And that as often as the said abp. or his successors, or his or their officers, should be interrupted by the said chancellor, their liberties should be seized into the king's hands, until the said abp. was restored to his right. And further, for every time of such interruption, the chancellor, or other officer of the university, should be bound to pay to the king 1000l.—All these articles and orders, at the request of the said abp. were confirmed by the whole assent of parl. On all which sir R. Cotton makes this remark, "That hence it most manifestly appears, that even in those days the prerogatives of our princes were nothing subject to the pope's supremacy. For, otherwise, this abp. the pope's adopted and foster-son, would not have so slighted the pope's bulls, which he plainly took for mere bells and baubles."

On the 20th of Dec. which was the last day of this parl. the lords and commons, by their joint Petition, seemed to lament that a report was spread, that the king was offended with some in both houses, for matters done in last parl.; and they desired that the king would embrace and esteem them as his loyal subjects; which request he, out of mere grace, granted. Then the Speaker again recommended to the king the persons of the queen, the prince, and the rest of the king's sons, praying the advancement of their estates; for which his maj. returned them his hearty thanks. And after the more private petitions of the commons were answered, the chancellor, by the king's command, gave thanks to the three estates of the realm, and dissolved this parliament.

Act against Riots.] We must not omit to mention that a statute was passed in this parl. against Riots and other Public Assemblies, whereby it was enacted, "That all justices of peace should have a very strict eye upon the subject to prevent all riotous meetings, and sheriffs to be as watchful to suppress them; which, if they neglected, they should each of them forfeit 100l. for every such offence. However, we find in the Public Acts a general pardon, or act of grace, not mentioned by the Abridger of the Records, which must have passed in this session of parl. though it is dated Dec. 22, or two days after the dissolution of it. The king's writ or proclamation of the act, was sent to all the sheriffs in England; and there are but two exceptions, viz. Owen Glendour and Thos. de Trumpington, with their adherents, included. This seems to be a very seasonable Act of Grace, both for the king and his subjects; since, as he shewed mercy to them, he had the better title to expect it himself, from the king of kings, before whom he was shortly to appear. For very soon after Henry was seized with a distemper, which, in three months time, brought him to his end; dying March the 20th, 1413, in the 46th year of his age, and the 13th of his reign.

Taxes in the Reign of Henry IV.

In his 1st year there was granted to him 50s. on every sack of wool from denizens; and 4 pounds from aliens for 3 years: also a 10th and a 15th.—In his 2nd year, a subsidy was granted of one 10th, and one 15th, 2s. on every tun of wine, and 8d. in the pound on merchandize.—In his 4th year there was granted to the king, the usual subsidy on wools, wool-fells and skins, for 3 years; also 3s. on every tun of wine, and 12d. in the pound on merchandize, besides a 10th and a 15th.—In his 5th year there was a tax of 20s. on every knight's fee, and 20d. of every one that had 20 pounds lands a year, and 1s. in the pound for money or goods, and so upwards according to that rate. But the record of this subsidy was burnt by order of the parl. that granted it.—In his 6th year he had two 10ths and two 15ths, also the subsidy on wools, wool-fells, and skins; that is, of every denizen, for each sack of wool 43s. 4d. for every 240 wool-fells the like sum, and for every last of skins 5 pounds: of aliens 10s. more, to subsist for two years; 3s. on every tun of wine, imported or exported, and 12d. in the pound on merchandize.—In his 7th year, there was granted a subsidy of one 10th, and one 15th, besides the usual grant upon wools.—In his 9th year, he had one 10th and a half, with the same subsidy as in the last parl. for 2 years.—In his 11th year, the same tax was granted; and, in his 13th year, it was again repeated, with the addition of 6s. 8d. upon every owner of lands of 20l. a year clear estate.

Price of Provisions in the Reign of Henry IV.

In 1401, wheat very dear, at 16s. the quarter.—In 1407, a cow was sold for 7s. and her calf for 1s. 8d. Five bushels and a half of salt for 3s. 4½d. Two bushels of wheat for 10d. A thresher for a day's labour 2d. An ox sold for 13s. 4d. A new plough 10d. For 11 bushels of sowing wheat 5s. 10½d. For 18 bushels of sowing oats 4s. 6d. For a dungcart and all materials 1s. 2d. For a pair of cart-wheels 3s. 2d. See Fabian's Chronicle. Kennett's Parochial Antiq. Fleetwood's Chronicle Pretiosum.

HENRY V.

Henry V. began his reign March 20, 1413, the day of his father's death, and was proclaimed on the next, with the usual ceremonies. We are told by Walsingham, a contemporary historian, and an ancient manuscript chronicle of this king's life, that the late king had summoned a parl. to meet at Westminster, March the 24th this year, which was four days after he died. That being met accordingly, they gave an extraordinary testimony of their entire confidence in the new king, by an address to him from both houses, wherein they offered to swear allegiance to him before he was crowned, or had taken the customary oath to govern according to the laws. The king gave them thanks for their good affections to him, and exhorted them to employ all their power for the good of the nation, in their several places and stations. He told them, "That he began his reign by pardoning all that had offended him; and, with a sincere design for his people's happiness, said, that he would be crowned on no other condition, than to make use of all his authority to promote it. And prayed to God, that if he foresaw he was like to prove any other than a just and good king, he would please to take him immediately out of the world, rather than seat him on the throne, to be a public calamity to his people."

A Parl. called.] Dugdale has given us the form of a writ directed to Thomas abp. of Canterbury, dated March 22, 1413, for calling of a parl. The reasons given in the said writ of summons were these, "That the king, by the advice of his council, had determined to hold a parl. 3 weeks after Easter next following, in order to consult and treat with the bps. and other prelates, the lords and commons, concerning the state and safety of the nation. The abp. was therefore commanded, as he had any regard to the king's honour, or the safety and defence of the kingdom, to be present at the sessions, and to give notice, to the prior and chapter of the church of Canterbury, to the archdeacons and all the clergy of that diocese, that the prior and archdeacons should come in their own persons to parl. and that the chapter should send thither one fit proctor, and the clergy two distinctly appointed, with power to consent to what should be enacted by the general council of the nation." The like writs were directed to other bps. abbots, and priors, to Wm. Gascoign lord chief justice, to Edw. de Courtenay earl of Devonshire, and others of the nobility.

On the day appointed, May 15, the parl. met at Westminster; when the king, sitting on his throne, and the other estates of the realm attending, the bp. of Winchester, the king's uncle, and lord chanc. made a speech to them, wherein he first declared, "that this parl. was called, in order that the church, with all corporations and persons, should enjoy their accustomed liberties, and also for a general consultation." The Latin sentence he chose for his theme was, Aute on ge actum consilium stabilire: he told them, "that the king desired to consult with them on several accounts, for the competent support of his royal dignity; the due execution of good laws and govt. of the nation; the encouraging his allies and subduing his enemies. And, that they might more effectually go about these weighty matters, he urged the commons to choose their Speaker, and present him the next day to the king."

W. Stourton, Esq. chosen Speaker.] Then the receivers and triers of petitions were appointed; and the day after, the commons presented William Stourton, esq. who was allowed.—May 22, the commons came before the king and lords, when their Speaker declared to his maj. that in the time of his father, many fair promises were made for the observation of the laws, but nothing done in them; whereupon he prayed the king for the due execution of them; and particularly mentioned a late riot against the abbot of Cirencester, which he desired might be punished. The Speaker was commanded to exhibit the same in writing, that the king might the better consider of it.—May 25, John Dorewood, esq. and others of the Commons, delivered to his maj. a scheme for providing for the defence of Ireland, the marshes of Wales, and of Scotland, of Calais, the dutchy of Guienne, for safe guarding the seas, for furnishing out a fleet, and for raising sufficient forces to repel any invasion.

June 3, the commons again attended the king in the house of lords; and their Speaker being rendered by sickness unable to serve, they presented the said John Dorewood, who had the king's approbation.

The King pays his Father's Debts.] And whereas annuities were to be paid to several persons by letters patent, it was enacted, "that the king, for the support of his charges, should yearly receive 10,000*l.* and the remainder should be paid according to the rate." And whereas Henry V. had by his last will given all his goods and chattels to discharge his debts, and for the payment of certain legacies; and had made Henry abp. of York, Tho. bp. of Durham, John Pelham, Rob. Waterton, and John Laventhorp, executors; and had appointed the king and abp. to be overseers of this testament; but the goods falling short, the abp. of Canterbury, as ordinary, ought to have the administration of the said goods and chattels: therefore, that they might not be put up to common-sale, the king took possession of them, and granted the sum of 25,000 marks, the value of these goods, to be paid out of the wardrobe in 3 years to the executors, and discharged them of all executions by the same will, which should be over and above the last-mentioned sum.—The Commons petitioned the king, "that the statute made in the fifth year of Henry IV. for the regulation of Aliens, might be observed." Which the king granted, saving his prerogative.—The Commons, with the assent of the bishops and lords, granted to the king the like subsidy on staple-ware, tunnage, and poundage, for 4 years, as they had given to his father in the 13th year of his reign.

Act against Provisors from Rome reinforced.] In the 25th year of Edw. III. an act had been made for maintaining the right of the English kings to confer ecclesiastical preferments and benefices: it was reinforced and confirmed afterwards by two others, one made in the 13th of Rich. II. the other to the same effect in the 2nd of Henry IV. forbidding all persons to accept any vacant bishoprics, or other church benefices, from the popes of Rome, or any other than the king, under penalty of banishment, and forfeiture of lands and goods to the crown. And now by this parl. it was enacted, "that all these statutes made against Provisors from Rome should be strictly observed."

Petitions of the Commons.] The commons presented a large complaint of the many oppressions with which the ordinaries aggrieved the people in the proving of Wills, and the like; and of the abuses they committed by punishing Fornication and Adultery with pecuniary penance; and petitioned the king, that these grievances might be redressed; whose answer was, "that he would give orders to the bps. to rectify them; and if they neglected it he would do it himself."—They likewise petitioned, that coats might be allowed to the knights and burgesses summoned to parl. in the 14th year of Henry IV. though nothing was done in that session. The king replied, "that if upon view of the records any the like precedents could be found, allowance of their fees should be made."—They also petitioned, that the Grounds set out by the Perambulations of Edward III. might be entirely disforested. To which the king answered, "that such as had just complaints against the charters of the forest should be heard."—And when the commons farther asked of the king a declaration for surcharging of sheriffs, and petitioned that they might be allowed upon their oaths in the exchequer; he promised, "that upon the sheriffs coming before the council and the barons of the exchequer, they should find remedy."—To another petition, desiring that no barge, ship, boat, or other vessel, going on any river, be taken for a deodand, if a person accidentally falling out of it be drowned; the king replied, "that he would take advice about it."—The like answer he returned to a Petition offered in favour of merchants, that they might freely bring into the nation their goods of Arras, and all other merchandize but that of the staple; and paying their due customs, might sell the same as they pleased to all men, the Genoa merchants excepted.

Several Acts passed for the benefit of the Nation.] In this parl. many laws were enacted to render the nation rich, flourishing, and prosperous. It was enacted, "That all Aliens should depart the kingdom; and that all such merchants aliens as remained should live in English families, on pain of imprisonment at the king's will; also that all the Livings of Priors aliens (besides some which they excepted) should be seized for the king's use."—By another act it was ordained, "That every Juror in all Inquisitions should be questioned upon his oath, whether he, or any other, had received any thing for his use, as to the process of the business; and that upon conviction by his oath he should be tried."—An act was made about the Election of persons to serve in parl.; by which it was appointed, "that none should be chosen knights of the shire who were not resident in the county on the day when the writ of summons was dated; nor any be chosen burgesses, but such as were citizens or townsmen and freemen, dwelling in the cities and towns where they were elected."

—Another act passed to enforce the observing of some former statutes about the removing or straiting wears, mills, stanks, stales, and kydels, which were a nuisance to the rivers.—Another against the Forgers of false deeds, ordaining, "That the aggrieved party should have his suit, and recover damages; and that the person convict should make fine and ransom at the king's pleasure."—By another, provision was made against the abuses that arose from the continuance of the officers of Sheriffs, such as under-sheriffs, clerks, receivers, and bailiffs, in their places, from year to year, or from their interchangeable removal out of one office into another. It was enacted therefore, "That those who should be Bailiffs or Sheriffs for one year should bear no such office for 3 years following, excepting bailiffs of sheriffs, which are inherite in their office; and that no under-sheriff, sheriff's clerk, receiver, or bailiff, should be attorney in any of the king's courts during their being in any such office."—By another act it was ordained, "That in every original Writ of Actions personal, appeals, and indictments, additions should be made of the estate, or degree, or mystery of the persons, and of the counties and towns where they dwelt."—And whereas the friends and kindred of those rebels that were slain in the late commotions in Wales, in the former reign, endeavoured to revenge their blood by quarrels and insults on the king's faithful subjects, by indictments, or impeachments, or threatenings of vengeance. It was therefore ordained by another statute, "That no such quarrel, action, or demand be made, on penalty of paying to the injured person treble damages, and of two years imprisonment after the conviction."—There were complaints also of neglect in executing the law made in the 13th Rich. II. forbidding any Alien Frenchman to have or enjoy any benefice within this nation, and requiring their departure out of the nation by a certain time limited; and that when any benefices became vacant by the departure or death of the priors, aliens, or others, Englishmen should be put in. The commons represented, "that contrary to this act, Alien Frenchmen did purchase the king's letters patents to be demizens, that they might enjoy the benefices which they did accordingly possess, to the great damage of the kingdom, by carrying away its treasure, and betraying the king's counsels to his enemies." The king considering these mischiefs, passed an act to enjoin the strict observance and execution of the former; also for clearing the nation of these Priors Aliens, those who were conventual, and those who had institution and induction, only excepted, on condition that they be catholic, and find surety not to disclose the counsels and secrets of the realm.—Great disturbances were produced by the coming over into England of considerable numbers of Irishmen, and begging priests, who were called Chamber-Deacons: therefore, for the establishment of the quiet here, and to re-people that forsaken kingdom, it was ordered by parl. “that they should depart before the 1st of Nov. on forfeiture of their goods, and imprisonment at the king’s pleasure.”—There was another complaint exhibited, “that whereas all the revenues, profits, fishing customs of the town and marches of Calais had been appointed by Edw. III. and Rich. II. to be levied by the treasurer of Calais, to satisfy the charges necessary for its defence, these revenues had been diverted from their intended use in the former reign, and bestowed by letters patents on several captains and other persons.” An act was passed to revoke all these patents and grants, and to appropriate the revenues and profits of that town to their first purpose.

The Clergy stir up the King to prosecute sir J. Oldcastle as a Favourer of the Lollards.] Whilst the parl. sat at Westminster, the convocation of the Clergy, according to the usual custom of those times, was assembled at st. Paul’s. Thos. Arundel, abp. of Canterbury, being sensible how zealous the king was for the church, thought this the fittest opportunity to root out those heretical doctrines, which had long been a grievous thorn in the sides of the clergy. He hoped that the king’s youth and natural courage, concurring with his religious inclination, would more earnestly engage him in a work, by which he might merit, at once, both the favour of God and of his people. By the help of 12 inquisitors, which the prelate had sent out the year before, he had collected a large bundle of accusations, which were afterwards digested into no less than 246 Articles, against the principles and doctrines of the Lollards. On the canvassing of these, in convocation, it was, at length, decreed, “That it would be impossible to extirpate the doctrines of Wickliffe, unless certain great men, who were the professed abettors and maintainers of them, were taken off. That sir John Oldcastle, lord Cobham, being the chief of them, should be first dealt withal; and that, without delay, a process should be issued out against him, as a most notorious heretic.” And, because the said lord was in great favour with the king, for his conduct and valour, it was thought adviseable to acquaint his maj. with their designs, and the just occasion of them; that, having obtained his leave, their proceedings might be more successful, and give less offence. These things being settled in convocation, an accident happened, which gave the Clergy a much greater handle to work the downfall of these new reformers; who, being openly abetted by some, but secretly by many more, great men, who wanted to be sharing the Revenues of the church amongst them, were become exceeding dangerous to the clergy. And, in the very first year of this king an insurrection of these reformers began in and about London, headed by sir John Oldcastle and others, which might have proved of ill consequence, had not the king himself, by his vigilance and conduct, suppressed it. This unadvised step of the Lollards gave the young monarch a warm resentment against them, and made him judge that their principles were equally destructive to church and state.

A Parl. called.] A parl. was called to meet at Leicester on the 30th of April, 1414. The first act that we find to be done at it, was a very severe statute made against the followers of Wickliffe’s doctrine, whereby it was enacted, “That whoever read the scriptures in English, which was then called ‘Wickliffe’s Learning,’ should forfeit land, cattle, goods and life, and be condemned as hereticks to God, enemies to the crown, and traitors to the kingdom; that they should not have the benefit of any sanctuary, though this was a privilege then granted to the most notorious malefactors; and that if they continued obstinate, or relapsed after pardon, they should first be hanged for treason against the king, and then burned for heresy against God.”

Another attempt of the Commons against the Revenues of the Clergy.] But, notwithstanding this act against the Lollards, it was in this parl. at Leicester, that the storm which had long been raising against the Clergy, had like to have broke out to some purpose; had not the wit and policy of Henry Chicheley, then abp. of Canterbury, who succeeded Arundel, averted the danger. The Commons had again put the king in mind, of what had been desired in parl. 4 years before, relative to converting the lands and possessions of the Clergy to the service of the state. “This bill,” says Hall, “made the fat abbots to sweat; the proud priors to frown; the poor priors to curse; the silly nuns to weep, and, indeed, all her merchants to fear that Babel would down.” For, at this very time the Clergy were more apprehensive of their danger than ever, since they knew not what the active and bold spirit of a young prince, agitated by counsels which had a natural tendency to increase his own greatness, might produce against them. They once thought of fixing the king in their interest, by the voluntary present of a large sum of money; but, some of the wiser bps. considering that such an appearance of bribery would be indecent for persons of their character, and expose them to the hatred and scorn of the people, this proposal was rejected.

The Clergy prompt the King to a War with France.] And as it had been concluded, in the last synod at London, that the most effectual course to avert the impending storm, was to find the king some other business to employ the vigour of his courage, which might otherwise prove dangerous to them; it was therefore judged necessary to turn his thoughts to war; and to rouse his ambition by reminding him of the crown of France, descended to him from Edw. II. one of his royal progenitors. By a representation of the just right the king had to that claim, it was hoped his enterprising spirit might be stirred up to demand the crown of France, as the undoubted heir, and, upon refusal, to attempt the recovery of it by arms. And, to make these counsels more prevalent, they, also, agreed to make an offer of a great sum of money to supply the necessary expences of the war. Also, to give up all the alien priories in the kingdom, to the number of 110, who were possessed of lands that would considerably increase the revenues of the crown.

The Abp. of Canterbury's speech in favour of the said War.] These resolutions were soon after put in execution; for, we are told, that in this very parl. at Leicester,

The Abp. of Canterbury rose up, in the house of lords, and addressed the king in words to this purport (a):—"We all know, great sir, with what royal wisdom and care you have established the peace and prosperity of your people, and we all enjoy the blessings of your excellent govt.: but while your designs and actions have been directed to our common good, we have not done any thing for the increase of your empire; and among all the debates in this hon. assembly to make laws for the security of the subjects liberties and privileges, we have neglected to consider how we may advance the greatness of our king, and in him that of our country too. Now, since I owe all my fortune to your favour, gratitude, as well as the duty of a subject, obliges me to propound what I think may promote the honour of so gracious a sovereign, and enlarge his power. You administer justice to your people with a noble equity, you are illustrious in the arts of a peaceful govt.; but the glory of a great king consists not so much in a reign of serenity and plenty, in great treasures, in magnificent palaces, in populous and fair cities, as in the enlargement of his dominions; especially when the assertion of his right calls him out to war, and justice, not ambition, authorizes all his conquests. Your maj. ought to wear the crown of France by a right descending to you from Edw. III. your illustrious predecessor. That valiant king openly challenged his right by ambassadors, and when the French endeavoured to elude it by a pretended Salick law, he bravely attempted to conquer by arms what he could not obtain by a just treaty. You have the same title to demand that crown, and the same reasons to make war, upon a refusal. I doubt not but they will oppose their imaginary Salick law in like manner against your claim; but I know very well, that as they contradict themselves in assigning the original of this law, so if it were granted that there is such a one, yet France is not concerned in it. It is in vain to tell us, that it was made by Pharamond the founder of their monarchy, as if he could be the founder of a law which had no name nor being till above 400 years after his death: for then it was that Charles the great returning from the conquest of Saxony, part of his army passed the Sala, and seated themselves between that river and the Elb, and from the name of the former were called Salique Gauls. This new colony detesting the vicious manners of the German women, made a law, that none of that sex should inherit lands within the bounds of their little govt. But what is all this to France? How will the French persuade us, that by virtue of this law the crown of that kingdom must not descend to any daughter of their kings, if they do not first prove their country to be situated between those two German rivers? but though all were true, which they report of this boasted law, yet why should they use it as an argument against the right of our kings, when they never made it any bar in the succession of their own? Pepin, who by deposing Childeric III. mounted the throne, was acknowledged the next heir as descended from the princess Blithilda, daughter of Clothair the first; and Hugh Capet, who usurped the crown from Charles duke of Lorain the next male heir, to give himself the colour of a title, asserted that he sprung from the princess Lingarda, the daughter of Charlemain. Thus Lewis IX. too, whom they honour as a saint, neglecting the precarious title of Hugh Capet his grandfather, could sufficiently satisfy his conscience and the nation by deriving his right from queen Isabella his grandmother, as descended from the princess Ermingarde, daughter and heir of Charles duke of Lorain, whom Hugh Capet had deprived of his kingdom and life. But were it certain that this Salick law had from the beginnings of the monarchy been established and inviolably observed in France, yet what obligation can a law have, which is contrary to the commands of God, and the customs of all other nations, and so offends against all the rules of justice and reason? God declares, that if a man died without sons, the inheritance should descend to the daughter: and there never was a law among any people in the world, which excluded the daughters from the rights of children. The French alone violate the statutes of heaven, and slight all the laws that are in force on earth, that they may devolve the right of their crown on whom they please. But it is your undoubted right, my sovereign, and all the powers of France will be too weak to oppose your possession, if you do but resolve to vindicare it. Consider therefore the just title which you have to this crown, devolved on you by queen Isabella, your great grandmother, sister and heir to three successive kings of France, who died without children, and take up noble arms to assert so just a cause! advance your standard into France, and with assured hopes of victory march to conquer those dominions which are your own by inheritance! there is no true Englishman but is ready to devote his life and fortune to so glorious a service of his king. And in full persuasion of the justice of the war, we the clergy have given such a sum of money to maintain it, as was never granted to any of your predecessors, and will join all our prayers for the success of your arms."—When the abp. had ended, Nevil earl of Westmoreland, high-warden of the marches toward Scotland, apprehending that the country committed to his govt. would be exposed to the incursions of that nation, if the king should draw his forces out of England for this expedition, thus spoke to dissuade the war:—"Though I freely acknowledge myself of the same mind with my lord the abp. as to the glory that will be gained in conquering France, and the advantages that may arise from the acquisition of such a flourishing kingdom; yet I cannot but advise, that our arms should be first turned on Scotland, that by subduing that people to the English dominion, the whole island may be brought under one govt. When all our strength and forces shall be united, when there shall be no enemies to disturb us within the bounds of this our little world, separated from the other by the ocean, then will be the proper time to consider of foreign conquests, and how we may extend the English empire abroad, which, while we are unsecured at home, we cannot attempt with any reasonable hopes of success. It has therefore been the constant practice of wise governments, who have prospered in enlarging their dominions, first to subdue those people which bordered on them, before they advanced their arms against the more remote. By this method were the Assyrian, Persian and Grecian monarchies raised to such height of power, that a great part of the world was forced to bow to them. Thus the Romans established a larger empire than any of the former; but they would have failed in the attempt, if they had invaded more distant nations, before they had subdued their neighbours: but when by conquering the Samnites, the Volsci, the Fidenates, and other people around them, they had made themselves intire masters of all Italy, they soon carried their victorious arms through most parts of the earth. But what need I argue from examples? It is reason sufficient against a war with France, that whenever to invade that kingdom we shall draw the strength out of our own, the Scots our ancient and inveterate neighbours will bring fire and sword into the bowels of our ungarded country. And to put this past question, I will only remind you of the old league between that nation and France, by which, if either of them are invaded, they are bound mutually to assist one another. We have found them so punctual to their agreement hitherto, that whenever we have transported our armies into France, the Scots have entered our country with dreadful devastations. If then we must have a war with either of these people, let it be with Scotland, where all things promise to us an easier victory, their king being an honourable prisoner in our court, and the unseasonable severity of the duke of Albany, who governs in his absence, having thrown that nation into dismal convulsions. But to invade France, what a vast army is necessary; what immense sums of money to raise and pay the soldiers, and what a prodigious fleet to transport them?—The earl having ended

The Duke of Exeter (a), the king's uncle, thus spoke in answer:—"If I did not know, that the most effectual course to destroy any mischief, is to cut off the root which feeds it; and if experience had not taught all of us that France is the spring which has nourished a perpetually growing enmity in the hearts of the Scots against us, I should advise that the French might be the last with whom we make war. But since they have always been industrious to render Scotland an irreconcilable enemy, and to foment in the minds of that nation a fierce hatred and desire of revenge; since they have on all occasions stirred them up to invade us, and by their assistance have enabled them to do so; it is certainly the best counsel, that by a vigorous war upon France we should strike at the head of all these mischiefs: for if that kingdom be conquered, either the Scots will no more be our enemies, their hatred being no longer kept alive and cherished by the old fomenters of it: or if they refuse to incorporate into one people with us, yet destitute of succour from that nation, they must, without any lasting war, submit to our power. How will they be in a condition to fight us, when they shall want arms to put into their soldiers hands, or officers to lead them, all supplies from France being cut off? And whither shall they have recourse for aid, when that people is subdued by us? Not to Denmark, whose king is brother-in-law to ours; not to Portugal and Castile, for the kings of both those nations are allied to our sovereign; not to Italy, at so great a distance; not to Germany or Hungary, which are in league with us. Let us then begin the war with France, since we shall conquer two nations with one victory: and since a rich, fruitful and pleasant country will be the reward of the conqueror. What though the Scots may invade us, when our king with his army is absent? Their incursions surely will not be so dangerous, but that the earl of Westmoreland, who is warden of the marches, with a few select troops, will be able not only to make head against them, but to give them a repulse."

(a) Hollingshead, Biondi, &c. call him so; but he was then only earl of Dorset, though created duke afterwards.

The duke's arguments prevailed with the king and his brothers, who being all young and ardent of glory, were impatient to signalize their courage against the old enemies of their country: and the same gallant spirit diffusing itself through the minds of the other nobles, they all declared for a War with France; which being thus resolved on, the parl. was prorogued.

A new Parl. called.] By writs bearing date Sept. 26, a new parl. was summoned to meet at Westminster, Nov. 19, 1414. The following is a List of the

On Nov. 19th, the parl. met, and the king being seated on his throne, in the Painted Chamber; by his command, the bp. of Winchester his uncle, and chancellor of England, opened the session by a speech; wherein he declared, "That his maj. would, that the church, with all corporations and persons, should enjoy their former liberties. That the king not only endeavoured to govern the realm wisely, but he was also strengthening himself to recover his due inheritance, which, though belonging to, yet had been a long time withheld from his crown; which claim he was resolved to prosecute even unto death. And for the attempting such a mighty exploit, great provision was required." Then taking for his subject, Dum tempus habemus operamur bonum;

he inferred from thence, "That to every natural disposition two kinds of times, or seasons, were limited; for instance, as to trees, one time of growing, and another time of blossoming and bearing fruit; to man, one time for labour, and another for rest; to princes, the heads of men, a time for peace, and another for war. That the king finding his people in great ease and peace, had therefore the better opportunity to attack the enemy; to which he applied, Dum tempus. That to such an high and noble enterprize, some things were absolutely necessary, as good advice, obedience of his subjects, and a chearful relief from them. That they ought to grant a larger subsidy, considering that their prince and only patron, would go in person against the enemy, and freely expose his life to all the dangers of the war; and concluded with desiring the commons to choose a Speaker, and present him the next day to the king."

T. Chaucer, Esq. elected Speaker.] Accordingly, the commons elected Thomas Chaucer, esq. to be their Speaker, and presented him in the usual form. They then proceeded to consider of the Supplies, and by the assent of the bps. and lords granted to the king two whole 10ths, and two whole 15ths to be levied on the laity. It was enacted likewise, "That the king by his council, should have power to make ordinances concerning the Coin, which should continue till the next parl."

Henry Percy restored to his Title and Estate.] Henry Percy, grandson of the late earl of Northumberland, and son to Henry Hotspur, slain at the battle of Shrewsbury, being now of age, and a prisoner in Scotland, presented his declaration to the parl. in which he shewed that the king had restored him to the honour which his father had forfeited by his rebellion, and had made him earl of Northumberland: he therefore required a general restitution to it in blood, and that he might be restored to all the hereditaments which were intailed, with free entry in all of them, reserving to the king the lands of fee-simple. The king granted all to him, on condition that before his entry into any of the said lands, he should, by matter of record in chancery, prove the lands intailed: and his maj. appointed sir Robert Umfrevile to treat with the Scots about Percy's delivery, who, by the earl of Northumberland his grandfather, had been left with them as an hostage. He confirmed also to John duke of Bedford, and to his heirs male, the castle, earldom, honour, and seigniory of Richmond, which Ralph earl of Westmoreland held during his life.

The French War prosecuted with great vigour.] The king had been sufficiently moved with the reasons given in the parl. at Leicester for making his claim to the crown of France, and his great courage and spirit now spurred him on to attempt the conquest of that kingdom, if his demands were not accepted. The Subsidies granted by the clergy and laity, to enable the king to begin this great enterprize, amounted, in the whole, to a very large sum; and, if we may believe an old historian, to no less than 300,000 marks sterling. By which means great levies of men were made, successfully, in all parts of the kingdom.—But, to gain a more specious pretence for war, it was necessary first to offer peace; though upon such terms as Henry knew well enough would not be accepted. There had been some time before a treaty of marriage set on foot between this young monarch and the princess of France, who is said to have been a paragon of beauty; but now Henry much enlarged his demands with the princess; and by his ambassadors to the court of France, insisted on a restitution of all those provinces, which his predecessors had ever enjoyed in that kingdom. However desirous the French court was of an alliance with England, and marrying their princess to a young and potent king, yet the restoring these provinces, was a very disagreeable article, and could never be reconciled to their politics. Accordingly, all treaties of peace were broken off upon it, and the king of England made mighty preparations, both by sea and land, to invade France, and assert his right to that kingdom by the ratio ultima regum.—To Goodwin, the particular writer of this king's life, and to the more general historians, we must refer for a description of the glorious exploits performed by this magnanimous hero in France.

A Parl. called.] After Henry's return to England, and his triumphant entry into his capital of London, he presently called a parl. the writs for which were dated Jan. 21st, 1415, and returnable the 16th of March following. On which day the parl. met at Westminster, when the king sitting in his royal throne, in the Painted Chamber of the palace, commanded the bp. of Winchester, still lord chanc. to open the cause of the summons; who, in the presence of the three estates of the realm, first made the usual declaration, that it was the king's royal will and pleasure that the church and all other persons and corporations should enjoy their liberties, and then took for his text, Vobis Viam, &c.—In discoursing on which he endeavoured to demonstrate, "That a thing well begun and continued with diligence, must have a prosperous event, according to the saying, Dimidium facti, qui bene capit habet." This he applied to the king's successes, who had made so glorious a beginning, by invading France to recover his right, and an inheritance derived from his ancestors; who had pursued his gallant enterprize in a continued course of victory, by the conquest of Harfleur, and the defeat of the French, in a general Battle at Agincourt. That it being only peculiar to divine wisdom to foresee the end and event of all things, he entirely referred that to God; with great hope of success from so prosperous a beginning. Which, that the king might be enabled to obtain, he had called this parl. for their good counsel and assistance."

Sir W. Beauchamp chosen Speaker.] The Commons, retiring to their house, chose sir

Walter Beauchamp, knight, for their Speaker; who being allowed, they next, with the assent of the bps. and lords, appointed that the 10ths and 15ths granted last parl. should be paid sooner than was ordered. By the same authority, it was enacted, "That, considering the damnable schism between the two popes at Rome, all bps. elect, and other persons, should be confirmed by their own Metropolitans, upon the king's writ, without farther excuse or delay."

On the 8th of April, the king prorogued the parl. to Monday in the third week after Easter; when being again assembled, the chanc. told them the reason of the said adjournment, was not only on occasion of the devout time, but that an honourable peace had been offered by the French, and that the emperor Sigismund was the mediator in it; in which the commons were desired to give their advice. But, though this is here mentioned in the Records, they give us no farther account about it.

Petitions of the Commons.] The following are the most remarkable Petitions in this parl.—P. That all sheriffs, for the fees of knight coming to the parl. might enter into all liberties, except the demesnes of all lords, and such towns as find burgesses. A. The statute made 12th Rd. II. should be kept.—P. That all sheriffs might be discharged in the exchequer upon their oaths. A. The king will be advised.—P. That all owners of ships, during the time of their being in the king's service, might have 3s. 4d. in the tun above the ordinary freight. A. The king would do according to reason.—P. That all men might go to the parts of Iceland to fish freely, as they used to do. A. The king will take advice.—P. That all the ordinaries through the kingdom might, by an assigned day, enquire, and certify in to chancery, the foundations of hospitals, with all circumstances, that redress might be made in this business. A. The statute made at Leicester, 2d Hen. V. shall be observed.—P. That the king's purveyors do take 8 bushels of corn only to the qr. struck; and that they take up no provision in the market, without the goodwill of the party, and ready pay. A. The statutes made for that purpose shall be kept.—P. That some remedy might be found for the relief of the poor clergy, much wasted, because the universities swarmed with new learning, by reason of the statute of provisors, which caused the old faith to be neglected. A. At the king's motion, the bps. promised to provide a remedy for this business.—P. That the penalty of suffering any prisoner to escape, who was guilty of counterfeiting, washing, or clipping money, might be 100l. A. The penalty shall be arbitrary as before.—P. That all writs of subpoena, and certis de causis, going out of the chancery and exchequer, might be controlled, and not granted in matters determinable at the common law, on penalty of the plaintiffs paying 40l. by way of debt to the defendant. A. The king will be advised.

Acts passed.] It was also enacted in this parl. "That whereas several Bretons were come into the kingdom, either as spies, or to carry money and jewels out of the nation, all of them not naturalized, were, by act of parl. required to go out of the land, before June 24 ensuing, upon capital penalty."—And whereas provisions of benefices from the pope had been made use of, to exclude from the said benefices the Incumbents, who by the gift of the patron had long enjoyed them; it was therefore ordained by another act, "That no Incumbents should be molested under pretence of any such provisions of the pope; that whoever disquieted them, should incur the penalties contained in the Statutes of Provisors before named; and that they should be prosecuted by process of præmunire factus formed against them; and that the person who sued them should recover treble damages."—Another act passed, to make clipping, washing, and filing of Money, treason: and whereas, (by reason that it belonged only to the king's justices before himself, or by special commission assigned, to judge and punish this crime) it was so boldly and generally practised, that the destruction of all the Coin was unavoidable, if hasty execution and remedy were not provided: it was therefore enacted in another statute, "That the justices assigned to take assizes, in all the counties of England, should have power, by the king's commissions, to hear and determine in their sessions, all such causes concerning the debasing or falsifying the Coin of the nation."—And whereas, contrary to the custom in the days of Edw. III. when no more than half a crown, or a crown at the most, was paid for proving a will, the ordinaries did now take 40 or 50s. It was therefore ordained by another act, "that no ordinary should take above that old customary rate for the probate of any testament, upon penalty of forfeiting to the aggrieved person treble the sum so received." This statute was to stand in force only to the end of the following year. These acts being passed, and Henry, the grandson of Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland, who had so long been an exile in Scotland, and who, in the parl. held at Westminster, in the 2nd year of this king's reign, had been restored to his honours and lands, having now, in the house of lords, done homage to the king, sitting in his chair of state, this session ended.

A Parl. called.] Next year great preparations being made on both sides to carry on the war with vigour, Henry found himself obliged to call a parl. in order to raise Supplies for that purpose; and writs were sent out, dated at Sandwich, Oct. 9, 1416, just after the king's second landing from abroad, for one to meet at Westminster on the 19th of the same month; the pressing exigencies of the state requiring such a speedy summons. On the day of the meeting, the bp. of Winchester opened the session with the usual formalities, and after quoting for his theme this Latin sentence, Operam detis ut quieti sitis. He alledged, "that as God had in 6 days created all the world, and rested the 7th; so the king, agreeably to his coronation oath, had, in 5 former parliaments, endeavoured to establish good laws for just administration at home, and the securing of an honourable peace abroad. But that the French were so little inclined to comply with the reasonable terms offered them, that they refused to render the English prisoners taken at the Battle of Agincourt, or to ransom their own. That the king, provoked at the obstinate injustice of an enemy, who resolved not to do him right in any thing, was constrained to attempt the recovery of his own by force of arms. And since, said he, this is his majesty's just resolution, and that there is indeed no other way to bring his enemy to reason, bella faciamus ut pacem habeamus, quia finis belli pax est; he is determined to use violence, and purchase that peace with the sword which is not to be otherwise obtained." He concluded with telling them, that the king intended to make use of their counsel, and required them to choose and present their Speaker to him.

Roger Flower, esq. elected Speaker.] On the third day of the session, the Commons presented Roger Flower, esq. who was accepted; and to shew their great zeal for the cause the king was engaged in, with the consent of the lords, they granted two whole 10ths and two 15ths, to be levied on the laity; the clergy also granted two 10ths on their own body: but all this being not sufficient, or thought too dilatory for the king's pressing occasions, at the same time it was enacted, "that all persons who would lend any sums of money to the king, should have letters patent to be paid out of the first money raised by the subsidy;" and the dukes of Clarence, Bedford, and Gloucester stood engaged for the performance of this, in case the king should die: upon which many of the bps. and lords, whose names are in the Parl. Rolls, readily subscribed; yet all was so deficient, that the king was necessitated to pawn the crown to Henry Beaufort, bp. of Winchester, for a vast sum, and to borrow 1000 marks of the lord-mayor of London, upon the security of many rich jewels.

An Act for a general Pardon, and others, passed.] At this time his maj. was pleased to grant a general pardon for all crimes which did not concern life, or loss of members.—An act was also passed, "that all sheriffs should have allowance upon their accounts by oath." This had been petitioned for by the Commons in the former session.—Also, whereas by an act made 12 Rich. II. certain rates of annual wages for bailiffs and other servants of husbandry were settled, and a penalty ordained for any who gave or took more; by an act now it was established, "that the taker only should incur this penalty."—Another act ordained, that none of the Irish nation should be elected an abp. bp. abbot, or prior; and that whoever promoted such to those ecclesiastical preferments, or brought any such Irish rebels to parliaments, councils, and other assemblies among the English, should have all their temporal estates seized into the king's hands, till they had paid the fines due for such offences.—There was also an act of pardon, by which all forfeitures, fines, debts, and demands, not exceeding 26s. 8d. were remitted; and all trespasses, offences, conspiracies, &c. pardoned.—Besides these, and some other less remarkable acts, the league and alliance between the king and the emperor Sigismund was confirmed by the whole assent. And on the last day of the session, the king sitting on his throne in full parl. created Tho. Beaufort, who was earl of Dorset, duke of Exeter, who had also 1000l. confirmed to him, to be paid yearly out of the exchequer, and 40l. out of the customs at Exeter. The lords so approved of this example of the king's liberality, that they said no objection could be made, but only that it was too little, and not proportionable to the merits and services of that noble person.

A Parl. called.] John duke of Bedford, the king's brother, was left regent during his absence abroad; and, whilst this victorious monarch was gaining many victories and towns in France, the Scots thought proper to invade the English borders; but, by the conduct of the regent, they were soon driven back again with shame and loss. After the nation was thus delivered from the dangers of this invasion, the duke thought proper to call a parl. the writs bearing date Oct. 5, 1417, and to sit the 16th of Nov. following at Westminster. At which time and place being assembled, in the Painted Chamber, before the regent, Tho. Langley, bp. of Durham, then lord chanc. declared the cause of their meeting, and took for his theme, Confortamini et viriliter agite, et gloriosi eritis. "On which words he took occasion to expatiate, and to set forth their happiness and glory in the reign of a king, who, during his father's life, had suppressed the rebellion of the Welch; and, since he came to the crown, had defeated the dangerous conspiracies formed against the church, and against his own person and govt; who had been so prosperous in war, by the conquest of Harfleur and the victory at Agincourt; and who now, with continued successes, was subduing Normandy to the English dominion. That the chief causes of their meeting were, to provide for the keeping of the peace at home, and due observation of the laws; to make provision for the support of the war; and to take care for the defence of the marches of Scotland. That in all these things it would become them, viriliter agere, to act strenuously; which, if they did, he then assured them of honour and glory; considering, remuneratio virtutum est honor." He concluded, as usual, with desiring the commons to choose their Speaker, and present him next day to the duke regent."

Roger Flower, esq. again chosen Speaker.] Accordingly on the 3d day of their sitting, Roger Flower, esq. was again elected speaker; who, with the common protestation, was allowed. And, as a testimony of their hearty attachment to the king's interest, and zeal for the war, the commons with the assent of the bps. and lords, granted to his maj. a 10th and a 15th.

Proceedings against sir John Oldcastle, lord Cobham.] "On the 18th of Dec. and the 29th day of this parl. sir John Oldcastle, of Cowling, in the county of Kent, knight, being outlawed upon treason in the king's-bench, and excommunicated by the abp. of Canterbury, for heresies, was brought before the lords; and, having heard his said conviction, answered not thereto in excuse: upon which record and process it was adjudged, that he should be taken as a traitor to the king and realm; that he should be carried to the tower of London, and from thence drawn through London to the new gallows in saint Giles's, without Temple-bar, and there to be hanged, and burned hanging." The Record out of the king's-bench is at large; the effect whereof is, "That the said sir John Oldcastle, and others, to the number of 20 men, called lollards, at st. Giles's aforesaid, did conspire to subvert the state of the Clergy, to kill the king, his brothers, and other nobles." The abp. of Canterbury's instrument for his excommunication, is there also at large. And a motion being made, that the lord Powis might have the thanks of the house, and the reward in the Proclamation mentioned, for apprehending of sir John Oldcastle, knight, the heretic; it passed in the affirmative.—Thus far sir Rob. Cotton, and his publisher. What we have to add, relative to the condemnation of this great man, by his peers, is chiefly from Walsingham; who says, that, when the parl. was informed of sir John Oldcastle's being taken in Wales by the lord Powis, they ordered him to be sent for up. He was brought to London in a horse-litter, having been much wounded in the conflict, and placed before the duke regent and the other estates of the realm; and the indictment drawn up against him at the king's-bench, some years before, for levying war against the king, was read in the house. Being demanded what he could alledge in arrest of judgment, he ran out into a discourse very foreign to the purpose, about God's mercies; and that all mortal men, who would be followers of God, ought to prefer mercy above judgment; that vengeance pertained only to the lord, and that his servants ought not to intrench upon this prerogative of the Almighty. Thus he went on, talking widely from the business, till, at last, the chief justice desired the regent to order the prisoner not to make them lose any more time, but to answer directly to the point. After some pause he told them, it was a small thing for him to be judged by them, or of man's judgment; and then began again to ramble from the question, when the chief justice once more interrupted him, and bid him answer peremptorily, if he had any thing to object against the legality of the process? To this he replied, with a surprising boldness, 'that he had no judge amongst them, nor could acknowledge them as judges, as long as his sovereign lord king Richard was living in Scotland.' Upon this answer, a warrant was instantly signed for his execution, and he was ordered to be hanged and burnt. The first part of his sentence was for treason; and the other for heresy. Accordingly he was executed on a gallows, built on purpose in st. Giles's fields, being hung by the neck in a chain of iron, and his body, with the gallows, consumed to ashes. Though this unhappy nobleman's paternal name was Oldecastle, yet by marrying the lady Joan grand-daughter to John lord Cobham, and his heir, he took the title of lord Cobham. Many are the disputes between the protestant and popish writers, about the character of this nobleman, who was the first peer of England that suffered for religion. The former crying him up as a martyr to truth; and the latter treating him with no better titles than an enthusiast, a rebel, and an heretick. Mr. Goodwin says, 'he had all the qualities of a brave and gallant gentleman, and was equally illustrious in arts and arms:' but, if what Walsingham relates of his behaviour at his execution be true, that when many persons of quality attended there, the last words he spoke was to sir Tho. Erpingham, adjuring him, 'that if he saw him rise from the dead again, on the 3d day, he would procure that his sect might live in peace and quietness;' we can look upon him, in this latter part of his life, as little better than an enthusiast.

In this session the letters patent made for the bp. of Winchester, for 21 marks to be levied out of the customs of all staple wares sent from Southampton, to satisfy the sum which he had lent the king for the war, were confirmed by this parl.—A grievous complaint being made of insurrections, of which the lollards were suspected to be the authors and abettors, and a petition being presented that commission at all times might be granted to enquire after them; answer was given, "That the statutes provided in that case should be executed."—There was also a motion offered, that no collector for the Clergy should be appointed out of his deanry: answer was given, "That the clergy should appoint their collectors."

A Parl. called.] On the 24th of Aug. 1419, writs of summons were issued out in the regent's name, for a parl. to meet at Westminster, on the 16th of Oct. following. On which day the bp. of Durham, lord chanc. declared the cause of the summons, before the regent and the other estates of the kingdom, and said, "That the king's subjects had great reason to revere him, and pray for his welfare; since, as he could not obtain that peace which he so often sought for, he had begun and carried on war, timore Dei, which, being principium sapientia, the effects of it were evidently shewn, by the many victories he had gained with honour:" all which he took care particularly to enumerate. For his theme he took these words, Bonum facientes non deficiamus; and from thence told them, "That his maj. was in good health and spirits; that he desired his subjects would be careful to observe the laws and provide for the defence of the realm; and considering that this enterprize so well begun could not be now left off without imminent danger, he expected new provisions to be made, that he might end the war to his own honour and their advantage."

Roger Flower, esq. a 3rd time chosen Speaker.] After the receivers and triers of petitions were appointed, the commons presented R. Flower, esq. a 3rd time as their Speaker; and, on the 13th Nov. they, with the bps. and lords, granted to his maj. one 15th and one 10th, and one half part of them both. The like order was taken for the payment of such who should lend money to the king, as had been observed in the 4th year of his reign. There were 23 lords, whose names are in the roll, who made their subscription. It was also enacted, "That the lords of the council should have power to establish orders touching the Coin." And for the keeping the money within the nation, it was enacted, "That all necessities should be bought at home for the king's soldiers, and sent to them; and also that certain wools should be bought and sent into Normandy, notwithstanding any statute for the staple made to the contrary."—The queen dowager's confessor having accused her for conspiring the death of the king, it was ordained, "That all the lands and goods of Roger Doller and Petromel Brocart, her sureties, should be seized, and paid to the king; and sufficient warrant was provided for all who should pay the same."

A Parl. called.] In 1420, the French war was brought to a conclusion, by a marriage between the princess Catherine of France and Henry king of England, whereby Henry was declared regent and heir-apparent to the crown of France. In Cotton's Abridgment of Records, there is a list of the peers summoned to a parl. to be held at Westminster on the 2nd of March this year; but no farther account is given of it. But the statute-books tell us, that a parl. met on the 2nd of Dec. in the 8th of this king; and that in this session a remarkable statute was made, occasioned by the peace then concluded between the two kings; whereby it was enacted, that, "Whereas the govt. of France was devolved on king Henry, which would require his frequent absence from England; therefore, if a parl. should be summoned by the writs of the king's lieutenant, and the king arrive soon after these writs were issued out of Chancery, yet that parl. should not be dissolved, nor new summons made, but that it should meet by virtue of the former."

Another act was passed, by which all foreign merchants, buying Wool in England, to transport into other parts, were obliged to pay into the mint of the tower an ounce of gold bullion; and for 3 piecas of tin the same, or the equal value in silver bullion, upon penalty of forfeiture of their goods.

A Parl. called.] The next year Henry, covered with laurels, returned to England, and found the nation flourishing and prosperous, under the govt. of Humphrey duke of Gloucester, his brother, who had succeeded John duke of Bedford in the regency, and managed all affairs with equal wisdom and success. In May 1421, the king met his parl. at Westminster, and, with his own mouth, represented to them the state of affairs, "What conquests he had made in France, and what supplies were necessary to continue the war. That the dauphin and his party, who maintained some cities and provinces against him being subdued, that kingdom might be entirely annexed to the English crown." The Commons agreed to give him a 15th, though a petition was presented, filled with sad complaints of the people's poverty and intolerable burden of the war, and that even his conquest of France would prove the ruin of England. This was done by some persons, says Walsingham, who, more affecting their own private interest, than the prosperity of their country, regretted to part with any money to advance the greatness and honour of the government.

During this session, there was a convocation of the Clergy at st. Paul's, who gave the king a 10th on these conditions; "That the purveyors of his majesty's household should not meddle with the goods or possessions of the Clergy. That if any of that body were accused of a capital crime in the king's courts of judicature, they might upon bail be freed from imprisonment; and that all castrated priests should be proceeded against in law as felons."

A Peace with France.] The next thing the parl. went upon, was to declare their approbation of the peace concluded at Troyes, between Henry and the king of France, to give their consents, and promise to observe it. And since that peace had not only been sworn to, and ratified by the two kings, but also by the three estates of France, the lords and commons of England would have it confirmed, in the same solemn manner, in parl. Whereupon Tho. Langley, bp. of Durham, lord chanc. having by the king's order read the articles of it, both houses of parl. avowed that they approved and accepted it, as most conducive to the good of both nations, and of all Christendom; and every one promised for himself, his heirs and successors, that they would inviolably observe it.

Remarkable Acts passed.] The most remarkable act made in this session was one by which it was ordained, "That whereas washers, clippers, and counterfeiters of the money, had debased and spoiled the Coin; none should receive any gold but by the king's weights appointed for that purpose; and that the gold which was not of due weight, nor of right alloy, should be sent to the Mint, to be new coined, the king at his own charge making up the deficiencies."—It was also enacted, "That every third benefice, the presentation of which belonged to the prelates and monasteries, should be conferred on some scholar of Oxford or Cambridge."

A Parl. called.] Whilst Henry was advancing his conquests against the dauphin in France, his brother, the duke of Bedford, administered the regency in England with great wisdom and fidelity. This governor thought fit to call a parl. which met at Westminster on the 1st of Dec. in the same year. The bp. of Durham opened the session with a formal speech. On the third day of their sitting, the commons presented Richard Baynard, esq. to the regent for their Speaker; and the same day, with the consent of the other house, they granted the king one 10th, and one 15th, to be levied on the laity; but with this condition, says Walsingham, that the first half of it should be paid in the money then current. It was also ordained, that all such money, with other, should pass till March 25, if it was not notoriously clipped and washed.

Act for Regulating the Coin.] The Gold Coin had been lessened in the value, by clipping and washing; therefore the parl. ordained, for the relief of the people, that the receivers of the tax should take all such light pieces, if they did not want in weight more than 12d. in the noble; or if they did, those who paid them were to make up the defect. The people therefore put off their gold as fast as they could, and hoarded up their silver: by which the king, though then under necessities for money, was contented to lose almost three shillings in the pound for the benefit of the people. Several other statutes were made this session of parliament relating to the Coinage; the heads of which are as follow: "That all the statutes unrepealed, concerning the good and lawful management of gold and silver, should be strictly observed and executed." "That the king should appoint his exchanges of the money of gold and silver in the city of London, and other towns, to be kept in open places in high streets, for the ease of the people; and that all who came to the Tower of London to have money new coined, should have it delivered to them within 8 days, according to the value of what they brought, paying for the coinage of gold at the rate of 5s. in the pound; and for coining a pound of silver, 15d. And that such who would not bring their money to the Tower, but delivered it into the king's exchanges, should pay 1d. in the noble, and so proportionably." Another was, "To oblige all the masters and workers in the Mint to make due and prompt payment of the new money, either by weight or number, to all who brought in their old; and that, if there was any default in the new money, either as to weight or alloy, the masters of the Mint should presently change it, and melt it down." Also it was enacted, "That the wardens, surveyors, and ministers of the exchanges out of the Tower should not divert the gold and silver received by them to any other use; but should be obliged to bring it to the Mint to be coined, that there might be the fuller circulation of money through the kingdom." A mint was also established at Calais, in the same manner as at the Tower. And it was likewise ordained, "That the new-coined money should be of as good alloy and weight as the old." Also, "That the chancellor of England should deliver to those who would have them, good and just weights of the noble, half-noble, and farthing of gold, to prevent the people's being abused by such as were counterfeit." The sheriffs and justices of peace were also required to make a search after all falsifiers of weights, and to keep them in prison till they had made fine and ransom at their discretion.

An act having been passed, an. 14 Rich. II. wherein it was ordained, "That for every exchange made by merchants in the court of Rome, or in other parts, they should be bound to buy, within 3 months following, merchandizes of the staple, to the value of the sum so exchanged, upon forfeiture of the same: and whereas the merchants had represented to the parl. that the time allotted was too short to buy such merchandizes and ship them; and that in default of exchanges, the money of the nation would be carried beyond sea." It was therefore enacted, "That all merchants, who should make such exchanges, should be bound personally in the chancery by recognizance to buy, within 9 months following, the merchandizes and commodities aforesaid."

As the parl. granted the king a 10th and 15th, so a convocation, which had met at York, Sept. 22, foregoing, gave him a 10th; and the duke of Bedford required the abp. by an order, dated Oct. 27, to appoint some of his clergy to be the collectors, and to return their names into the exchequer before Easter. This was the last parl. called in the reign of Henry V. who died of a dysentery, Aug. 31, 1422, at Vincennes, in France, in the 34th of his age, and in the 10th of his reign.

Taxes in the Reign of Henry V.

In his 1st year he had the like subsidy on staple-ware, tunnage, and poundage, for 4 years, as had been given to his father in the 13th year of his reign.—In his 2nd year an act was passed, whereby the priories alien, who depended on some capital abbies in Normandy, that received the profits of them, should be vested in the king, for carrying on a war against France.—The same year the parl. granted him two whole 10ths and two whole 15ths, to be levied on the laity.—In his 3rd year no tax was asked or granted.—In his 4th year he had two whole 10ths and two 15ths, to be levied on the laity; the clergy also granted two 10ths on their own body. But this being not sufficient, he was obliged to pawn his crown and jewels to carry on the French war.—In his 5th year he had one 10th and one 15th.—His 6th year was wholly spent on the conquest of France: but in his 7th year the parl. granted to him one 15th and one 10th, and one half part of them both.—In his 8th year he had one 10th and one 15th.

Hume, says sir John Sinclair in his history of the revenue, has stated that all the extraordinary supplies, granted by parl. during the course of Henry's reign, amounted only to seven 10ths and 15ths (about 203,000*l.*;) and he mentions, at the same time, that Henry's army amounted to 6000 horse, whose pay was 2*s.* a day; and 24,000 archers, who received 6*d.* per day each. The expences of such an army, therefore, must have amounted to 430,000*l.* per ann.; and consequently all Henry's grants, joined together, would have been exhausted in less than six months. But, in the first place, the grants given to Henry were greater than this historian states; and, in addition to them, he received considerable assistance from the clergy, and the entire revenues of 110 monasteries in England, dependent on certain abbies in Normandy, which the English clergy had sacrificed for the security of their own possessions. There is also reason to believe, that historians have fallen into an error with regard to Henry's annual income, which is said to have amounted only to 55,754*l.* 10*s.* 10½*d.*—The record on which this idea of Henry's revenue is founded may be seen in Rymer, Vol. X. p. 113. It is not a little defective; but its omissions may be supplied, from the full and particular account of the income of the crown, which was laid before parl. anno 1433. From a comparison of the two records, the following statement is drawn up:

Amount of Henry V.'s annual Income.

1. Parva custuma on wool	£. 3,976	1	2
2. Magna custuma on ditto	- 26,035	18	3½
3. Parva custuma on goods	- 2,438	9	1½
4. Subsidy of tunnage and poundage	- - - -	8,237	10 9½

£. 40,687 19 9¼

5. Casual revenue, arising from escheats, court of wards, &c.	- - - -	15,066	11 1
---	---------	--------	------

Total, according to Rymer £. 55,754 10 10½

To be added:

1. Fee farm rents	- - - -	£. 3,612	11 3
2. Alien priories	- - - -	277	5 0
3. Duchy of Cornwall	- - - -	2,788	13 3
4. South Wales	- - - -	1,139	13 11
5. North Wales	- - - -	1,097	17 3
6. County of Chester	- - - -	764	10 2
7. Manor of Shotswick	- - - -	33	6 8
8. Ireland	- - - -	2,339	18 6
9. Duchy of Lancaster	- - - -	4,952	13 3
10. Duchy of Aquitaine	- - - -	803	2 2
11. Profits of Calais	- - - -	2,366	1 0½
12. Revenue of Windsor	- - - -	207	18 5

£. 76,643 1 8½

Many of these articles, and the alien priories in particular, must have yielded more in the reign of Henry V. For it appears, that in his son's minority, the management of revenue, and of public affairs in general, was miserably neglected; and, on the whole, it is probable, that this monarch's income might amount to about 80,000*l.* per ann. equal to 160,000 lb. of silver, which, by the cheapness of provisions at that time, would be equivalent to 500,000*l.* of our present specie. It is said, that Henry V. was the first monarch, who had the subsidies on the exportation of wool and leather, and the duties of tunnage and poundage, joined together, granted him for life. But Forster remarks, though the fact is true, yet that Coke, and other eminent lawyers, are mistaken in the roll, which is commonly adduced in proof of that assertion.

Price of Provisions in the Reign of Henry V.

Our historians are very deficient in noting the prices of provisions in this reign. Fabian however tells us, that in 1416, wheat was so dear as to be sold for 16*s.* a quarter; and that in 1422, it sold for 8*s.* and malt at 5*s.* A ram sold also for 8*d.*

HENRY VI.

A Parl. called.] Henry VI. was an infant of about nine months old when he began his reign. In 1422, writs of summons were issued out, in the young king's name, dated Sept. 29, for a parl. to meet on the Monday next after the feast of st. Martin, at Westminster. And, on the same day, before any other business was begun, a commission directed to Humphrey duke of Gloucester, the king's uncle, empowering him to begin the parl. was read, in the presence of the said duke, sitting in the Painted Chamber, and before the lords and commons assembled. After which Henry Chicheley, abp. of Canterbury, by command of the said duke, the king's commissioner, declared the cause of calling the said parl. and took for his theme, 'principes populorum congregati sunt cum Deo.'—In discoursing on which words he observed, "That God of his great mercy had left issue unto them of the most victorious prince Henry, begotten of the royal blood of France, whereby the same issue was now become king of France. That, as all perfections were comprised within the number 6, since God had made all things in 6 days, so his divine maj. was to accomplish the good beginnings of the famous 5th Henry, in the 6th Henry his son; who would that all estates and persons should enjoy their full liberties." He then declared, "That, considering the king's tender age, this parl. was called for 3 causes; the 1st for the good governance of the king's person; the 2nd for preserving the peace; the 3rd for the sure defence of the realm. But, that it principally imported them to provide some honourable and discreet persons for the governance aforesaid, in which they all ought to give their best advice. He desired them in this to follow the counsel, which Jethro gave to Moses in Exodus, viz. such as feared God, wise, religious, hating covetousness, puissant, &c." And then concluded with desiring the commons to chuse a Speaker, and present him next day to the duke.

Roger Flower, esq. a 4th time chosen Speaker.] Receivers and triers of petitions being appointed for England, Ireland, Wales, and Scotland, with Gascoigny, other foreign parts, and the isles; on Tuesday being the 2nd day of the parl. the commons presented Roger Flower, esq. to the duke and lords for their Speaker; who, with the usual protestation, was allowed.

The two bps. of Durham and London, the former having been chanc. of England in the late reign, and the other chanc. of the dutchy of Normandy, who had both delivered the several seals of their offices to the duke of Gloucester, prayed to be discharged by act of parl. and that the same might be enrolled, which was granted. It was then also enacted, that the king's stile and titles should be changed, and that upon all his seals should be engraven this motto, "Henricus rex Franciæ, & Angliæ, & dominus Hiberniæ."—At the request of the commons, the duke of Gloucester declared to them, that the king had appointed the bp. of Durham to be his chancellor; Wm. Rindrofe, treasurer of England; and John

Stafford to be keeper of the privy seal; for all which offices their patents were made, and confirmed by parl.

A Protector appointed.] The king, by his letters patent, confirmed also by parl. appointed John duke of Bedford protector and defender of the realm and church of England, and chief counsellor to the king; but because the said duke was then beyond the seas, it was enacted, "That during his absence Humphrey duke of Gloucester should supply the said office; which said duke took upon him the dignity aforesaid, under a protestation that it should be no prejudice to the right of his brother." And it was also enacted, "That the protectors shall, during the king's minority, dispose of all the offices of the forests, keepers of parks, and warrens; and that all benefices in the king's gift, being above the value of 20 marks, should continue in their disposal during their lives." And it is likewise said, that the protector's salary was settled then at 8000 marks a year. The parl. also appointed governors to take care of the king's person and education, who were Tho. Beaufort duke of Exeter, and Henry his brother bp. of Winchester, both great uncles to the king.

And it was then enacted, "That all estates should have their liberties confirmed, which have not been revoked, without the word 'concedimus' to be in any of the said confirmations; and that all writs, commissions and dependants of the same, made by the king's council, relating to this parl. be confirmed by the authority of the same.—And whereas the late king Henry V. constituted and appointed Hy. lord Fitzhugh, Walter Hungerford, Walter Beauchamp, Lewis Robsart, Wm. Porter, Rob. Babthorpe, John Woodhouse, and John Leventhorpe, esqrs, executors of his last will and testament, the king granteth now to them 40,000 marks for the performance of the said will. Nineteen marks due to the executors of Henry IV. by oversight of the supervisors of the said will from the duke of Gloucester, and other lords there named."

A subsidy granted.] "The commons, with the assent of the bps. and lords, grant to the king the same subsidy on woollen or staple-wares, tunnage and poundage as formerly, for two years to come."—And it was, also, enacted, "That all such Petitions as are not determined in this parl. shall be referred to the king's council to be concluded according to their discretion. Also, certain bps. and lords, and others were then named to be counsellors and assistants to the lord protector in the governance aforesaid. And, that all justices of peace, sheriffs, escheators, collectors of the customs, comptrollers, weighers, searchers and other officers be placed, or displaced, at their determination. That these counsellors may have the advantage of all manner of wards, marriages, farms, and other casualties of the crown. And that nothing be ordained in council but by 6 at the least, or more; and, in all great causes, by all, or the greatest part of them; and, when the king is to be conferred withal, that nothing be done without the assents of the dukes of Bedford and Gloucester. That the treasurer of England and the 2 chamberlains of the exchequer may have each of them a key to the king's Receipt; but that they be sworn in council, to make none privy thereto but the members thereof. That the clerks of the council be sworn to take down duly the names of such of the counsellors as attend, and to register truly all their ordinances." All which articles were enacted and confirmed by parl.; with a proviso, "That all such officers, as held the same for life, or otherwise, may be allowed to appoint deputies, any of these articles notwithstanding." These excellent rules and ordinances being ratified in parl. all possible care was taken for the good governance of the realm, during the king's minority.

Several good Laws passed.] Several wise laws were also passed in this parl. for the titles of which we refer to the list given at the end of this reign.

A Parl. called.] In 1423 another parl. was called by writs, dated Sept. the 1st. returnable on the 20th of Oct. following. It is remarkable, that a much smaller number of peers were summoned to this and the last parl. than usual; from whence we conclude, that the greatest part of the English nobility, were, at that time, engaged abroad, as governors of some conquered city, town, or fortress; or otherwise withheld by some important post in the army. The following is a list of the

Humphry, duke of Gloucester	Richard, lord Strange
Henry, earl of Northumberland	Robert, lord Poynings
Ralph, earl of Westmoreland	William ld. Bottreaux
Tho. lord De la Warr	Thomas, lord Dacre of Gilsland
William, lord Ferrers of Groby	William, lord Clinton
John, lord Welles	Wm. lord Harrington
John, lord Graystock	Thomas, earl Marshal
Reginald, lord Grey of Ruthin	Edm. earl of March
John, lord Latymer	Thomas, d. of Exeter
	Rich. earl of Warwick
	James, lord Audley
	Richard, ld. Cromwell
	Henry, ld. Fitz-Hugh

On the day of the meeting of this parl. a commission was again read to constitute the duke of Gloucester lord president; and, by his command, the bp. of Durham, lord chanc. opened the cause of the summons, with this text: 'Deum timete, regem honorificate.' On these words he argued, "That we ought to fear God, even, with a child-like fear; 'quoniam qui timet Deum, diligit eum, et tunc illuminabitur cor ejus.' And that the king ought to be honoured, since now this realm had attained their wish; which was, that the king of England might also be king of France. And since this great undertaking was brought about by the labour and conquests of their present king's father, they ought to honour him equally for it; for Omnis qui diligit eum qui genuit, diligit eum qui natus est: that all the lords of the council, appointed by the last parl. for the regency, and for the due observation of the peace, during the king's minority, were assembled; in order to take the advice and consent of parl. towards perfecting the same." Then, he desired the commons to chuse their Speaker and present him to the duke, the king's commissioner in this parl.

John Russel, esq. chosen Speaker.] The receivers and tryers of petitions being appointed, the commons presented John Russel, esq. as their Speaker, who with the usual protestation was allowed.—A committee of the commons were appointed to wait upon the duke of Gloucester, and to give him their hearty thanks for vouchsafing to communicate to them the treaty with the Scottish ambassador, for the delivery and marriage of James king of Scotland, which they greatly approved of.—An ordinance was made. "That the mint-master in the tower shall keep the exchange, allowed him by the last parl. during the king's pleasure." And, it was enacted, at the Petition of the northern counties, "that a coinage should be at York, during the king's pleasure; and that all persons do bring in their gold, there to be new coined, which is not of full weight."

Orders relating to payment of the late King's debts.] On the 17th of Dec. on account of the approaching festival, an adjournment took place to the 15th of Jan. 1424. On the day prefixed being again assembled, the first thing worth notice that they went upon was, "That on the Petition of the executors of the last will of Henry IV. the king had by his letters patents assigned the payment of 40,000 marks to the executors of Henry V. to the end that the last executors should pay the first, and, also, discharge the will of Henry V. which letters patents were confirmed by parl. The said executors prayed, that they might have the jewels, plate, and goods of the said king Henry V. to the value of 40,000 marks, which was granted. And that the said executors shall have all the wards, marriages, goods, debts and chattels, which were the said king's for the payment of his debts." But then it was enacted, "That the executors of both the late kings shall pay all their debts; as well those due by talley as by debentures." At the same time an act was passed, "To secure those persons who had only the late king's jewels in pawn, and that they should not be obliged to deliver the same till their debts were paid. And that the bp. of Winchester, who lent the king 20,000 marks on the crown, should have letters patents to receive the said sum out of the customs."—The bp. of Durham, executor to Henry Bowett late abp. of York, and others, petitioned the parl. "to order the payment of 900l. lent to Henry V. on a Tabernacle of gold, once belonging to the duke of Lancaster; and to be discharged from the said executors on the delivery of the said tabernacle; which, by common assent, was confirmed." On the petition of Katherine queen of England, a new dower was assigned her, instead of the other granted by the last parl. it being, in many places, found faulty and erroneous.—Lastly, John Stafford, treasurer of England, by his petition, prayed, that the schedule, indented, made between him and the executors of Henry V., relating to the goods of the said king, delivered to the said executors, to the value of 40,000 marks, might be confirmed by parl. and he be discharged thereof; which was granted."

The Scotch King released, and a Peace concluded.] James, king of Scotland, having been a prisoner in England ever since the reign of Henry IV. it was now thought, that if he were set at liberty, a firm and lasting peace might be established between the two nations. And lest the obligation should be too soon forgot, it was also proposed to give him to wife Jane, daughter to John duke of Somerset, and cousin-german to the young king. Accordingly, by letters patents, directed to certain bps. and others, a treaty was set on foot at Durham, between the commissioners of both nations; and the said letters patents were not only confirmed by this parl. but the power to deliver up the king of Scots, on the conditions agreed on, was also ratified by them. The Scotch king was released from his captivity of 18 years, and married to the lady, with whom he had a large dower, besides many gifts of plate and jewels, which her kindred of the nobility presented them with. At his departure he was also induced to take an oath of friendship and fidelity, say some; or as other historians write, did homage to the young king of England at his castle of Windsor; wherein he owned that he held and claimed his kingdom under a superior lord. The oath was in these words: "I, James Stewart, king of Scotland, shall be true and faithful unto you, lord Henry, by the grace of God, king of England and France, the noble and superior lord of the kingdom of Scotland, which I hold and claim of you. And I shall bear you my faith and fidelity of life and limb, and worldly honour, against all men; and faithfully I shall acknowledge and do you service due for the kingdom of Scotland aforesaid; so help me God, and these holy Evangelists." See Hollingshead's Chron. p. 587.

Petitions.] On the petition of Joan, queen of England, wife to Henry IV. the king, by consent of parl. restored to her all her dower, and the arrears of the same, with all her goods that were taken from her.—At the petition of the master and Brethren of the hospital of st. Leonard's in York, it was enacted, "That they should enjoy all their threaves of corn, within the counties of York, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Lancashire; and that they may recover the same by an action of debt or detinue." This statute was made remarkable, by being the first occasion of a great revolution which happened some years after.—It was enacted, "That if any person should carry out of the realm any staple-ware, from the staple of Calais, uncustomed, he shall forfeit the same, and make fine and ransom at the king's pleasure. Also, that no licence be granted to any person to transport any slight looms out of Hampshire, Kent, Sussex, and York, but only to Calais." But this last was only to continue to the next parl.

Two foreign Ladies naturalized.] Two foreign ladies of quality, who had been married, one to the duke of Bedford, and the other to the duke of Gloucester, were naturalized this parl. The former was Ann, sister to Philip duke of Burgundy, and wife to John duke of Bedford, regent of France; the latter was Jacqueline, sole daughter and heiress to Wm. duke of Bavaria, who was married to Humphrey duke of Gloucester. This princess, by her father's death, had the govt. of the earldoms of Hainault and Holland, two large and populous countries, descended to her; and, though married to John duke of Brabant, yet, on pretence that her husband was too nearly related to her before marriage, or, as others say, for his unkind usage of her, she left him and came into England, where she soon after became duke Humphrey's wife, to the great displeasure of her former husband, and the ruin of the English interest in France.

An ex post facto Act against sir John Mortimer.] Sir John Mortimer, of Bishop's Hatfield, Hertford, having been indicted on the oath of one King, servant to sir Rob. Scot, keeper of the Tower of London, upon the Statute of Escapes; an act was made this parl. on purpose to destroy him, alledging several other articles against him. As, 1st, that the said sir John had contrived with him to break out of his imprisonment, and had promised him immediately a reward of 40l. a year, to be aiding and assisting to him in his escape; and afterwards an earldom. 2nd, that the said sir John told him, that after his escape he would go into Wales to the earl of March; and, having raised 40,000 men, would enter the kingdom again, and cut off the heads of the protector and the bp. of Winchester.—3rd, he had told this informant, that the earl of March was rightful heir to the crown of England, and that after him he was the next heir; wherefore, if the earl of March refused to recover his right, he himself would take upon him the regal power as his due.—Lastly, that when he came into Wales, if the earl of March would not accept his service, nor engage in the cause, he would then fly into France, and assist the French king against Henry, and did not doubt but in the end he should gain his design.—It appears by the Record, that this sir John Mortimer had been committed prisoner to the tower, for suspicion of treason done against the late king, from whence he had made his escape the first year of this reign. For which escape alone, we suppose, he was indicted, and this indictment, by the authority of parl. was allowed to be good; and the said

sir John being again apprehended and brought before this parl. judgment was given against him, to be carried back to the tower, and drawn from thence to Tyburn, there to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; his head set on London bridge, and his four quarters on the four gates of the city.

A Subsidy granted.] On the 18th of Feb. this parl. granted the king the same subsidy on tonnage and poundage as in the last. It was also enacted, that merchant-strangers shall only pay 43s. and 4d. duty on every sack of wool, notwithstanding the grant made in the 7th year of the last reign.

The Protector's power reduced by Parl.]—They next appointed and named the bps. and lords, with other persons that were to be of the king's council. All which persons took upon them to act, on certain rules and articles assigned them, far stricter than the last, and very derogatory to the power of the protector.

A Parl. called. The infant King carried to the house.] The French war was still carried on by the regent against the dauphin with various success; whilst the Protector thought fit to call another parl. The writs were dated the 24th of Feb. 1425, and returnable at Westminster the 31st of April. The Protector and Council thought it necessary, in order to engage both lords and commons more zealously in their interests, to bring the infant king into the house; and accordingly, on the day of their meeting, he was carried through the city, on a great horse, to Westminster. The people flocked in great multitudes to behold him; and imagining that they could discern the features and virtues of his father to be transplanted into him by nature, they loaded him with loud acclamations and hearty wishes of a long and happy life. Being come to the palace, he was from thence conducted to the house of lords, and sat on his mother's knee in the throne. "It was a strange sight," says Speed, "and the first time it ever was seen in England, an infant sitting in his mother's lap, and before it could tell what English meant, to exercise the place of sovereign direction in open parl." The commons being called,

The bp. of Winchester, then lord chancellor opened the cause of the summons in manner following:—For the head of his discourse he chose these words, Gloria, honor, et pax, omni operanti bonum; this he divided into three branches, viz. bonum honestum, which consisted in the due obedience of the subject; bonum delectabile, which was giving good council; and bonum utile, which was the free and willing relief they owed to their prince and commonwealth. By the 1st, he argued that God was most glorified; by the 2nd, the prince best honoured; by the 3rd, the subject's safety better guarded. According to the saying in st. Luke, 'Gloria in excelsis Deo, in terra pax, et hominibus bona voluntas.' Glory is given to God by due obedience in the subjects; the prince is honoured by having sound advice given him; and the subjects governed in peace by relieving their prince. And in this he affirmed that princes ought to be obeyed though they were evil; according to the command of st. Peter, 'obedite praepositis;' for although they were not good in themselves, yet, as they commanded many good things to be observed, they ought to be obeyed; and put them in mind that, 'Sicut princeps tenetur regere regaliter, sic plebs obedire.'—On his second division, relating to sound Counsel, he urged this text, 'Salus ubi multa consilia,' and told them that an elephant had three properties, the one, in that he wanted a gall; the 2nd for that he was inflexible and could not bow; and the 3rd, in that he was of a most sound and perfect memory; all which properties he wished might be in all Counsellors. That for their wanting a gall, they might be thereby free from all malice, rancour and envy; by being inflexible, that they should not stoop to any reward, nor in judgment respect any person; and of a sound memory, that they by calling to mind dangers past, might prevent perils to come.—His last topic, for the relief of the king; he urged that it ought to be done with all readiness of mind, considering that God, by the young prince, his chosen vessel, there before them, had not only governed them in safety, but had also given to them many honourable victories and great conquests; all which ought to enforce them more willingly to offer, that their grants should be more readily taken. Lastly, he desired the Commons to go together and chuse their Speaker and present him the next day.

Sir T. Nanton elected Speaker.] Accordingly, they presented sir Thomas Nanton, knt. for their Speaker, before the king and lords, whose excuse being not allowed, he, with the usual protestation, was accepted of.

The Commons consulted in a Case of Precedency in Peerage.] But the business of this session was much interrupted by a quarrel between two great men about a right of precedency. John Mowbray, earl marshal, and Rd. Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, were the two antagonists; and each laid claim to the higher place in the parliament-house. They were, however, commanded not to come to the house till the matter between them was fully heard; and learned counsel was allowed them to plead and speak to their respective claims. The duke of Gloucester, as protector, with the bishops and the rest of the peers, sat as judges; and they, with the members of the lower house, were all sworn to give upright judgment in the cause, without favour or affection.—Sir R. Cotton has taken pains to extract, from the record, the substance of the pleas on both sides; which is prefixed to his account of the proceedings of this parl.—The counsel for both these earls having finished their pleas and demanded judgment; it might perhaps have perplexed the ministry how to please them both, but, that a method was devised to do it effectually. The earl marshal had been privately required to put in his claim for being restored to the title of duke of Norfolk; according to the creation of Thomas his father, and as brother and heir to Thomas, who died without issue, son of the said Thomas his father; which claim, when it was publicly made, was, for several reasons, granted and confirmed by parl. And thereby the Precedency was placed out of the reach of dispute.

A Subsidy granted.] In this parl. the former subsidy on wools was granted for 3 years longer; and tonnage and poundage for 1 year; upon condition, that foreign merchants should be strictly looked to for their duties.

Petitions.] On Petition of Ann, late wife to Edmund earl of March and Ulster, it was ordained that the said Ann should have livery of her dower, on finding of any offices after the death of the said earl, and upon her oath not to marry. That part relating to the offices we do not understand; but this lady was the widow of the said earl of March; and dying without issue, he left his honour and estate to R. Plantagenet, earl of Cambridge, his sister's son; who, being thereby heir to Lionel duke of Clarence, first began the Contest, between the two houses, for the crown of England.—A petition of the commons was exhibited this parl. "That all parsons, vicars, and others, having cures, and not resident upon them, may forfeit their benefices; one half to the king and the other half to the patron." Answer. The king hath commanded the abp. of Canterbury and York to provide a remedy.—There are several other matters relating to more private affairs, in the abridgment, which we shall pass over; and only mention one which has a more public concern, and which Cotton hath given us in these words:—"It is enacted, that the quarrel and combat, betwixt the duke of Gloucester and the duke of Burgundy, do in no case proceed; but that the same by the king's letters patents be committed to the old French king, the king's mother, and the regent of France; and that the duke of Burgundy do deliver into indifferent hands the person of my lord of Gloucester."

Several acts passed for the benefit of the Nation.] In this parl. there were several acts passed for the public benefit. The chief of which are: I. Against the exportation of sheep beyond sea, without the king's licence; because by carrying of sheep into Flanders, and other parts, the wool of England would at length become of little value, and the woollen manufacture of the nation be greatly diminished. To remedy this, they laid on a heavy tax of 43s. a sack upon exported wools, which was 10s. more than ever was paid before for the like quantity.—II. For the exportation of butter and cheese, to encourage husbandry; giving the chanc. of England leave to grant licences, at his discretion, to such persons as shall desire to vend the said articles in foreign parts, as well as at the great staple at Calais.—III. That all merchant strangers, within 15 days after they are landed, in any port of this kingdom, shall take lodgings or other habitations, in the town or place where the port is, under some Englishmen; and shall not make any sale of any goods or merchandize till they are so settled; and then shall sell all their merchandize within 40 days next ensuing; and if any goods remain unsold after that time they shall be forfeited to the king's use. This act was intended for a double benefit; first, that the king might not be defrauded of his customs; and next, that strangers might not by keeping of their goods and merchandizes, understand the wants of the nation and so raise the prices.

Quarrel between the Lord Protector, and the bp. of Winchester referred to Parl.] About this time it was, that a dangerous quarrel was set on foot between two very great men, both chief supporters to the house of Lancaster, Humphrey lord protector, and Henry Beaufort, the rich bp. of Winchester, great uncle to the king. The latter of these, by his magnificence and grandeur, seemed so much to out-shine the Protector himself, though almost on the throne, that he drew on him the odium and jealousy of the other. The haughty spirit of the bp. being legate to the pope in England, was so great, that the Protector could not endure his pride; and such an implacable enmity grew between them, that great parties were raised, on both sides, for each other's defence. In short, a civil war it was much dreaded would be the consequence; and, all their mutual friends could do, was not sufficient to pacify the mind of the Protector, or to make the Prelate yield any further, than, as he thought, was becoming his high place and state. In this situation the bp. however, thought proper to write a letter to the duke of Bedford, regent of France, to come over and endeavour to heal matters between them. The duke came accordingly, and calling a council of the chief nobility at st. Albans, many hot contests arose; and, nothing being concluded at that time, it was adjourned to Northampton, but to as little purpose; till, at last, it was determined, that these differences should be referred to parl.

A Parl. called.] Accordingly, writs of summons were issued out, dated Westminster, Jan. 7, 1426, for one to meet, at Leicester, on the 18th of Feb. At which time and place being assembled, in the great hall of the castle of Leicester, much care had been taken to prevent any tumults between the great trains of the protector and the bishop, by strictly prohibiting any person whatsoever, to come thither with swords or any other warlike weapon. Which order, though it was literally observed, yet the lords and their attendants came armed with batts, or great clubs, on their shoulders; from whence this meeting got the name of the "Parliament of Bats;" but this, also, as soon as it was taken notice of, was prohibited. Being all, at length, sat in a peaceable manner, as aforesaid, the young king being there, also, present, the bp. of Winchester, as ld. chanc. of England, declared the cause of the summons, in a very short manner; for, after telling them that the king's will was, that all estates should enjoy their liberties, he took his subject from these words of st. Paul: Sic facite ut salvi sitis. These the learned prelate divided into 3 parts, and referred them: 'First to God, for protecting the faith of the church, against all invasions from lollards and heretics; 2dly, by imparting sound counsel; and, lastly, by granting the several needful subsidies. By which, he affirmed, three virtues and conveniences would follow, viz. glory to God, by protecting his faith; honour to the king, by receiving good advice; and peace to the subject, by their liberal grants. In all which he desired, that every estate of this parl. would labour; and that the commons would chuse, and the next day present, their Speaker.'

Sir R. Vernon chosen Speaker.] The king's letters patents were read, whereby he appointed John duke of Bedford his commissioner, to prorogue and dissolve this parl. at his pleasure. The same day the commons presented, before the king, sir Rd. Vernon, knight, to be their Speaker; who, with the common protestation, was allowed.

The Lord Protector and the bp. of Winchester reconciled.] Then the commons expressed their great dislike to the dissensions between duke Humphrey and the bp. of Winchester, and moved for their reconciliation. On which, the duke of Bedford, some bps. and other lords, made a solemn decree amongst themselves, to hear and determine the said difference, without favour or affection. Which order, after every one of the lords had sworn to observe, they sent a copy of it to the commons. They then proceeded in the matter, and, at length, caused the said duke and bp. by their formal instruments, to have their disputes compromised, and referred to the decision of a select committee of certain bps. and lords; who, after some time, came to this resolution: first, that the said bp. of Winchester should submit himself to the king's mercy; which he did accordingly. And, then the duke of Bedford, in open parl. pronounced the said bp. innocent of what was alledged against him, in that he procured a person to murder the late king, when he was prince, as the murderer himself confessed who was drowned by the earl of Arundel. And, also, in that he should counsel and advise the said prince to have deposed Henry IV. his father. Likewise, it was awarded by the said committee, that the bp. should acknowledge his offence to the duke of Gloucester, and, in a submissive manner, ask his pardon; that the said duke should freely forgive him; and, in token of a thorough reconciliation, each should take the other by the hand, which was accordingly done before the whole assembly. Some time after the bp. of Winchester petitioned the parl. to be discharged of the great seal, as chancellor, which, by common consent, was granted.

This is all the account which sir R. Cotton has thought fit to extract, relating to this strong contention between these two noblemen; who, though so nearly related as uncle and nephew, yet still carried on that implacable malice against each other, which ended not but in the death of one or both of them. However, the chronicles of Hall and Hollingshead are not so silent in this matter; they tell us, that when the affair of the quarrel was brought before the parl. and each party allowed to plead his cause freely, the Protector, who looked upon himself as the person aggrieved, exhibited five Articles against the Bishop, to all which he was urged to give in his Answer. Which Articles and Answers are as follow:

Articles of Accusation presented to the Parl. bp. the Duke of Gloucester, against Henry, Bishop of Winchester, with his Answers to them severally.

I. That Rd. Woodvile, esq. keeper of the tower of London, did by the instigation and encouragement of the said bp. of Winchester, deny admittance to him the said duke of Gloucester, then being Protector of the kingdom, into the tower, contrary to reason and duty, and in derogation to the king's authority.—To this Article the bp. answered, "That while the d. of Gloucester was gone into Hainault, it happened that many pamphlets and reports being dispersed up and down the city of London tending to rebellion, it was ordered by the lords of his majesty's council, that Rd. Woodvile, esq. should with a sufficient number of armed men have the keeping of the tower, and should not permit any man to come into the tower stronger than himself, without the special commandment of the king, by the advice of his council. After this strict charge the d. of Gloucester returning out of Hainault, and not approving the fortifying the tower, told the citizens, who were dissatisfied at it, 'That had he been in England it should not have been so;' and immediately going to the tower demanded admittance, but Woodvile, not daring to give him entrance, came to the bp. of Winchester for advice, who told him, 'that the duke of Gloucester took more upon him than he ought, and that before he admitted him into the tower, he ought to provide himself a sufficient warrant of the king and council for his so doing contrary to the former order.'—II. That the bp. of Winchester, without the advice or consent of the d. of Gloucester, or of his majesty's Privy Council, contrived and purposed to lay hands on his majesty's person, and to have removed him from Eltham, the place that he was then in, to Windsor, there to put him under the govt. of such persons as he pleased.—The bp.'s Answer to this Article was, "That he never could propound to himself any advantage by removing the king, or taking him into his custody or charge, nor did ever intend to meddle with any thing about the king's person without the advice of the privy council, as in time and place he could prove."

III. That the bp. of Winchester knowing that the d. of Gloucester had resolved to prevent his design of seizing the king's person at Eltham, laid wait for him, by placing armed men at the end of London-bridge, and in the windows of the chambers and cellars in Southwark, to have killed him, if he had passed that way; all which is against the king's peace, and duty of a true subject.—The bp.'s defence was, "That true indeed it is, that he did provide a certain number of armed men, and set them at the foot of London-bridge, and other places, without any intention to do any bodily harm to the d. of Gloucester, but merely for his own safety and defence, being informed by several credible persons, that the d. of Gloucester had purposed bodily harm to him, and gathered together a company of citizens for that end."—IV. That the late king Henry V. told him, that when he was prince, a man was seized in his chamber, who was hid behind the hangings, and confessed after his apprehension, that he was set at work by the bp. of Winchester, to kill the prince in his bed. He was delivered to the earl of Arundel, who drowned him in a sack in the Thames.—To this accusation the bp. replied, "That he was ever a true and faithful subject to his sovereigns, and never purposed or contrived any treason against any of their persons, and especially against his sovereign lord Henry V. And this he thought was sufficiently evident to any, that considered the great wisdom and courage of the said king, and the great trust he reposed in him so long as he remained king, which he would not have done had he found him guilty of such unfaithfulness to him while he was prince."—V. That the bp. of Winchester in the sickness of k. Henry IV. advised his son prince Henry, to assume the govt. of the nation before his father's death, as the said prince himself told him.—The bp. replied, "That this was mere calumny, which could not be proved; and he hoped the parl. would appoint them judges, that he might vindicate his honour, or else leave him to sue out his right before suitable judges."—VI. That the bp. of Winchester had, in his letter to the duke of Bedford, plainly declared his malicious purpose of assembling the people, and stirring up a rebellion in the nation, contrary to the king's peace.—The bishop's answer was, "That he never had any intention to disturb the peace of the nation, or raise any rebellion, but sent to the duke of Bedford to come over in haste to settle all things that were prejudicial to the peace; and though he had indeed written in the letter, 'That if he tarried, we shall put the land in adventure by a field, such a brother you have here;' he did not mean it of any design of his own, but concerning the seditious assemblies of masons, carpenters, tilers and plaisterers, who being distasted by the late act of parl. against excessive wages of those trades, had given out many seditious speeches and menaces against the great men, which tended much to rebellion; and yet the duke of Gloucester did not use his endeavour, as he ought to have done in his place, to suppress such unlawful assemblies, so that he feared the king and his good subjects must have made a field to withstand them: to prevent which, he chiefly desired the duke of Bedford to come over."

This charge, and the answers to it, being thus delivered into the parl. the further examination of it was by the houses devolved upon a select number of lords, who having thoroughly examined all matters, acquitted the bp. and by a formal award enjoined them to be firm friends for the future; and by such inducements wrought upon them, that they shook hands, and parted with all outward signs of perfect love and agreement, which gave a mighty satisfaction to all people, both of the clergy and laity. And the king, by the advice of his council, made a magnificent feast at Whitsuntide, to rejoice for this happy reconciliation. After this the parl. sat till June the 15th; but did nothing more than raise a supply of men and money to carry on the conquest of France, which were gathered out of the great cities and towns of the kingdom chiefly.

A Parl. called.] A fresh supply being much wanted for the war, writs of summons were issued for calling a parl. to meet at Westminster, Oct. 14th, 1428. When being all assembled before the king, in the Painted Chamber of the palace, John Kempe, abp. of York, then chancellor, opened the cause of the summons, taking for his text these words, out of Macca-bees, 'Sine providentia regali impossibile est passem regibus dare,' from which he deduced two heads of discourse. The 1st was the duty of the prince towards his subjects; and the other the duty of the subjects to their prince. The 1st of these he again subdivided into 3 other points belonging to it; that the subjects should be defended from any foreign invasion; that justice should be indifferently administered; and that peace should be kept within the realm. Three things, he said, also belonged to the subjects; 1st, that they should grant large supplies for their better defence in time of war; in peace, that they would readily obey their magistrates, and meekly to submit themselves to the known laws of the land. All which the better to accomplish, the king had called this parl. and confirmed all their liberties: and that business might be sooner begun and ended, he desired the Commons to make choice of a Speaker, and present him the next day before the king."

John Tyrril, esq. elected Speaker.] Accordingly the commons chose John Tyrril, esq. whose excuse not being allowed, with the usual protestation, he was admitted. This parl. is said to have sat, from the date aforesaid, to the 8th of Decr; but no account of any business done at it is given us. By reason of the Christmas holidays, it was then prorogued, by the lord protector, to the 28th of Jan. 1429.

A Subsidy and a Poll-tax granted.] The first thing we find then mentioned is the grant of a large Subsidy, which was 3s. a tun for all wine imported, and 12d. in the pound for all merchandize. Besides this, there was a kind of a Poll-Tax granted, which, though not general, was laid on every parish that was worth 10 marks per an.; 10 of the chiefest parishioners in it were to pay 6s. 8d. a head. And in every parish that was worth 10l. a year, the like number of parishioners were each to pay a mark. In all corporations, it was ordained, that every person, worth above 20s. besides his apparel and household goods, should pay 4d. each to the king; and so proportionably for every 20 they were worth more; by which means this tax raised considerable sums in the cities and boroughs.—Several useful statutes were passed in this parl.; the titles of which will be found in List of Acts given at the end of this reign.

Motion for explaining the Title of Protector.] Although the breach between duke Humphrey and the bp. of Winchester had been in some measure closed by a formal concord and agreement, made publicly in the last parl. yet it was too wide at first, ever to admit of a thorough re-union. The prelate, by his interest, had found means to obtain a cardinal's hat from Rome; and by this elevation in the church thought himself more than equal, in dignity, to the Protector of England. The latter's jealousy, in being eclipsed, occasioned a motion being made, in this parl. to both houses, by himself, for explaining the Title and Power of a Protector, or Defender of the Realm; affirming, that he would not sit in the house till he understood what it was, since, as he said, people spoke differently of it.—This affair was taken into consideration by the king's council and the lords of parl.; and after due deliberation this answer was returned to the duke by them; "That they did not think he had any great right to be Protector, yet to satisfy his desire they were content he should be so, and have such power as was allowed him by parl. in the 1st of this reign. But, that the name of the Protector and Defender imported, only, a personal duty of attendance, in the actual defence of the realm against foreign enemies and inward rebels; and not particular authority, such as properly belongs to tutors, lieutenants, governors or regents, for if they had designed otherwise they then would have expressed it at the time aforesaid. Thus, it was allowed that in council, as principal counsellor, he had pre-eminence; but in parl. he had no claim to any higher place than as duke of Gloucester; so they desired him to be content with his place in parl. and with the other power assigned him, for they should agree to no other determination." This order, or award, was subscribed by all the bps. lords, and others of the king's council there present. Lastly, it was enacted, by consent of parl. that the lords of the king's council should have full power to determine all Petitions not yet ended, with the advice of the judges. And accordingly several bills and petitions were answered and indorsed, by certain lords, named in the record, who met in the Star-Chamber for that purpose.

A female Remonstrance to Parl. against the Duke.] Stowe tells us of an odd affair that he says happened in this parl. which was this: "one mrs. Stokes, with divers other stout women of London, of good account and well apparelled, came openly to the upper house of parl. and delivered letters to the duke of Gloucester, to the abps. and other lords there present, containing matters of rebuke and sharp reprehension to the said duke of Gloucester, because he would not deliver his wife Jacqueline out of her grievous imprisonment, being then detained prisoner by the duke of Burgundy, and suffering her there to remain unkindly, whilst he kept another adulteress, contrary to the law of God and the honourable estate of matrimony." But what good success this virtuous remonstrance from the ladies met with, our author is silent.

A Parl. called.] Another parl. was summoned to meet at Westminster, on the 22nd of Sept. 1429; and being all assembled, the king himself sitting in the chair of state, in the Painted Chamber, John abp. of York, lord chanc. opened the cause of this summons, under these words of st. Luke, 'quomodo stabit regnum,' &c. From which text he argued, "That in the realm of England, 3 causes were to be noted which hindered its advancement: 1st, want of faith was the root of all vice, 'eo quod sine fide impossibile est placere Deo'; the 2nd, want of fear, which was the chief in every good mind, 'nam qui nihil timet, negliget'; and lastly, the want of upright justice, the pillar of every kingdom; for, 'ex justitia sequitur pax, et ex pace rerum abundantia maxime procreatur.' Instead of these 3 virtues, 3 abominable vices were sprung up; namely, infidelity, by errors and heresies; obstinacy, instead of fear; and oppression in the place of justice. Through infidelity, the late troubles in Germany, and the destruction of the kingdom of Bohemia, had happened. Fear, he again divided in two parts; the one spiritual and virtuous, as fearing God, and man for God; the other carnal and vicious, from whence sprung murmurs and rebellion, which would procure such destruction as happened to Dathan and Abiram. From oppression ensued the transferring of kingdoms, according to the wise man, 'regnum alienum in regnum transfertur propter injustitias et injurias.' But that if true faith, due fear, and strict justice was restored, there was then no doubt but this would be a flourishing kingdom. He concluded, that as the prince was bound to defend the subjects, and to keep peace, so ought the subjects to grant largely to the prince out of their goods, that he might be enabled to perform the same, to which end the said parl. was called. He then directed the commons to choose their Speaker, and present him as usual."

A Speaker chosen.] The next day the commons came again before the king and lords, when certain of their members informed the house that they had chosen Wm. Allington, esq. to be their Speaker, but desired a respite of two days before they presented him; which being granted, the said Wm. Allington, on the 4th day of the session, made the usual protestation, and was allowed.

The King crowned and the Protectorship dissolved.] During the sitting of this parl. the king, having now entered into the 9th year of his age, it was thought proper to admit him, as it were, into his regal dignity by a coronation. Accordingly, on the 6th of Nov. the ceremony was performed at Westminster, with great solemnity: and very soon after, a motion was made in the house of lords, "That since the king had taken upon him the protection and defence of the realm by his coronation, the name and power of protector and defender, granted to the dukes of Bedford and Gloucester, from the day of the said coronation, should utterly cease. And that they, the said dukes, should have the name of principal counsellors only, any order to the contrary notwithstanding." Which motion, after some debate, was agreed to by the whole house; and the duke of Bedford standing up, in full parl. did relinquish the said titles, as to his own person, so as that the said release should no way hurt his title as duke of Bedford.

A Subsidy granted.] It was not till the 12th of Dec. that a supply was granted by this parl. of one whole 10th and one 15th, to be levied on the laity; though afterwards, on the 20th of the same month, the Commons, at the special instance and desire of the bp. of Winchester, just then made a cardinal, granted another 10th and a 15th, to be levied as above. They also gave the king a grant of tunnage and poundage, to continue till the next parl. —On the same day the chancellor prorogued the parl. unto Monday next after the feast of st. Hilary next ensuing, on account of the holidays.

The Cardinal in great esteem with the Commons.] Being again assembled, the first thing they did was, to take under consideration the present high estate of the cardinal bp. of Winchester; because that dignity exempted him from being of the king's council, but at his own pleasure. Therefore the rest of the bps. and lords consented to join in an humble request to the said cardinal, that he would vouchsafe to be made one of the council, under a protestation that the said cardinal should absent himself in all affairs and councils of the king, whenever the pope or see of Rome was concerned in them. Which request, so made, the cardinal condescended to grant under the said condition. This high priest was at that time in such estimation also with the commons, that they unanimously joined in a Petition to the king, praying him, that, in consideration of the great and notable services he had done the crown, both under the present king and his father, that he would grant him a full pardon for whatever he had acted contrary to the laws, particularly in regard to the statute of præmunire. This petition was granted; and consequently the cardinal was screened from all prosecutions. Two acts were also passed in the cardinal's favour, at this time, relating to some loans of money he had lent the king on his jewels; which will be mentioned in the sequel.

Authority was given to the king's council to make securities to several creditors of the crown, for the sum of 50,000l. It was also ordained, that the treasurer and victualler of the important town of Calais shall receive a certain quantity of mercantile or staple ware, and other revenues within the said town, for the payment of the garrison there, and the necessary reparations.

Another Subsidy granted.] On the 23d of Feb. this parl. granted the king the same Subsidy on wools as was granted in former parliaments for two years. And at the same time they consented to shorten the payment of the last 10th and 15th, to relieve the pressing necessities of the state.

Articles for the Regulation of the King's Council.] Before they were dissolved they also agreed upon certain articles, 18 in number, for the better regulation of the king's council. All which said articles, every one of the lords of the council, whose names are there specified, promised faithfully to perform. Cotton has made but two observations on these Articles; the one, that the dukes of Bedford and Gloucester were accounted no higher in council than as two of the same body; the other, that all such officers, civil or military, who have served the king and his father faithfully, should be first preferred to places and benefices in the king's gift.

Acts relating to Privilege—Weights and Measures—Votes for Knights of the Shire, &c.] Among the acts passed in this parl. the following cannot be omitted in these inquiries.—The 1st was, "That the bps. and the inferior clergy, coming to attend their service in parl. shall have the same privilege, in regard of the protection of their servants, as the peers of the realm.—That every city, borough, and town in the kingdom, shall have at their own charge a common balance and weights, sealed according to the standard of the exchequer, in the keeping of the mayor or constable. At which balance all the inhabitants of the same city or town were to weigh without paying any thing; but strangers were to pay a small premium there specified." It was also enacted, "That whereas knights of the shire had of late been chosen by outrageous and excessive numbers of people, and of small substance; for the future, the said knights shall be elected in every county by people dwelling and resident in the said counties, whereof every one shall have, in lands or tenements, to the value of 40s. by the year, at the least, above all charges; and that they which shall be so chosen shall be dwelling and resident within the said counties.—In the parl. 10th Henry VI. an. 1432, it was declared, "That the said 40s. per ah. must be freehold." This statute is in force at this day; but the difference in the value of money then and now will be best ascertained by the price of provisions near this period.

Petitions and Answers.] Amongst the Petitions there are also some, which, with their answers, deserve our notice.—P. That the statutes, made on all appeals for things done out of the realm, shall be tried before the constable and marshal of England; and that all done within the realm be tried by the laws of the nation. A. The statutes made for that purpose shall be kept.—P. That sheriffs, and such other officers, be not impeached by process out of the exchequer, for things not leviable. A. The king's council shall have power to determine this matter.—P. That all burgesses of parl. may have their writs to the sheriff of the same shire, to levy their fees and wages. A. The king will be advised.—P. That all such soldiers as pass through the realm may pay for their victuals and lodging. A. The king will be advised.—P. That all lands whatsoever do contribute to the payment of knight's fees coming to parl. excepting the lands of bps. peers, and towns who send burgesses. A. The same as before.

Privilege of Parl.] Complaint being made to the commons, that one Wm. Larke, servant to Wm. Mildred, one of the burgesses for London, was committed to the Fleet on an execution of debt; he was immediately discharged by the privilege of the house; and authority given to the chanc. to appoint certain persons, by commission, to apprehend him after the end of the parl.

A Parl. called.] On the 7th of Nov. writs were issued for a parl. to assemble at Westm. on the 12th of Jan. 1431; being met in the Painted Chamber, Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, called now Guardian or Keeper of England, being seated in the chair of state, the commons being also present, commanded Wm. Linwood, doctor of laws, to open the cause of the summons, John Kempe, abp. of York and chanc. being absent by sickness; who took for his theme, 'Firmabitur solium regni ejus.' On this he endeavoured to demonstrate, "That the king and kingdom ought to be established by a three-fold virtue. The 1st, by unity, the 2d, peace, and the 3d, by justice. Unity he subdivided into other 3 parts, viz. 'collectivam,' as in gathering goods together; the other, 'constitutivam,' as in comparing the several members of a man's body; the 3d, 'consentaneam,' as in union of each body mystical, or politic. Peace, was, also, threefold; peace monastical, which every man hath over himself; oeconomic, as relating to the govt. over his household; and political, whereby the good estate of the king is best secured. And, lastly, justice had its 3 parts; the 1st, every subject's due obedience to the magistrates; the 2d, by advising his neighbours and equals; and the last, in relieving the poor. He concluded with observing, that the aforesaid unity was much broke within the kingdom by whisperers and misdoers; from which an utter subversion was like to ensue. That it was the king's full desire that every estate in the realm should enjoy all their just liberties; and prayed the commons to choose their Speaker, and present him the next day to the Guardian."

A Speaker chosen.] The same day the commons made a report of their Speaker, as in the last parl.; and on Jan. 15, they presented John Tyrrel, esq. whose excuse being refused; with the accustomed protestation, he was allowed.

A Subsidy granted.] The first thing that they went upon in this parl. was the supply; and a grant was agreed on, of one 10th and one 15th, and a third of both. They, also, gave tonnage and poundage for two years, with a subsidy of the like value on all merchants, aliens, over and above the said tonnage and poundage. The commons, also, granted to the king 20s. from every layman holding a knight's fee, and according to the value under or over. The same from the clergy for all lands purchased since the 20th Edw. I. And that all other persons having hereditaments to the value of 20l. over all reprises, not held as above, shall, also, pay 20s. and so according to rate. This is another instance of a tax on lands and tenements. It was ordained, that the king's council, and other head officers, should have yearly out of the exchequer, by way of reward, such fees as are there particularly mentioned. And, at the same time authority was given to the king's council, to make securities to the king's creditors, for the loan of 50,000l. as in the last parl. Several acts relating to Bastardy, Executors of Wills, Hindrance of Navigation by the Welch, &c. were passed in this parl. for the titles of which see the list of acts.

A charge of bastardy was alledged against Eleanor the wife of James lord Audley, who claimed the inheritance of Edmund earl of Kent, as being his eldest daughter, and a legitimate issue, or mulier, by Constance his wife; for the proof of which, she had procured a certificate from the ordinary. Against this claim, the other daughters of the said Edmund earl of Kent presented a petition to parl. alledging, that the said Eleanor was a bastard; that her mother Constance, the late wife to Tho. Despenser, was never married to the said earl; and that the said certificate brought from the ordinary, was obtained by fraud. All this being fully proved, in order to prevent such proceedings for the future, an act was made.

Petitions.] The following are the most remarkable petitions presented to this parl.—P. That all outlawries in actions personal, pronounced before the statute of Additions, made the 1st of Hy. V. may be pardoned. A. The king will be advised.—P. That in the writ of forging of false deeds, the 'venire facias' may be of both counties, as well where the land doth lie, as where the writ is brought. A. The same as before.—P. That the statute made 8 Hy. VI. c. 2, touching Denmark, may be utterly void and revoked. A. The king expects to hear from his ambassador at that court; and in the mean time will be advised.—P. The commons of Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and the bishopric of Durham, pray, that the merchants of Newcastle, may, at all times buy, and transport their own wools. A. The king will be advised.—P. That attachments and prohibitions against tythe of great wood, may be granted to every person out of either of the benches. A. The same.—P. That two persons in every hundred of the realm, may by commission, be appointed to search the due making of woollen cloths, and to seal the same, taking 1d. A. The king will be advised.

In consideration of 200l. paid by the merchants of the isle of Ely to certain persons of the county of Cambridge, to buy 20 marks of land by the year; it is enacted, "That the said inhabitants for ever shall be discharged from paying any thing towards the fees of knights of the shire for Cambridgeshire."

A Peace with the Scots.] We have no account how long this parl. sat; but historians tell us, that before the dissolution of it, ambassadors came from James king of Scots to the duke of Gloucester, to desire that a peace might be concluded between the two nations. But the duke, not willing to determine so important a matter, without the consent of the people, referred it to the three estates, who, after long consultation and many debates, settled a peace with them.

A Parl. called.] On the 25th of Feb. 1432, writs of summons were issued out for a parl. to meet at Westminster, the 12th of May following. At which time being assembled, in the usual chamber within the palace, the king himself on the throne, and all the lords and commons attending, John Stafford, bp. of Bath and Wells, then chancellor of England, was commanded to open the cause of the summons; which he did in this manner, taking for his text these words of st. Peter, 'Deum time, regem honorificate.'—On which words he remarked 2 points, the 1st, a general counsel to princes, that they might learn knowledge; to obey and serve God, according to the words of the prophet, 'Nunc reges intelligite, erudimini qui judicatis terram, servite domino, in timore.' The 2nd, a commandment to subjects to learn to obey and honour the prince, according to the saying of the apostle, 'omnis anima sublimioribus potestatibus subdita sit, non enim est potestas, &c. And again, 'Reddite omnibus debita, tributum cui tributum est.' &c. Which points he learnedly enlarged upon, and endeavoured to prove by many examples, authorities, and similitudes, that the king and realm of England might easily attain to the height of peace and prosperity, if true fear of God and honour to the prince were in the hearts of the subjects; wherefore for the attaining thereto, and suppressing such rebels as despised the rights of the church, and would destroy the ministers of the same, was one cause for the calling this assembly. The other was, for the due execution of the laws, which was 'salus cujuslibet civitatis et regni.' And the last was, how to find ways and means to enrich the subjects, who for a long time had lived in great want and penury." He concluded, as usual, with acquainting them, that the king desired that every estate should enjoy its own due liberties; and that the commons should chuse their Speaker, and present him the next day to the king.—On the 2nd day of their sitting, the duke of Gloucester stood up in the house of lords and said, "That he had been informed the commons had made a declaration, that if they could understand the lords of the king's council intended to serve in their station with perfect unity, it would greatly encourage them to do their parts effectually. That he promised, for his part, that although he was chief president of the council, yet he would act nothing without the consent of the majority of them." This declaration of the duke's was, the next day, made to the commons, by the chancellor.

John Russell esq. elected Speaker, and a Subsidy granted.] The day after, the commons presented to the king John Russel, esq. for their Speaker, who, making the usual protestation, was allowed of. They then, with the consent of the lords, granted one 10th and half a 15th; also one year's subsidy on wools, and the same tonnage and poundage, as in the last parl. But the king released the increase of 6d. on every pound, laid then on all merchant strangers.

Another quarrel between Cardinal Beaufort and the d. of Gloucester.] A great complaint was made to the houses, by the cardinal bp. of Winchester, that he being in Flanders, in his way to Rome, was obliged to return back in order to clear himself from a report that had been spread that he was a traitor to the realm; of which the duke of Gloucester, by the king's command, declared him guiltless. But sir R. Cotton here remarks, "that the true reason of the cardinal's sudden return was, that having several of the king's jewels in pawn, he had ordered them to be sent after him; which jewels, by command from the king, or rather the duke of Gloucester, were arrested at Sandwich. This brought the cardinal back in a mighty pother; and it appears by the next article in the record, that an order was taken that the cardinal should pay to the king 6000l. more for them, and lend to him besides 14,000l. which was done accordingly; and then he was allowed to take them, or leave them behind him, at his pleasure. The king also, with the consent of the other estates, granted a pardon for all offences, and for all penalties and pains incurred by him on the statute of 'praemunire;' thus far sir Robert, but Rapin acquaints us that when the jewels the cardinal had in pawn were seized at Sandwich, he was then in Flanders upon the king's affairs; but, on the news of the seizure, he came over in all haste to London, without leave; which gave the duke of Gloucester occasion to seize his baggage. That, on the day after his arrival, he went to the house of lords; and said, he was come to clear himself from the crimes laid to his charge, and vindicate his innocence, against whoever should be his accuser. That the duke of Gloucester not thinking it proper to support what he had advanced, the prelate was answered, that since none appeared to accuse him, he was acknowledged as a loyal subject. He thanked the house for this declaration, and desired it might be drawn up in form; which was granted. Then he complained, that at his arrival at Sandwich his baggage was seized; and petitioned the restitution. He maintained that the seizure was made without cause, and offered to lend the king 6000*l.* for 6 years, on condition, that if the seizure appeared to be lawful, the money lent should be forfeited to the king's use. He offered moreover to lend him the like sum, and to defer the demand of the 13,000 marks, due to him on another account, provided the payment of the whole should be assigned out of the next subsidy granted to the king. His offers were accepted, and the seizure restored. Thus the duke of Gloucester, instead of hurting his enemy, had the mortification to see him receive the applauses of both houses. Meanwhile this discord produced very ill effects. As the duke of Gloucester had friends and adherents in the council, the opposition, generally between the two parties, could not but be very prejudicial to the king's affairs. For, whilst the duke and the cardinal thought only of their own private concerns, the war in France was neglected, though it was more necessary than ever to support it with the greatest efforts."

In this parl. the commons petitioned the king, that the fees and wages of the king's judges, serjeants, and attornies, might be paid, which was ordered accordingly. And by order of the houses, certain accountants of the king's household, by name, were pardoned their offences.—On the petition of Rd. duke of York, brother to Edw. late duke of York, and cousin German to Edm. late earl of March, to have livery of all the hereditaments belonging to the said duke and earl, by ordinance of parl. they were restored to him. This was the duke of York, who first began the open quarrel between the two houses.

Petitions and Answers.—P. That the defendant in an appeal of maim may make his attorney. A. The king will be advised.—P. That the statute, 7 H. IV. c. 9, relating to Merchants Strangers may be executed with this adjunct, viz. pains and penalties on the English merchants, and officers of every town for not executing of it. A. The king will be advised.—P. That none be compelled to be examined in parl. or elsewhere, touching his frank tenant. A. The same.—P. That such persons as shall have their goods taken by the merchants of Hans, in their parts, may have their remedy by action at law in London, against the Hans merchants residing in that city. A. The same as before.—P. That no merchant or other person be impeached for the seal of any cloth, broad or narrow, after such time as the alnager has sealed the same, and custom is paid for it. A. The same.—P. For speedy redress of and in all actions belonging to such persons, as were members of the house of commons. A. The same.—P. That all parsonages appropriated to some religious house, not endowing of vicars on the same, may be within 6 months unappropriated. A. As before.—A motion was made, and a device offered, for the true making of Gascoign wine. A. The king will send this over to the officers of Guienne, and appoint them to take order therein.—P. That prohibitions and attachments may be had upon the statute of the 45 Ed. III. against parsons suing for tithe-wood above the age of 20 years. A. The statutes, to that purpose provided, shall be observed.—At the petition of the commons, the king released utterly, on account of certain doubts, the subsidy granted in the last parl. on lands and tenements, so as it never should be mentioned again.

A Parl. called.] By writs dated May 24, 1433, another parl. was called to meet at Westminster on the 8th of July following. Being all assembled before the king, in the Painted Chamber of the palace, the dukes of Bedford and Gloucester, both of them present; the same chancellor, as in the last parl. declared the cause of the summons, and took for his theme, 'Suscipiant montes pacem populo, et colles justiciam.'—'This subject he divided into 3 parts, according to the 3 estates of the realm; by the mountains, he understood bps. lords, and magistrates; by the lesser hills, he meant knights, esquires, and merchants; by the people, he meant husbandmen, artificers, and labourers. To which 3 estates he endeavoured to prove, by many examples and authorities, that a triple political virtue ought to belong; to the 1st, unity, peace, and concord, without dissimulation; to the 2nd, equity, consideration, and upright justice, without partiality; to the 3rd, a due obedience to the king, his laws, and magistrates, without grudging. By strictly observing of all which, he affirmed, that infinite blessings and great acquisitions would accrue to the nation; and that this very assembly was called as a means for that purpose. Wherefore he enjoined the commons to make choice of their Speaker, and present him to the king as usual."

A Speaker chosen.] The receivers and tryers of petitions being appointed, for the different kingdoms and countries under the dominion of the English king, as was in those days the constant custom of parl. on the 11th of July the commons presented Roger Hunt, esq. for their

Speaker; who, with the usual ceremony, was allowed.

The 13th of July, the duke of Bedford rose up before the king, in the house of lords, and said, "That for two especial causes he had come into the king's presence, and left his charge beyond sea: the one was for the safeguard of the king's person; and the other, to clear himself from some slanders which were cast upon him, as that he had been the occasion of the late great losses in France and Normandy, by his default and negligence; and offered to take his trial for the same." On which the chancellor, by the king's command, declared, "That his maj. took him for his true and faithful subject, and most dear uncle; and for his coming, at that time, gave him most hearty thanks."—After this parl. had sat a month, the plague began to break out in London; therefore the chancellor, by the king's commands, on the 13th of August prorogued it to the 15th day after st. Michael ensuing, at Westminster. But, because the king's occasions for money were very urgent, it was ordained, that the treasurer of England should keep in his hands 2000*l.* for the service of the household.

On the 3d of Nov. the Speaker of the commons came before the king, in the other house, and shewed to his maj. a precedent, in the reign of Edw. II. whereby that king commanded the bps. and clergy, to pronounce sentence of excommunication against certain offenders at that time. The Speaker then desired his maj. to act in the same manner, and cause the clergy to excommunicate some that were then culpable. But all that was done in this affair was, that the king took the precedent and promised to be advised.

The whole Nation sworn to the observance of the Act against Quarrels.] And it was also enacted, by general consent, that all the lords, knights, esquires, yeomen and other persons throughout the realm, should, by special commissions, be sworn to perform the said articles. This act seems calculated to prevent the evil effect of the then mortal quarrel between the cardinal bp. of Winchester and the duke of Gloucester.

D. of Bedford, Regent of France, receives the Thanks of the Commons.] Nov. 24, the commons came again before the king and lords, and by their Speaker complimented the duke of Bedford on his warlike behaviour and notable deeds done in France; and particularly for his conduct in the battle of Verboyl. Besides, they commended him for his politic govt. in the regency of that kingdom; and for which they desired the king to insist upon the said duke's personal attendance about him; and, after some consultation amongst the lords, the duke, at his majesty's request, accepted the office. But at the same time he required that 6 Articles might be agreed to by parl. relating to the govt. which was granted. And by these articles the duke of Bedford recovered some part of the prerogative which the duke of Gloucester had lost, through the malicious intrigues of the cardinal and the clergy, who were his sworn enemies. After this the duke of Bedford took occasion to declare before the parl. that whereas he and the duke of Gloucester, for their attendance as principal counsellors, or presidents of the council, had some years an allowance made them of 8000 marks yearly; at other times 6000 marks, sometimes 5000, but never less than 4000 marks yearly, he would now, for his personal attendance, only require an allowance of 1000*l.* a year, and 500*l.* for passing the sea into France, or repassing it, as oft as there was occasion. Which demand being thought very reasonable by both the houses, was readily granted.

A Subsidy and a Vote of Credit granted.] The Subsidy granted by this parl. was a 10th and a 15th, to be levied on the laity. They likewise granted the same tonnage and poundage as was given the last year, for two years to come; as also a subsidy of 53*s.* 4*d.* on every sack of wool for 3 years ensuing. Authority was also given to the king's council to enter into securities for 100,000 marks for the present occasions of the govt. A Vote of Credit which, the reader may observe, has been more frequent in this reign than in any preceeding one. Daniel remarks, but erroneously, on the proceedings of this parl. that no taxes were given the king by it. "Perhaps," adds he, "it was because the duty of tonnage and poundage, which was given this king in his 3rd year was still continued. And, whereas, before they were granted for certain years only, they were now indefinitely given him for the service of the war; and from thence, as Stow says, they received the name of Customs, i. e. usual and constant payments."

The Liberties of the County Palatine of Durham, ascertained by Parl.] A Petition of Thos. Langley, then bp. of Durham, was presented to the house of lords, setting forth, "That whereas the king had granted a commission to certain persons, there named, and they by virtue thereof sat and made enquiry at Horton Pool, within the county palatine of Durham; he therefore prayed that the said commission might be revoked." Hereupon sir Wm. Earl, knight, the king's attorney-general, very learnedly endeavoured to prove "That the said bp. ought to have no county-palatine, nor liberties royal." On the contrary, the bp. produced his authorities to prove his right, and the matter was strenuously debated between them. At last judgment was given for the bp. and the said inquisition returned into chancery, or elsewhere, was declared null and void.

Revenues of the Crown.] Ralph lord Cromwel, high treasurer of England, petitioned the parl. that they would take into consideration the state of the Revenues of the Crown and the disbursements, the said revenue being not able to supply the expence by 35,000*l.* yearly; wherefore he prayed, that order might be taken for the king's household; that he might enjoy the office as freely as others before him; and that no grant be passed by the king without the knowledge of him the said treasurer. He also, by 3 long schedules annexed, shewed the particulars of the whole revenues and profits of the crown, with the charge out of the same in all ways and means. This was thought proper to be laid before the commons, and all the requests aforesaid were granted. The said lord Cromwel by another petition, also, shewed, that warrants for payments were come to him for more than 2 years profits of the crown; wherefore, he desired, that the consideration of the king's estate might be speedy, and that a prescription for his payment should be made.

Particular Acts passed.] In the Statutes at Large are several acts made this parl. on the petitions of the commons, very conducive to the public good, of which the following are abstracts:—I. It was provided by an act, "That such persons as were keepers of the stews or whore-houses in Southwark, should not be impannelled upon any jury, nor keep an inn or tavern in any other place, least men of such vile consciences and practices should corrupt justice, and propagate their villanies over the nation."—II. It was enacted, "That even disseisors should not be put out of possession by any collusive tricks of law, as was then usual, by making the sheriff the disseisor, and then entering upon the lands for the default of the tenant's not answering:" wherefore it was ordained, "That all such writs shall be abated and quashed:" and III. In the behalf of the person disseised wrongfully of his lands, whereas before the law was, that the disseisee might sue the disseisor in his life time, if he took the profits at the time of the suit commenced, which to avoid, the disseisors made over the land by feoffments to others, and so avoided the suit: whereupon it was enacted, "That the disseisees should have their action as well against the feoffee, as disseisor himself, if either of them take the profits of the land."—IV. And because divers tenants of lands for term of life and years, made over the said lands to other under-tenants, to the end that they might not be liable to writs of waste, for the damages done upon the said lands by their order and connivance before the grant of the said leases; it was hereupon enacted "That the tenant in reversion might have his action against the tenant for life or years, for the damages done, as well before as after the lease made to any under-tenants, and recover treble damages for the said waste, provided that it were proved, that the said first tenants took the profits of the land to their own proper use at the time of the waste done."—V. Whereas divers suits and indictments, as well for the king as his subjects, were discontinued by making of new commissions for the peace, to the great delay of justice, and wrong of the subjects, it was enacted, "That no pleas, or processes should be discontinued by any new commissions, but the justices so made, should have power and authority to continue all pleas depending, and determine the same."—VI. An abuse also being crept into the nation about measures contrary to the statutes; and purveyors, bakers, merchants, and buyers of corn, taking 9 bushels for the qr. it was enacted, "That the statutes for weights and measures should be proclaimed in every market-town; and that there should be a bushel, common balance, and weights in every market-town, city, and borough, kept by the mayor and justices, according to the standard in the exchequer; and if any person shall presume to sell or buy by any other weight or measures, they shall forfeit 5l. to the person that shall sue for it, and 5l. to the king."—VII. Recognisors having found out a way to defeat the executions of such persons as they were indebted to by recognizance, by bringing their writs de corpus cum causa out of chancery, and giving sureties to the king only, were delivered out of prison, and their creditors defeated of their debts; it was therefore ordained, "That sureties should be given, as well to the party as to the king, that their debts may be surely paid."

The French war still continued, and about this time with good success to the English, under the conduct of the victorious lord Talbot and the earl of Arundel. But the latter having the misfortune to be killed before the castle of Gerberoy, and the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy commencing a quarrel, which ended in an open rupture between them, affairs were again thrown into a different situation in that kingdom. In this interval we find that writs of summons were sent out, to call a parl. dated Nov. 1st, to meet at Westminster on the 8th day of July following; which was afterwards prorogued to Reading, 15 days after Michaelmas, in the 12th year of this reign. The Abridger of the records has given us no proceedings of this parl. for which reason we suppose they were not entered on the rolls, nor are there any acts in the statute books relating to it.

A Parl. called.] It was not till two years after that a parl. sat to do business, which was called by writs dated at Westminster, July 5, 1435, to meet at the same place on the 10th of Oct. following. On which day, being assembled before the king, sitting in his chair of state, in the Painted Chamber, the bp. of Bath and Wells, then chancellor of England, by the king's command, opened the session with a speech, and took for his theme this text, 'solliciti sitis servare unitatem spiritus in vinculo pacis;' and amongst other matters he told them, "that the duke of Burgundy, who had sworn allegiance both to the king and his father, had basely broke his oath and revolted; that he had appointed a diet, or sitting, at Arras, without the king's knowledge, where two cardinals came to treat about a peace between England and France; that after the king was acquainted with it, he sent some persons of quality as his ambassadors at this meeting, who there proposed reasonable and honest terms of agreement, which the French refused and scoffed at; by which nothing was done at that diet. After which the king was told, that the said duke of Burgundy had entered into a league with the French; and, as such, there remained nothing for the king to do, but either to lose his stile and title and kingdom of France, or else resolve to defend the same by force. How to act in the best manner in these affairs, he added, was the cause of this assembly; for which end he desired the commons to choose a Speaker, and next day to present him to the king."

A Speaker chosen.] Accordingly they presented John Bowes, esq. whose excuse being refused, he made the usual protestation, which was allowed. The first thing we find upon the record that this parl. went upon, was to give authority to the king's council, to make securities to the creditors of the crown for 100,000l. By the king's letters patents security was also given to certain persons there named for 8000 marks, sent by them to the king, out of the revenues of the duke of Bedford, and the earl of Arundel deceased.

A Subsidy granted.] An unusual subsidy was also granted by this parl. viz. that every person holding any frank tenant in lands, annuities, fees, offices, or hereditaments, above the yearly value of 5l. should pay 6d. for every pound, upon his oath. Also a 10th and a 15th was granted the king on the laity; deducting thereof 4000l. for the relief of decayed towns and villages. A subsidy also on every sack of wool, 33s. 4d. from merchants denizens, and 46s. 8d. from aliens; and so according to that rate on other staple ware, was granted to the king, with tonnage and poundage for 2 years.

Particular Acts passed.] Some public acts were made this session, in order chiefly to regulate abuses in other acts, or to explain them better. The most remarkable are, "That the judges, in their circuits, shall have power to give judgments in all cases of felony and treason, as well upon persons acquitted as attainted, and award executions according to that judgment."—"That all wools and wool-fells that shall be shipped to be transported, shall be carried to Calais only; and no licenses shall be granted to the contrary, except by the king and council."—"That all wool and wool-fells, and other merchandizes of the staple, which shall be shipped in any creeks or ports clandestinely, in order to cheat the king of his subsidies and customs, shall be forfeited to the king."—"That all persons who shall dare to disturb any foreigners in selling fish or other victuals, either by wholesale or retail, shall forfeit 10l. one moiety to the king, and the other to the person that shall sue for the same."

A Parl. called.] Another parl. was called to meet at Cambridge, Jan. 21st, 1436; but, for reasons of state, not mentioned, was ordered by other writs to meet at Westm. on the day aforesaid. John bp. of Bath and Wells, chancellor of England, opened this session with an elaborate speech, from this text, 'Corona regni in manu Dei, &c.' On which he demonstrated, "That 3 sorts of men are crowned; viz. all Christians in their baptism, in token whereof they are anointed; all clerks in their order, in token whereof they are shaven; and all kings in their coronation, who in token thereof wear a crown of gold, set about with flowers and precious stones. The figure of the crown he resembled to the body politic of the nation; the flowers and stones to the honours and offices of a prince, as gold estimable and durable; and that commonwealth is most firm and stable which is governed by the faithful care of a prince; for, as gold is flexible to the workman, so ought every part of the commonality to be at the beck of the prince, seeking the prosperity of him." The erecting and standing of the flowers in the upper part of the crown denoteth the king's pre-eminency over his subjects, which ought to be garnished with 4 cardinal virtues: that is to say, in the fore-part ought to be wisdom, adorned with three precious stones, viz. memory of things past, circumspection of things present, and prudence in things to come. On the right-hand ought to be fortitude, accompanied with courage in attempting, patience in suffering, and perseverance in well-meaning. On the left side ought to be justice, distributing her arms three ways, to the best, mean, and lowest. On the hinder-part ought to be temperance, with her trinity, viz. restraint of sensuality in fear, silence in speech, and mortification in will; all which, proceeding from God, fully proved, that the crown of the king was in the hand of God." He concluded with declaring, "That this parl. was called for 3 principal causes; the 1st, for justice and peace amongst subjects; the 2nd, how the commodities growing within this realm might have a ready vent; the 3rd, how the realm might be defended, and the sea kept against enemies and rebels." To which end, he desired the commons to choose their Speaker, and present him the next day to the king.

A Speaker chosen.] The receivers and triers of petitions being appointed, the Commons presented sir John Tirrel to be their Speaker, whose excuse being refused, he, with the common protestation, was allowed. But, March 19th, a committee of commons was sent to the king, declaring that their house had newly chosen Wm. Beerly, esq. to be their Speaker, in the room of sir John Tirrel, disabled from attending by grievous sickness, which was allowed by the king under the usual protestation.

Subsidies granted.] The subsidies granted by this parl. were the like 10th and 15th as in the last. Also the same subsidy on wools, &c. was granted for 3 years to come. Authority was likewise given to the king's council to make assurances to the king's creditors, for the sum of 100,000l. And by the same authority, the treasurer of England was to pay to the cardinal bp. of Winchester 2000 marks.

Particular Acts passed.] The particular acts that were made this session were: I. "A remedy was provided against vexatious and troublesome suits of such persons as were not of the king's household, in the court of stewards, and marshals of the king's house; and it was allowed as an exemption from their jurisdiction to plead and aver, that they are not of the king's house."—II. "An allowance was given to all the king's subjects of England to transport corn, when at a low price, out of the realm, viz. wheat at 6s. 3d. and barley at 3s. 4d. the qr."—III. "An injunction to all sheriffs, bailiffs of franchises, and coroners, that in actions, or writs of attainr of plea for lands of the yearly value of 40l. they do not return nor impanel any persons, but such as be inhabiting in his bailiwick, and have an estate to their own use, in lands and tenements, to the yearly value of 20l. or more, on the penalty of forfeiting 10l. to the king, and 10l. to the plaintiffs in the said action or writs of attainr; and that no person of less sufficiency of freehold than 20l. a year, shall be sworn in the king's court upon any issue in the said actions, if he be by the plaintiffs in due form challenged."—IV. "A permission was given to all persons, as well religious as secular, to appoint themselves general attornies to sue or plead for them, in every hundred or wapentake."—And, V. "A prohibition was laid upon all merchants to ship, or cause to be shipped, any wool, wool-fells, or other merchandizes belonging to the staple, in any place within this realm, except at the keys and wharfs assigned by the statute, where the king's weights and wools are set; excepting the merchants of Genoa, Venice, Tuscany, Florence, Catalonia, and the burgesses of Berwick.

Petitions.] On a Petition of Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, and dame Eleanor his wife, the king granted his letters patents, confirmed by this parl. giving licence to the said duke to impark 200 acres of land in Greenwich, and that they may embattle their manor-house there, and build it with stone; also to raise a tower of stone within the said park. John, earl of Oxford, petitioned for a pardon for 300l. the remainder of a fine of 3000l. paid to the king for marrying without licence. It was answered, that the said debt was assigned over, but that the king would remember him some other way. Sir Rd. Woodville paid to the king 1000l. as a fine for marrying Jaquet, or Jaqueline, duchess of Bedford, without licence. This foreign lady shewed as little continence in her widowhood, as queen Catherine had done; being quickly married again to the aforesaid knight, afterwards created earl of Rivers, by whom she had several children; and amongst them the lady Elizabeth, who, being wife to Edw. IV. was afterwards queen of England. On the Petition of Isabel, late wife of John Boteler, of Beansly, in the county of Lancaster, knight, which Isabel, one Wm. Pull, of Winall, in the county of Chester, gentleman, shamefully did ravish; it was enacted, "That if the said Wm. do not surrender himself, after proclamation made against him, that he should be taken as a traitor attainted." The said Isabel, by another petition, shewed how the said Wm. by duress and means of imprisonment, enforced her to marry him, and under colour thereof, ravished her; for which she prayed to have her appeal, which was granted.

A general pardon.] The last thing we find on the record, transacted this parl. was the king's general pardon of all treasons, felonies, forfeitures, and other offences; but this does not appear in the statute-books. And authority was given to the lords of the council, to answer all such petitions as were not answered in this parliament.

A Parl. called.] We have now a period of 3 years before we meet with another parl. But in 1439, the govt. wanting fresh supplies, a parl. was summoned, to meet at Westm. on the 12th of Nov. At which time and place being all assembled, the bp. of Bath and Wells still chanc. was commanded by the king to open the session by a speech. He took for his subject this text, 'Adaperiat Dominus cor nostrum in lege sua, et in præceptis suis, et faciat pacem,' &c. From which words he endeavoured to draw two especial points; the 1st, "What great desire every christian ought to have to the reformation of his life, by the only means of God; who, against all hardness was to bend, and to incline his heart to God's laws and commandments. The 2d, what thirst every sick christian ought to have, to crave and seek peace, after his manifold conflicts and battles in this world. As to the 1st, that God should open the heart, and not the hearts, since the words were spoken to the children of Israel; he noted that thereby was meant a mystical unity, according to these words in Judges ii, 'Convenit universus Israel ad civitatem quasi homo unus, eadem mente, unoque consilio.' Which being spoken to them, was left for our learning, that we might follow the same, and might attain to true peace. To the 2d, by this word Israel is understood their states, namely, of princes, of nobles, of power and of wisdom; all which, if they the same agreed in unity, there was no doubt but peace of body and soul would ensue. For the restoring of which, he told them, that this parl. was called; remembering them, that the king would have all estates enjoy their liberties; then desired the commons to chuse, and the next day present their Speaker to the king."

A Speaker chosen.] The prelate having ended his spiritual harangue, the next day the commons presented to the king, Wm. Tresham, esq. who with the usual solemnity was allowed.

Supplies granted.] The subsidies granted by this parl. were a 10th and a 15th; and half a 15th was granted to be levied of the laity, in such form as was in the 4th year of this king. An impost on wools was also granted for 3 years, as in the 14 Hen. VI. The commons also granted to the king, that all aliens, not denizens, within the realm, should pay to the king yearly, 16d for each, being an housekeeper; being none, 6d. The same authority was also given to the treasurer of England, and others, to make securities for 100,000l. as in former parl. An order was also taken for the payment of the king's debts, contracted for the provisions of his household.

Dec. 21, the chanc. by the king's command declared to the lords and commons, that the king had prorogued the parl. from that day unto the day after st. Hilary next coming, to be holden at Reading.

Particular Acts passed.] The most remarkable acts made in this session are these:—I. "That cheese and butter may be carried out of the kingdom without licence."—II. "That merchant strangers shall not sell their merchandizes one to another in England, but that every such merchant shall have an host or surveyor, appointed him at his landing, by the chief officer of the town or place where he shall land, who shall keep a register of all he buys and sells, and take 2d in the pound of him for all merchandize by him bought or sold, and the said merchants shall sell and buy all within 8 months."—III. "That all persons, made justices of the peace, should have lands and tenements to the value of 20l. a year, except in cities and corporations."—IV. "That no captain shall detain the wages of common soldiers, except it be for their clothing, under the penalty of 20l. for every spear, and 10l. for a bow; to be paid to the king."—V. "That every person mustering and receiving the king's wages, who shall depart from their captains and the king's service, without apparent licence granted them by the said captains, shall be punished as felons."—VII. "That no person shall be a collector of dismes and quinzines, (10ths and 15ths) in any county, who is so in the city of the same; except he be able to dispend, in lands and tenements, in the said county, 100s. a year, over and above all charges and reprises.

Petitions.] P. That no person once making fine for not being knighted, be ever again called for it; and that the fines be no other than usual. A. The king will be advised.—P. That every merchant may lawfully transport all manner of hides, calf-skins, long-fells and tallow, to what place he liketh, besides to Calais. A. The king will be advised.—P. That no owner of any ship be impeached for any hurt done by his ship to any other ship on the sea, or in port, or creek, if he was not a party thereto. A. The same as before.—P. That every collector of customs, and comptrollers of every port, may licence the king's subjects to transport corn from one shire or town to another, taking surety of debt, to the value, that the same be not carried beyond sea. A. As before.—P. That no Italian, or other merchant, beyond the streights of Morocco, (now Gibraltar) bring any merchandize into the realm, but such as is the produce of their own countries; for very good reasons mentioned in the record. A. The same as above.—P. That all spiceries sold in any port within the realm, by any merchants strangers, be as clear garbelled as the same is in London. A. The king will be advised. An act was made this session that the fourth part of the 10th and 15th shall be paid to the treasurer of the king's household, in order to make ready payment for the king's purveyance. And, by the said act it appears, the revenues of the dutchies of Lancaster and Cornwall were also appropriated to that use.—On the petition of the judges it was enacted, "That all the justices of both benches, justices of assize, the king's serjeant and attorney, shall yearly, at two feasts of the year then expressed, be paid, and allowed their fees and liveries, by the hands of the clerk of the Hanaper, for the time being, out of the customs of London, Bristol, and Kingston upon Hull.—The last thing worthy of notice among the transactions of this parl. is, that in consideration of the great plague of pestilence, so called, it was enacted, "That all such persons as should do homage to the king, should do the same without kissing him; and the same homage to be as good as though the kiss was given."

A Parl. called.] In 1442 another parl. was called by writ, to meet at Westminster, on the feast of the conversion of st. Paul, but no more than the names of the peers, so summoned, is given in the Abridgment of the Records. In the Statutes at Large, there are 13 acts said to be made in this parl. yet none of them being of a particular nature, we must refer the curious enquirer to the statute-book aforesaid for them.

A Parl. called.] It was not till 3 years after this period, that we meet with any account of a parl. when writs were issued out, dated at Westminster, Jan. 13, 1445, for one to meet at the same place on the 25th of Feb. following. In presence of the king sitting in person in his chair of state, and of the lords and commons, John Stafford, late bp. of Bath and Wells, but now abp. of Canterbury, primate of all England, deputy to the see of Rome, and chancellor of England, declared the cause of calling this parl. and took for his subject these words from Psalm lxxxiv. 'Justitia & pax osculatæ sunt.' On which he told them, "That through the great diligence and conduct of the earl of Suffolk, the king's dear cousin, and other noblemen, sent as ambassadors into France, as well upon a treaty of marriage to be had between the king and Margaret, daughter to the king of Sicily, as for to settle a peace between England and France, the said marriage was contracted; and a suspension of arms, for a time, was granted. He further said, that the said earl staid in France for the safe conduct of the said princess Margaret into the realm of England, by which two means he nothing doubted, but that, through God's grace, the said truce would end so well that justice and peace should be within this nation more than it had been." He then bid the commons chuse and present their Speaker to the king.

W. Burghley, esq. Speaker.] On the 2nd day of this parl. the Commons notified to the lords, that they had chosen their Speaker; and the next day they presented Wm. Burghley, esq. to the king, whose excuse being rejected, he was allowed as Speaker, under the common protestation.—This session, we find, by the Record, was continued to March 15th, but no notice is taken of any more business done in it; when the chancellor, by the king's command, prorogued the parl. to the 19th of April.

A Subsidy granted.] This parl. being again assembled on the 19th of April, the first thing we find entered upon the Record, is the grant of a Subsidy of a 10th and a 15th, and half a 10th and half a 15th, reserving out of it 5000l. to be allowed to certain poor towns, there named, which were wasted. A subsidy on wools also of 34s. 4d. of denizens, and 53s. of aliens, for every sack of wool, &c. with tonnage and poundage of denizens, and double of aliens, was granted to the king for four years.

A Peace with France.] The next thing the parl. did was to take into consideration the affair of the peace with France; and we find that the chancellor of England, in the presence of the king and the whole parl. made a protestation, "That the peace which the king had made with the French king, or rather was about to make, was merely of his own motion and will; and that he was not instigated thereto by himself, or any of the lords whatsoever." Which protest was enrolled.—On this, it was enacted, by the authority aforesaid, "That the statute made of H. V. importing, That no peace should be made with the French king that now is, and was then called the dauphin of France, without the assent of the three estates of both realms, should be utterly repealed and revoked. And that no person whatsoever should be impeached at any time to come, for giving counsel to bring about this peace with France."—This extraordinary act which, by the bye, is not inserted in the statutes of this parl. seems to have been calculated for a compliment to the earl of Suffolk, now made a marquis for this piece of service, and to indemnify him from any further trouble about the match. We are told, by the Records, that on the 2nd of June the marquis came into the house, and made a declaration of his services to the king, lords and commons, and his request was, that they would judge all he had done to be reasonable and just. That on the 4th of June, the Speaker of the house of commons came before the king and lords, and there, in behalf of their whole body, highly commended the person and numerous services of the marquis and earl of Suffolk, particularly for the king's marriage, and for obtaining the truce with France; for all which, at the request of the commons and mediation of the lords, a vote was passed, "That the said marquis should be esteemed as a most true and faithful subject to the king."

Particular Acts passed.] No less than 18 acts, some new, and others explanatory, were passed in this session. The heads of those that chiefly regard the public concern are these:—

'A rehearsal of the statute made 15 H. VI. c. II. touching licence to transport corn, when wheat doth not exceed 6s. 8d. and barley 3s. 4d. the qr. made perpetual.—'No man shall be sheriff or under sheriff, &c. above a year.—'No sheriff shall let to farm his county or bailiwick:—'The sheriffs and bailiffs fees in several cases limited.—'An act for the ordering and levying the wages of the knights of parl.—'Who shall be knights for the parl.—'The manner of their election—the remedy where one is chosen and another returned.' &c.—The king's letters patents under the great seal of England, and under the seal of the dutchy of Lancaster, made to John, cardinal and abp. of Canterbury, and several others, relating to some possessions in the said dutchy; and 3 other letters patents under the seal only of the dutchy of Lancaster, made to the persons aforesaid, of several possessions to the performance of the last will and testament of the present king, were read and confirmed by the whole estates in parl.—The king's letters patents for the erection and endowment of Eton college, founded 20 H. VI. with all the lands and liberties then and now granted, were especially declared and confirmed by parl. As also the like letters patents of the king's, made for the erecting and endowing a college (king's college) in Cambridge, were publicly read and confirmed by this parliament.

The D. of Suffolk gains the management of the Kingdom by the Queen's means.] The new queen seeing the marq. of Suffolk particularly honoured for his services by the lords and representatives of the nation, found it no difficulty to get her easy husband to join in conferring new dignities upon him. He was accordingly raised from marq. to duke of Suffolk, and had several manors and wardships given him to support this new dignity; and having the queen's heart, who certainly managed the king as she pleased, this new duke may properly be then said to be the greatest man in the kingdom.

The d. of Suffolk plots the ruin of the d. of Gloucester.] The person that stood the most in their way to an absolute rule, was Humphry, for his great humanity and hospitality, justly called, "the good duke of Gloucester." This nobleman had been long engaged in a mortal quarrel with his half-bred uncle, Hy. Beaufort, bp. of Winchester. The duke had acted in his Protectorship with great wisdom and caution; yet, even in that great post he could not escape a snare laid for him by the cardinal, and his other enemies. His dutchess was accused of tampering and dealing with witches and conjurers, in order to deprive the king of his life, and raise her husband to the crown. The superstitious ignorance of that age made this accusation easily credited; and being found guilty, along with her accomplices, they suffered death; and she a shameful penance and a perpetual imprisonment. The new favourite having found he could not have all things within his gripe, without removing this great man, soon contrived to effect it. The first step that the queen and her minion took was to get the duke of Gloucester, not only displaced from having any command about the king's person, but even from his council. Not long after they accused him of several crimes and misdemeanors: all which the duke cleared himself so well of, that he was honourably acquitted of them before the king and council.

A Parl. called.] This disappointment did but aggravate his enemies the more against him, and many other snares were laid for him. But a more plausible expedient being at last thought of, a parl. was resolved to be called, where he was to be apprehended for some charge of high treason, and committed to close custody. Accordingly writs were issued out for calling a parl. to meet at Cambridge on the 10th of Feb. 1447; but afterwards, for reasons of state no doubt, other writs were dispatched after them to summon the same peers, by name, to meet in parl. on the same day at St. Edmund's Bury. When, being met in the Refectory of the abbey there, John abp. of Canterbury, primate, legate, and chancellor, as before, opened the session by the king's command, and took for his theme these words out of the Proverbs, 'Qui autem ineunt pacis concilia, sequitur illos caudium.' In repeating his text, 'Qui autem,' &c. he said, "There were 3 kinds of counsels; the 1st, of the wicked, utterly to be shunned, according to the saying of the Psalmist, 'beatus est vir, qui non ambulavit in consilio impiorum.' The 2nd, of the good and learned, who go with circumspection, according to Isaiah 6. 'Finito consilio suscepit actor in domu sua, & fecit cognam magnam.' The 3rd, of the Holy Ghost, expelling all doubts by working inwardly, according to the Psalmist, 'Consilium autem domini in æternum manet; cogitationes ejus a generatione ad generationem.' He acquainted them, "That between the ambassadors of the English and French kings an agreement was made, that the two kings should have an interview; and that sufficient assurance would be given for his majesty's passage beyond sea, his safe residence there, and return. For which reason the king desired their advice, and would act accordingly. He concluded, as usual, desiring the commons to chuse and present their Speaker, and put them in mind that the king's will was, all estates should enjoy their liberties."

W. Tresham, esq. elected Speaker.] The receivers and triers of petitions to this parl. being appointed; on the 2d day the commons presented, as their Speaker, Wm. Tresham, whose excuse being rejected, he was, with the common protestation, allowed.—It is remarkable, after this usual preamble, that the heads of all the acts made in this parl. in the statute books, are comprised in two lines. And what is mentioned in Cotton is little or nothing to the purpose. Authority given to the king's council for 100,000 l. Some grants of the king to his new erected colleges of Eaton and Cambridge, and an exchange in the new queen Margaret's revenues of 4666 l. 13s. 4d. out of the customs, &c. for some other lands and hereditaments settled on her, during life, confirmed, was every thing material done in this parl.: except another article, viz. "That it is by the king enacted, that Eleanor, the late wife of the duke of Gloucester, shall be utterly barred from claiming any dower of any of the hereditaments, &c. of the said duke." By this it appears, that another motive, and which has been hinted at before, was the occasion of calling this parl.; and since it has been so carefully kept out of the Records, the more general historians must inform us.

The D. of Gloucester arrested and murdered.] "With the new year," says Daniel, "the lords began to prepare for meeting in parl. at Bury; and that the duke of Gloucester might fear no evil, all things at court were carried with great smoothness towards him. But care was taken to have it whispered in his ear, that it was necessary he should be at it, to prevent the designs of the queen and her party. The good duke, not at all jealous of ill practices, but retaining his old zeal for the commonwealth, hearkened to the caution, and with the rest of the lords came to the place at the time appointed, ready to attend the national business.—On the 1st day of the session, all things went well enough, and the ceremonies at the opening of a parl. were performed as usual. On the 2nd day the lord Beaumont, then high constable of England, being accompanied with the dukes of Buckingham and Somerset, and many others, arrested the duke of Gloucester, and put him in custody under a strong guard. His servants were all taken from him, and 32 of them sent to different prisons. The nation was in great amaze at this sudden action, and every man was inquisitive to know what new matter was found out against the duke, who had so lately cleared himself of all that could be alledged against him. His enemies thought it necessary to lay some crime to his charge, and therefore gave it out that Humphry, duke of Gloucester, with his train of servants, had traiterously conspired to kill the king that he might set the lady Eleanor his wife at liberty. A ridiculous charge, but, yet sufficient to quiet the people, whom they only feared, in the execution of their design; for the more improbable his crime was, the easier it would be to free himself, and so the people rested content with the sense of his wisdom and innocency. But his enemies had contrived otherwise, that he should never come to his defence; for the night after his commitment, as some say, but others a few nights after, he was found dead in his bed, and his body shewed to the lords and commons assembled in parl. and lay exposed to open view of all comers for some time; in which, because no signs of a violent death appeared, it was reported, that he died of an apoplexy or imposthume. But, because none of his servants suffered after his death, which they ought to have done, had they been guilty of high treason, as was alledged against them (though 5 of them were condemned, and when near their execution were pardoned by the duke of Suffolk's means); it was generally thought a sufficient ground to believe, that he was murdered by the queen's means; and some were so particular as to report, that he was strangled between two pillows, or featherbeds, as Thos. Woodstock, duke of Gloucester before him, had been; others that he had an hot spit run up his fundament, at king Edw. II. had; others affirmed, that he died of mere grief, because he saw he must now fall a sacrifice to his enemies malice, without being allowed to defend himself; all which conjectures have little foundation. The most discreet judged he was murdered; but, being transacted in private it was not safe to determine by what means."

The death of this great man was, very soon after, revenged upon his enemies; the cardinal bp. of Winchester died within a month of him, and though the queen and the duke of Suffolk now managed both the king and the kingdom without controul, yet the reign of the latter was very short lived, as the course of these enquiries will shew. The method they took to govern, was very oppressive and intolerable to the subjects; and though the queen made use of her husband's name, yet she could scarcely hide her usurpation, because, in England, the queen consort hath no power, but title only.—The death of the duke of Gloucester had yet another ill consequence, by opening a door to the duke of York to put in his claim to the crown. It does not appear that York had any hand in the duke's murder; but it may be well supposed, that he was glad to see it acted by others; and that the queen and her minion went on in the govt. in the arbitrary manner they did. In a small time after duke Humphry's death, he began to represent to his friends the misery of the nation, which, under the name of a king, weak and unable to govern, was ruled by an ambitious queen, and her favourites. He first put it into their heads, that it was necessary to pitch upon some other person to be king, since Henry had deposed himself, in effect, by suffering the queen and Suffolk to over-rule all; that the king was really a good man, but fitter for a cloister than a palace, therefore the kingdom was to be put into better hands than those of women and favourites. Having thus artfully infused into their minds a general discontent, he next put forward his own title to the crown; which, allowing hereditary right to be valid, was indubitable. Yet, added, that though he would not vainly vaunt himself fit for so great an office, he might boldly claim the crown as his right; and hoped, that the diligence and valour he had shewn in France, for the preservation of the English dominions in that kingdom, were demonstrations enough to prove, that he had the true spirit of an Englishman in him, and was zealous in all things for the good of the nation.—Thus much we have thought it proper to say, though somewhat digressive from our parliamentary design, in order to keep up a connection in history; and to shew, at what time those great disputes between the two houses began, which near overturned the whole kingdom.

A Parl. called.] It was 2 years after the last, before we meet with another parl. which was called by writs dated at Westminster, Jan. 2, 1449, to meet at the same place on the 12th of Feb. following; the first peer now on the list is Rd. duke of York.—On the day appointed being all met in the Painted Chamber of the palace, John abp. of Canterbury, chancellor of England, declared the cause of the summons, and made a notable declaration; but what it was, our abridger has not informed us.

A Speaker chosen, and a Subsidy and Poll-tax granted.] Three days after, the commons presented John Day, esq. for their Speaker, who was allowed; and soon after, a grant of a 10th and half a 15th, to be levied on the laity, passed both houses; with a grant also of tonnage and poundage, for 5 years to come, on all merchants whatsoever, with an addition of 3s. more on aliens, as well of the Hans towns as otherwise. Authority was likewise given to the council of state, to borrow 100,000l. as well upon the king's revenues as his jewels.—We find, on record, that another grant was made to the king of half a 10th and a whole 15th, to be levied as before. Also, a Poll-Tax was again renewed, and granted to the king, of 16d. to be taken of every householder within the realm, not born within the king's dominions, and 6d. of every other person so born and no householder; with 6s. 8d. of all and every merchant stranger, and 20d. of all and every of their clerks. Lastly, the like subsidy on wools was granted for 4 years, as before.

Normandy lost.] A message from the duke of Somerset, the king's lieut. in France, was delivered to this parl. verbatim, by the lord Hastings, chancellor of France, and the abbot of Gloucester, importing, That the great preparations the French were making were such, that if a war should happen, then the country of Normandy was not able to defend itself. And, as the truce was to endure but for 14 months, it was necessary to acquaint the king and council, in discharge of the said duke, that they might provide accordingly. The English govt. took some alarm at this message, and being well provided with money by the late subsidies, a considerable reinforcement was sent over to the duke regent; but these had ill luck, and were most of them cut off; after which, the duke of Somerset gave up Caen to the French, and in short all Normandy, 30 years after it had been conquered by Henry V.

Upon contention between Wm. earl of Arundel and Tho. earl of Devon, for superiority of place in council and parl. it was enacted by the king and lords, with the advice of the judges, "That the said earl of Arundel and his heirs, by reason of the castle and honour of Arundel, shall for ever enjoy the pre-eminence in the presence of the king and elsewhere, above the said earl of Devon, as worshipfully, so saith the act, as any of his ancestors, earl of Arundel, before that time ever had. And yet, it is observable, that in all the succeeding lists of peers summoned to parl. the earl of Devon is always placed before the earl of Arundel. The most remarkable thing done this parl. was by the bishops, who now made a strong push to have the Act of præmunire repealed. They had made considerable interest in both houses to effect their design, but the greater part of the lords and commons were so zealous for the continuance of it, that their attempts proved ineffectual. This parl. had two several prorogations; one from the 4th of April to the 7th of May; and the other, as the Record says, by reason of the plague then reigning in London and Westminster, from May 30th to June 16th, at Winchester, though we cannot find that they ever met at that place.

A Parl. called.] The losses in France being known in England, it bred a general discontent amongst the people; and the fault was totally laid on the queen and her ministry. The loudest exclamations were raised against the duke of Suffolk, as the chief instrument of all the misconduct; and it was resolved, that he should undergo a national enquiry about it. The queen, apprehensive of the danger her favourite was in from such a procedure, did all she could to prevent it. First, by endeavouring to hinder a parl. from being called; and next, when she could not avoid that, by having it summoned to meet at Leicester; where, in a country town, she imagined her numerous attendants might overawe the members. But the lords and commons, who knew they were safe under the protection of the city of London, positively refused to meet at all, unless they were appointed to come to Westminster. So the writs of summons were issued out, dated Sept. 23rd, 1450, for a parl. to meet at the latter, on the 6th of Nov. following. By the Abridgment of the Records we find that this parl. underwent several prorogations; for, on the 1st day of the session, John abp. of Canterbury declared to the lords and commons, that, for avoiding the infectious air of Westminster, the king had really prorogued the said parl. to London; and desired the commons to choose their Speaker, and present him the next day to the king.

A Speaker elected in the room of one excused.]
VOL. I.

On the 3rd day of the session the commons presented sir John Popham as their Speaker, whose excuse for not serving the office, we find, was accepted, and he was discharged. So on the same day the commons presented Wm. Tresham, esq. for the same purpose, who, with the common protestation, was allowed. Dec. 4th, the parl. was again adjourned from London to Westm. to be there held by the chancellor, in the presence of the king, lords, and commons the next day. And on the 17th of the same month, the abp. of Canterbury, chancellor of England, in the king's presence, and on his behalf, gave thanks to the three estates, and prorogued the parl. to the 22nd of Jan. next at Westminster. This last prorogation may be accounted for, by reason of the Christmas holidays; but we are further told, that on the said 22nd of Jan. 1451, when the parl. met, the abp. of Canterbury was discharged from the office of chancellor, and John Kempe, cardinal and abp. of York, was put in his place; that they sat at Westminster to the 30th of March; and then the chancellor, by the king's command, prorogued the parl. from the said day to the 29th of April, next ensuing, at Leicester.

A large Subsidy granted.] In all this time there is not one word more of business done this session, than is before mentioned. But, after this, an extraordinary subsidy was granted; which was, "That every person having by free deed, copy, grant of annuity, or office, the clear yearly value of 20s. in frank-tenements should pay 6d. and so from 20s. to 20l. From 20l. to 200l. yearly, 12d. in the pound: from 200l. and upwards 2s. for every pound, as well laity as clergy; guardians of wards, men having fees, and all corporations to pay accordingly. Several sums also out of the king's revenues and fee-farms, to a great value, were allowed to bear and pay the charges of the king's household.

Impeachment of the Duke of Suffolk.] But, before the last prorogation to Leicester, came on the trial of the duke of Suffolk, on several Articles of High Treason; which, because he saw that he could not avoid, he moved for himself. For, according to the Record, on the 22d of Jan. the duke stood up in the house of lords, and required the king "That he might be specially accused, and be allowed to answer to what many men reported of him, that he was an unfaithful subject." He further told the king, "That his father, and 3 of his brethren, died in his service and that of his father's and grandfather's. That he himself had served in the wars 34 years; and, being but a knight, and taken prisoner, had paid for his ransom 2000l. That he had been of the order of the garter 30 years, and a counsellor to the king 15 years, and had been 17 years in the wars, without returning home. And, asking God's mercy, as he had been true to the king and realm, he required his purgation."—Jan. 26, the commons came before the lords, and required that the duke, on his confession, might be committed to safe custody; but the lords and judges, upon consultation, "thought there was no good cause for it, unless some especial matter was objected against him."—Jan. 28, the Speaker came again, and declared, "That the duke of Suffolk, as it was said, had sold this realm to the French, who had prepared to come hither; and that the said duke, for his own defence, had furnished the castle of Wallingford with all warlike munition; whereupon, at the Speaker's request, the said duke was committed to the tower of London.—Feb. 7, the Speaker of the commons, the chancellor and the lords, sent to the king a Bill of Articles, by which they accused Wm. de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, late of Ewelme in the county of Oxford, of sundry treasons, viz.

"I. That the said duke having the wardship of Margaret the daughter and heir of John duke of Somerset, he meant to marry his son John to her; and thereby for want of issue of the king, to claim the crown, and to procure the French king, by means of certain French lords, there named, to depose the king.—II. That he procured the delivery of the duke of Orleans, and practised with him to cause the French to recover the English conquests in that kingdom.—III. Related to the duke's promise of delivery of Anjou and Main, to requite the king of Sicily the king's enemy, without the assent of the other ambassadors.—IV. For disclosing the king's counsel to the earl of Dummoys bastard of Orleans, and to others of the French nation.—V. For betraying to the French the strength of the king's piles, ordnance, and munition, beyond sea.—VI. That the said duke, by disclosing the king's secrets, caused the peace to be broken.—VII. That the said duke supported the king's enemies, by staying sundry arms which should have passed against them.—VIII. That the said duke had strengthened the king's enemies against him, by not compromising in the last peace the king of Arragon, who is almost lost; and the duke of Britany, who is wholly so." All which articles, the commons require to be enrolled, and that prosecution may be awarded thereon.

March 9th, the commons made a new complaint against the duke, in effect following: first, for procuring the king, in his 18th year, to give away the inheritance and lands of the crown. For procuring many liberties in derogation of the common law, and hindrance of justice. For causing the king to give away the castle of Manlion de Searl, and other territories in Guienne. For that the earl of Armanac and other nobles of Guienne, were drawn from their obedience to the king, by the said duke's discovering of secrets, to the utter impoverishment of this realm. For procuring the king to bestow the keeping of divers towns and offices in Normandy and Guienne, on unworthy persons. For procuring the king to grant the earldoms of Enreney and Longueville, and other lordships in Normandy to the bastard of Orleans, and other Frenchmen, the king's chiefest enemies, without the assent of the council. For that the duke procured the king, in his own presence, to promise the French ambassador to attend in person at the convention in France, to the king's subversion if it had taken effect. For causing the subsidies granted to be contrarily employed. For causing the king's treasure to be spent on the French queen, and other French people. For consuming the sum of 60,000*l.* left by the lord Dudley the late treasurer. For conveying out of the king's treasury the obligations of the finance for the duke of Orleans. For procuring himself to be made earl of Pembroke, and obtaining the lordships of Haverford-west, after the death of sir Rowland Lenthal. For staying the process of outlawry against Wm. Talbois, esq. of Lincoln, upon several appeals of murder. For procuring a pardon to the said Wm. for not appearing upon suretyship of peace. For procuring persons of his confederacy to be made sheriffs. For procuring a garrison of Englishmen to fight against the Germans, the king's allies, on the part of the French, the king's enemies." All which articles the commons required to be enrolled, and that the said duke might answer to them.—On the same day the duke of Suffolk was brought from the Tower, by the king's writ, into the Parl. Chamber, at Westminster, before the king and lords; to whom the articles aforesaid were rehearsed, who desired a copy of them, which was granted. And, for the more ready answer to them, he was committed to the custody of certain esquires, in the tower within the king's palace.

March 14th, the said duke appeared again before the lords, and on his knees denied the truth of the first 8 articles of treason against him; and offered to prove them false in any manner the king should appoint. The 1st of them he denied as impossible, inferring, that some of the lords knew he meant to have married his son to the earl of Warwick's daughter, if she had lived. To many of the rest, he referred himself to the king's letters patents, and to some acts of the council. To the yielding up of Anjou and Main, he referred also to the acts of the council; which shew, that other lords were privy thereto, as well as himself, and said that the same was delivered up by the bishop of Chichester, then keeper of the privy seal.

March 17th, the said duke was brought again before the lords, to whom the chancellor repeated the answer he had made, and told him, that therein he had not put himself upon his peerage, and asked the duke which way he would be tried? who, kneeling, said, that he hoped he had answered all things to the full, and so protesting his innocency, referred himself entirely to the king's mercy and award.—Thereupon the chancellor, by the king's command, pronounced this sentence, "that since the duke did not put himself upon his peerage, the king, in relation to the articles of treason contained in the first bill, would be doubtful. And as to the articles of misprision, the king, not as judge by the advice of the lords, but as one to whose order the duke had committed himself, doth banish him the realm, and other his dominions, for 5 years; from the 1st of May next ensuing."—After which sentence being given, lord Beaumont, lord high constable, stood up, on the behalf of the bps. and lords, and required, "that it might be enrolled, that the said judgment was by the king's own rule, and not by their assent; and also required, that neither they nor their heirs should, by this example, be barred of their peerage and privileges."—The foregoing account of this parliamentary inquiry into the misconduct of a prime minister, from the records themselves. Undoubtedly the mildness of his sentence proceeded from the queen's great indulgence to him; who was in hopes, that his short banishment might last longer than the malice of his enemies against him. But, unhappily for both, the duke was taken prisoner at sea, by a private English captain, who had way-laid him, had his head struck off on the side of a long-boat, and his body thrown into the sea.

A Parl. called.] A parl. was called to meet at Westminster, on the 6th of Nov. 1451. The following is a list of the

Peers summoned to this Parliament.

Henry, d. of Exeter	Henry, lord Scroop, of Bolton
John, duke of Norfolk	Leonard, lord Welles
Humphry, d. of Buckingham	John, lord Clinton

Hy. Percy, l. Poinings	Ralph, lord Boteler, of Sudley
Wm. lord Bottreaux	Thomas, lord Gray, of Richmond
Thos. lord Dacres, of Gilsland	William Beauchamp, lord St. Amand
John, ld. Beauchamp	Thos. Percy, ld. Egremont
James, lord Audley	John Sutton, l. Dudley
Ralph, lord Cromwell	William Fynes, lord Say and Seal
Wm. lord Zouoh, of Harringworth
John, lord Scroop, of Masham
Wm. lord Fitzhugh

These great men, with the prelates, clergy, and commons, being assembled before the king, in the Painted Chamber at Westminster,

John Kempe, cardinal, abp. of York, and chancellor of England, by the king's command declared, "that this parl. was called to provide for the defence of the realm, the safe keeping of the seas, and to make provision for an army against the French; but particularly for suppressing of insurrections at home." To which end he desired the commons to choose and present their speaker, as usual.

A Speaker chosen.] But, according to the Record, it was not till November 10th, that the commons presented sir William Oldhall, knight, to be their Speaker, who was allowed, with the usual protestation. The first thing we find that this parl. went upon, was to devise several orders and regulations about altering the manner of collecting and paying the subsidy granted by the last parl.; though what regulations they were are not mentioned in the Abridgment. Nor is any thing else given us from the Record, except a complaint and appeal for a murder, though this session lasted above a month; when, on the 17th of Dec. the chancellor, in the presence of the king and the three estates, prorogued the parl. to the same place, on the 20th of Jan. following. And again, on the 29th day of April, it was also prorogued to the 5th of May next ensuing.

A Monopoly granted, in order to raise Money.] The first thing that we find now in this third session is a grant to the king of 20,000l. out of the customs of London and Southampton, by 100l. payments, to relieve his immediate wants and poverty. Besides, in consideration of 4000l. delivered to the king, in Allom, by some Genoese merchants there named, it was enacted, "that they shall be allowed to ship any staple ware out of the south of England, until they be answered the said sum." Also it was enacted, "that certain merchants of the south shall have all the allom aforesaid, on advancing to the king in hand 8000l. and that no man be allowed to bring, buy, or sell any other allom, for the space of two years, on pain of forfeiting the same." This was a strange Monopoly, and shewed the pressing occasions of the king and state for money at that time.

The Commons desire the removal of most of the King's Servants.] An extraordinary Petition of the commons was presented to the king, importing no less than the removal of most, or all his court from him. For it was desired, that Edm. duke of Somerset, Alice Poole, late wife of Wm. Poole, late duke of Suffolk, Wm. bp. of Chester, sir John Sutton, baron of Dudley, Wm. Daniel, late of London, esq. John Trevilian and Edw. Grimstone, of London, esqrs. Tho. Kemp, clerk of the commons, Reginald, abbot of st. Peter's, Gloucester, Tho. Pulford, of London, esq. John Hampton, Wm. Myners, John Blackwell, John Benerike, John Gergoran, Stephen Slegg, Tho. Stacey, Tho. Hore, the lord Hastings, sir Edm. Hungerford, sir Tho. Stanley, knights, Jenkin de Stanley, esq. usher of the king's chamber, Barthol.

Hawley, Ralph Balthorp, esqrs. sir Edmund Hampton, sir Robt. Wingfield, knights, Mr. Gervase Deberry, one of the king's secretaries, Mr. John Somerset, and Mr. John Newport of the Isle of Wight, "be banished from the king's presence during their lives, and not to come within 12 miles of the court, because the people spoke evil of them." The king's answer to this petition was, "that as to himself, he was well contented that they should go, unless they were lords, and a few others, whom he could not well spare from about his person, and so to continue absent for one year, to see if any man could truly lay any thing to their charge."

The Rebellion in Kent under Jack Cade.] Whether this last Petition was made in order to quiet the clamours of the people of Kent, &c. who were then up in arms under the conduct of Jack Cade, we know not. But a very severe act was passed this session against that rebel; whereby he was attainted of treason, all his lands, tenements, &c. given to the king, and his blood corrupted. But though our Records are somewhat silent as to the complaints of the commons under Cade, history is not so; but hath given us the contents of two bills, which it is said they exhibited to the houses, then sitting at Westminster, that they might have their concurrence with them in the reformation they were bringing about in the government. The first they called, "the complaints of the commons of Kent, and the causes of their assembling at Blackheath." The other paper they styled, "the requests of the great assembly in Kent." These complaints of Grievances, &c. having been seen and perused, as well by the lords and commons in parl. assembled, as by the king's council, were not only, says Daniel, "condemned and disapproved, but the authors of them voted proud and presumptuous rebels, not to be gratified with fair promises, but suppressed by force of arms." But Hollingshead says, more justly, as seems probable by the abstract from the records, that it does not appear the complaints of these people were rejected by parl. only that the council condemned them, as they would have done had they been more reasonable, considering the method of preferring them. However, it was not long after, that Jack Cade and his followers were put to flight by the king's army, and their leader slain, having had a price set on his head by proclamation.

A Parl. called.] A parl. was called, by writs dated the 20th of Jan. 1453, to meet at Reading on the 6th of March following; Rd. duke of York and Edm. duke of Somerset being the first persons named on the list. At the day appointed they all met at the refectory, within the abbey of Reading, when Wm. bp. of Lincoln, in the absence of John abp. of Canterbury, chancellor of England, declared the cause of the parl. to be chiefly for the good govt. of the realm, and safe defence of the same; to which end he bid the commons choose their Speaker, and present him, as usual.

A Speaker chosen.] And the next day, after the receivers and triers of petitions were appointed, the commons presented to the king Tho. Thorpe, esq. to be their Speaker, who, with the common protestation, was allowed.

A Subsidy granted.] The first thing they went upon this session was the Supply: when the commons granted to the king one 10th and one 15th, likewise tonnage and poundage during his life. The commons also granted to the king, for the same term, the subsidy on wools, that is, 23s. 4d. for every sack of denizens, and 5l. from aliens, and so for other staple-ware in proportion. Likewise, they gave the king, of every merchant not born within the realm, and no denizen, and keeping house, 40s. and of every such merchant as shall remain within the realm but 6 weeks, 20s. per an.; and of every merchant alien, being no denizen, 13s. 4d. yearly, during the king's life. After this, the Speaker came before the king, and declared that the commons had voted 20,000 archers for the king's service, for the term of half a year; and March the 18th, when these Money Bills were passed, and thanks for them given to the lords by the king himself; John, cardinal, abp. and chancellor, by the king's command, prorogued the parl. to the 20th of April then ensuing, at Westm.

Being met again, the king discharged the commons of 7000 archers, part of the 20,000 granted him last sessions: and a due proportion was settled, for every particular county in the realm, what they would bear towards the support of 13,000 men for his majesty's service; but, in consideration of a considerable sum of money, to be levied by the commons, the king was content to respite the raising the said 13,000 archers; unless, upon necessity, or being obliged to go in person to the wars, he be forced to take them.—The commons farther granted unto the king the moiety of one 10th and one 15th, for which the king returned them thanks in these words, viz. "We thank you for your grants; for the which be you assured, we will be a good and gracious lord unto you." The lord chanc. on the 2nd day of July, prorogued the parl. again to Reading, to the 7th of Nov. following. And at Reading, on the same day, we find that the parl. was adjourned from thence to the 11th of Feb. next, at Westminster. But on that day, John earl of Worcester, and treasurer of England, by the king's letters patents, made another short prorogation of three days, to the 14th of the said month at Westminster. On which day, being again assembled to do business, Rd. duke of York, by the king's letters patents, was appointed president in the said parl.

The d. of York's complaint against Thorp the Speaker, for a trespass.] On the same day, a remarkable case came before this parl. The Commons represented to the king and lords, that Tho. Thorp, their Speaker, and Walter

Rail, a member of their house, were both imprisoned; they therefore requested, that the said members might be set at liberty, according to the privileges of their house. The next day the duke of York stood up in the house of lords, and acquainted their lordships, "that he had received damages in an action of trespass against the said Thorp last term, by a verdict in the king's exchequer, for carrying away the goods of the said duke of York out of Durham-house; for the which he remained in execution, and prayed that he might continue there."

The advice of all the judges being taken in this matter, they made answer, "That it was not their part to judge of the parliament's actions, who were judges of the law themselves; only they said that a general supersedeas of the parliament there was not, but a special there was; in which case of special supersedeas, every member of the house of commons ought to enjoy the same; unless it be in cases of treason, felony, surety of the peace, or for a condemnation before the parl."—After which answer being given, the lords came to this resolution, "That the said Thos. Thorp should remain in execution, notwithstanding his privilege." And sent a committee of their own house to the commons to require them, on the king's behalf, to chuse a new Speaker. Accordingly a committee of the commons were sent to the lords to acquaint them that they had newly chosen, in the place of Thos. Thorp, sir Thos. Charlton, knight, for their Speaker; to which the chancellor answered, that the king approved of him, and willed them to proceed effectually.

The King's illness.] About this time, Henry fell dangerously sick at Clarendon; his sickness continued a long time, but, at last, he was perfectly recovered of it. The joy at court, on this occasion, was augmented by the birth of a young prince, who was christened by the name of Edward. A committee of the lords was appointed to go to the king, lying sick at Windsor, to learn his pleasure touching two articles; the 1st, to know who should be abp. of Canterbury, and who chancellor of England, in the place of John Kemp, by whose death they lay in the king's disposal. The 2nd, to know whether certain lords, there named, to be of the privy council, were agreeable to him, or not. On the 25th of March the said committee reported to the whole house, "that they had been to wait upon the king at Windsor, and after 3 several repairs thither, and earnest solicitations to speak with the king, they could by no means have answer, or token of answer, being only told the king was sick."

The D. of York appointed Protector.] And whereas the lords, on the 27th of March, had appointed the duke of York to be Protector and Defender of the realm, so long as the same shall please the king, the said duke thereupon required the answer of the lords to the articles following:—I. "That it be enacted, that the said duke doth take upon him the said office, by the particular appointment of the lords, and not of his own seeking or desire. Ans. The like articles shall be made for this, as was made during the king's minority.—II. That all the lords will assist the duke in his office. A. It is agreed by all lawful means. III. To prescribe the power thereby given to said duke. Ans. He shall be chief of the council, protector and defender, which implies a personal attendance against foreign invasion, and inward rebellion; but no authority of governance; and all this, so it be no prejudice to the prince.—IV. To appoint how much money the said duke shall take for the exercise of the said office. Ans. Precedents shall be searched, and the duke conferred withal about it, after which an act shall be made to settle it."

Then the king's letters patents were read in the house, appointing the said duke to be his chief counsellor, protector and defender of this realm, during the king's pleasure; or, unto such time as Edw. the prince shall come to age of discretion. Which great office the duke, in full parl. took upon him to perform. Hence it appears, says a late historian, that it was believed the king's indisposition would last as long as he lived, and that it affected his understanding more than his body. In the next place, adds he, by reserving this office, for a child of six months old, who was to exercise it when of age, the parl. shewed their intention to preserve entire the rights of the house of Lancaster, though the duke of York was declared Protector. Other letters patents were read, which were made to Edward the young prince, as in the 1 H. VI. with the yearly fee of 2000 marks only; besides allowances for learning to ride and such other exercises; provided the same be no ways prejudicial to any grant made to Margaret queen of England.—Again, the king, by his letters patents, created his son Edward prince of Wales, and earl of Chester, to him and to his heirs, kings of England, with the revenues thereunto belonging; which were confirmed by the hands of all the lords, and by the commons in parliament.—By the same authority the king granted to his queen Margaret, the sum of 1000l. yearly, for her life, out of the customs and subsidy of wools in the port of Southampton; besides sundry manors and hereditaments in the counties of Northampton, Southampton, and Oxfordshire, which were also confirmed to her by parliament.

In this parl. Thos. Courtney, earl of Devon, was accused of treason, and acquitted of the same by his peers; Humphry duke of Buckingham being high steward for the time being. But, because the duke of York judged the honesty of the said lord to be touched, the said earl made a public declaration of his loyalty before the house, and referred further trial of it, as a knight should do; on which the lords wholly acquitted him, as a loyal subject.

The commons required the lords to call to mind the hazard that the town of Calais was then in, and the safe keeping of the sea, and that the subsidy granted might be really employed to that purpose. They also desired the lords to excuse them from granting any other subsidies; finally, they required that a grave, or wise council should be established to answer all petitions, &c. which was promised.—It was ordained, that the mayor, constable, and fellowship of the merchants of the staple at Calais, shall be paid 10,000 marks out of the subsidy of wools there, which sum they lent towards the payment of the soldiers' wages in that place. The said mayor and merchants made several demands besides, which are not specified; to which they had answers given them. But Rd. duke of York, being appointed captain, or governor of Calais, and requiring satisfaction in 13 articles, or demands, concerning ready payment, and other proper supplies for keeping the same, could obtain no answer to them.—For the titles of the other acts passed in this parl. see the list at the end of this reign.

The Duke of York raises an Army, and takes the King prisoner.] It has been said, that the wars with France being now ended, the civil dissensions, between the two Houses of York and Lancaster, began in contending for the crown; though hitherto matters had been carried on both sides with moderation, the house of York having yet, not openly, made their claim to the regality, neither in parl. nor out; but only raised an army, under pretence of reforming abuses in the government. "The title this family had to the crown," says Daniel, "was very fair, according to the law of the land; Rd. the present duke, being great grandson of Lionel duke of Clarence, elder brother to John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, by whom the three Henrys derived their right to the crown. But Hen. VI. though his title was not so fair and clear, yet, not being the usurper himself, but succeeding upon the usurpation of his father and grandfather, two very great princes, and he being of known goodness and piety, had long kept possession of it. Therefore it required great art, cunning and force, in the duke of York, to wrest the diadem from him." Most of our historians relate, that the duke of Somerset was accused of treason, in the last parl. having been arrested some time before, and sent prisoner to the tower. How far this last circumstance may be true, is uncertain; but the former is apparently false, by the proceedings of that parl. given before. It is said further, "that the queen, who was as intent to save Somerset, as his enemies to destroy him, had so contrived matters, that nothing should be done against him; for the king, being somewhat recovered from his illness, and come well to his senses, she caused him, though very weak, to be carried to the houses, and there to dissolve the parl. so that nothing was determined in the matter." It is not possible to suppose that the careful abridger of the records would have overlooked this last circumstance; and therefore since he has taken no notice of it, we may well suppose it as erroneous as the former. Instead of that, Edmund duke of Somerset is the 2nd person on the list of the peers summoned to this parl. and he was ordered to be paid a very large sum due to him for fees, wages, &c. whilst he was governor of Calais, by consent of both houses.

It is certain, however, that the duke of York, finding he could not get Somerset removed from the king's, or rather the queen's, protection, raised another army and encamped with it near st. Albans. The king and his courtiers were as ready to oppose him, and a battle was fought near that town, May 23, anno 1455, in which the duke was victorious; and the duke of Somerset, the earls of Northumberland and Stafford, John lord Clifford, with many others, persons of note, and about 800 common men, were slain; and what rendered this victory more compleat, the king himself was taken prisoner.—The d. of York, and the lords his confederates, carried the king with them to st. Albans, and paid him all the honour and reverence due to his dignity. They besought him, on their knees, to forgive the action of that day, and accept them for his loyal subjects. For now the duke of Somerset, the common enemy of the nation, and the cause of this commotion being dead, he and all his adherents would remain, during their lives, his faithful and obedient subjects; and that he should find, that the destruction of Somerset was his own preservation.—With such artful speeches, they amused the poor king, who seemed well satisfied with their actions. After which the confederate lords spent their Whitsuntide together at London; where it was resolved to call a parl. to settle and compose things for the general good of the nation.

A Parl. called.] Writs were accordingly issued out for summoning a parl. dated May 26, at Westminster, to meet at the same place on the 9th of July 1455. It is to be noticed, that no peers on either side of the question were omitted in the summons; this list being conformable to the last, except in the names of the peers slain in the last battle.—Cotton begins his account of this parl. in this manner: "In the presence of the king, sitting in his chair of state, and of the lords and commons, Tho. Bourchier, abp. of Canterbury and chancellor of England, declared the cause of the parl. and took for his theme, &c. 'other report there is none.' Wherefore the chancellor willed the commons to chuse their Speaker, and the next day to present him to the king. And farther shewed to them, that the king's pleasure was, that all estates should enjoy their liberties." The next day the chancellor caused certain articles to be read before the houses containing the cause of the summons, which were divided as follows: first, to take order for the expences of the king's household. For the due payment of the garrison at Calais, and the marches there. To provide for keeping the seas against any invasion of the French; particularly to guard against the Scots, who had besieged Berwick, notwithstanding the truce. To appoint how and what time the 13,000 archers, granted last parl. should be employed. To procure a perfect accord and unity amongst the lords. To restrain the carrying out of gold and silver coin. To provide for better keeping of the seas. To take precaution that the peace may be kept in Wales. To every one of which articles, a committee of certain bps. and lords were severally appointed.

A Speaker chosen.] The day after, the commons presented sir John Wenlock to the king as their Speaker; who, with the usual ceremony, was allowed. The same day a long conveyance or charter, made by the king, whereby he acquitteth Rd. duke of York, Rd. earl of Warwick, and Rd. earl of Salisbury, of any disloyal practices, and taketh them to be his good and faithful subjects, was read and confirmed by parl. In which it is remarked, that Edm. late duke of Somerset, Tho. Thorp, and Wm. Joseph, esqrs. by their false dealings, had caused the king to think the contrary of these lords, and raise a great power against the duke and them.—Then some letters were read, wrote by the duke of York, and sent to the abp. of Canterbury, chancellor of England, dated from Royston, in May last, concerning his coming with an armed force to meet the king, in order to redress the grievances he had complained of: one of these was also signed by the earls and lords that accompanied him, and expressed their great obeysance and submission to his maj. But these letters, it seems, were kept from the king's knowledge, by the duke of Somerset, and others, until such time as the said duke of York, &c. met with the king at st. Albans last Monday, in order to have spoke with him; but that the duke of Somerset and others did resist them with a great number of armed men, in which conflict the said duke of Somerset was slain. Lastly, it was urged, that the duke of York and his allies, waited on his maj. very civilly, and made their humble obeysance to him after the battle.—Upon which the duke of York, and all his accomplices, were acquitted of coming with him to the said conflict or battle, and of any harm done at it. This was confirmed by the king, and the general consent of both the houses, and ordered to be enrolled, July 23. All the bps. and lords were sworn to be true to the king, in open parl. though none of their names are, as usual, entered upon the record. The same order was taken for all other lords that should come to parl. to take the like oaths.

At the request of the earls of Salisbury, Shrewsbury, and Worcester, and of the lord Stourton, who were made guardians of the seas, by the last parl. they were discharged from that office. And, July 31, the abp. of Canterbury, as chancellor, in the king's presence prorogued the parl. to the 12th of Nov. ensuing, at Westminster; after a general pardon had been granted by the king, and confirmed by their authority, for all treasons, felonies, contempts, trespasses, &c.

At the time appointed, the two houses met again; but here, it seems, the king was absent, for his letters patents were read the first day, constituting Rd. duke of York to preside in this session; which commisson was read publicly, first before the lords, and next before the commons.

The d. of York again appointed Protector.] On the 13th of Nov. a member of the Commons, whom Cotton calls only by the single name of Burley, with others, were appointed a committee from that body, to go to the lords, and require that the duke of York, and the lords, might move the king to appoint an able protector and defender of the realm, "since he would not himself attend the public service," and that the commons might be made acquainted with his person and character.—The next day the said Burley, and others of the commons, came again before the lords and renewed their suit about the Protectorship; as they did the day after. Upon this, the lords held a consultation on the affair, when it was resolved, that the duke of York was the most worthy for the office; and therefore a request was made to the said duke by the whole house, that he would take upon him the said Protectorship, according to the precedents used before on the like occasion; the duke excused himself from accepting the office, but desired respite to consider of it.—This consideration took up but a very little time; for, the next day, Burley and the rest coming, as before, to the lords, again repeated their desire. To which the ld. chanc. answered, that the king, with the assent of the lords, had requested the duke of York to be Protector and Defender of the Realm. The duke accepted of it, and made the same protestation and demand as he did in the last parl. and had the same answer. And, after the said duke had had some conference with a committee of the peers, appointed for that purpose, it was agreed, that he should have, yearly, towards his charges 4000 marks. Only, he desired that it might be recorded, he sought not this honour himself, but had it laid upon him by them.

But this great power, we suppose, was thought too dangerous to remain long in the duke's possession; for a short time after, before this parl. broke up, the king came in person to the house; and, as well by his letters patents, in the nature of a writ directed to Rd. duke of York, as by the whole consent of the said parl. revoked and repealed the power of Protector and Defender, and chief counselor, before committed to the said duke. And, at the same time the king committed the whole estate, affairs, and governance of the realm, to the lords of his council. Only, for matters concerning his person, they were not to proceed without making him privy to it.

In this parl. the king, by several letters patents, confirmed to his young son, Edw. prince of Wales, and his heirs, kings of England, his creation of the principality and earldom of Chester, with all the particular dominions and hereditaments belonging to the said honours. And, as it is recited, because the said prince, the king's first-born son, on the day of his birth is, and ought to be duke of Cornwall, the king delivered up the same to him, and all other hereditaments belonging to that dukedom. Also, it was ordained, that the said prince shall be at diet, and live in the king's court unto the age of 14; for the which diet, the king shall yearly take all the revenues and profits of the said principality, earldom, and dutchy of the said prince, until the said prince come to the age of 14. Allowing yearly, towards his wardrobe and servants wages 10,000 l. unto the age of 8; and from that to 14 years 20,000 marks yearly, with several other provisions there expressed, which were all confirmed by parliament.

At the request of the mayor and company of the staple at Calais, sir John Cheney, knt. victualler of that town, who by the appointment of the council had delivered to the said mayor and company certain of their obligations, to the sum of 2000 marks, which they lent the said sir John, by consent of parl. was acquitted of the same.—The king for 20,000 l. borrowed of the merchants of the staple, by the assent of parl. granted to them the repayment of the same, out of the customs and passage-dues in the ports of Sandwich and Southampton.—A particular allotment of 3934 l. 19s. 4½d. out of divers of the king's revenues, customs and fees, is allowed, yearly, towards the charges of the king's household.—A general act of resumption of all lands, offices, and fees, &c. from the first day of this king's reign, was passed, with several provisions made therein. And after all this business was transacted, Tho. abp. of Canterbury, and chancellor of England, by the appointment of the duke of York, the king's commissioner, in the presence of the lords and commons, prorogued the parl. from that day, Dec. 14, to the 14th of Jan. next ensuing, at Westminster. But though we hear no more of a meeting of this parl. yet it is necessary to learn what historians have collected relating to the proceedings of it, that the reader, by comparing them with the foregoing account from the Records, may better come at the source of the mischiefs, which soon after involved all England in blood and ruin.

Resolutions against the Queen, &c.] This parl. says Daniel, met on the day appointed, July 9th, in order indeed to settle things according to the will of the conquering lords, but under a pretence of doing all for the public good. Some few acts were made, more for the colour of justice than the common safety. These acts were passed and published, to let the people see what a reformation they might expect if the popular lords had the rule. But they only served as a curious prologue to what followed, and was chiefly intended, viz. the following Votes and Resolutions:—"That the govt. as it was managed by the queen, duke of Somerset, and their friends, had been of late a great injustice and oppression to the people. That the king, who was himself a pious and good prince, had been abused by those who counselled and advised him, to his great dishonour. That the duke of Gloucester, whose memory had been stained with a charge of treason and rebellion since his death, was a true and faithful subject both to the king and realm. That all manner of alienations and gifts of the revenues and lands of the crown, whether made by the king himself, or parl. from the 1st year of his reign, should be revoked, and the said lands and revenues resumed and taken into the king's hands. That no person or persons should judge or report that the duke of York, with the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, were guilty of rebellion or treason, in coming against the king in a warlike manner to st. Alban's; since the action was necessary, and taken in hand to free the king from captivity, and bring peace and safety to the nation; but all the blame was to be laid on the duke of Somerset, lord chief baron Thorpe, and Wm. Joseph, esq. who, out of a malicious and evil design, kept a letter, sent by the lords, from the king's knowledge; which, if it had been delivered to the king's maj. would have taken away the cause of these disorders."

—By these votes and acts, adds our authority, they made way for the resolution, which was the main drift of all; by which it was appointed, that the duke of York should be Protector of the realm, and the earl of Salisbury lord chanc. and the earl of Warwick governor of Calais and the territories thereunto belonging. So that all authority, civil and military, was in a manner put into the hands of the confederate lords, and Henry had only his title of king, without any other power. Under this establishment the lords were very careful to administer justice impartially, to avoid delays of suits, and to punish bribery, in order to ingratiate themselves with the people.

But this exalted power, so snatched as it was, continued on its basis but for a short time, for the queen soon found means to overturn it. Notwithstanding the loss of the duke of Somerset and others in the battle at st. Alban's, she had then several very eminent lords in her interest; and, being a lady of a masculine spirit, she was not afraid to undertake any thing to keep up the dignity of her husband's crown. It is probable that she caused the king to revoke the grant of the Protectorship to the duke of York, in the last session of parl. before it was prorogued: as it is particularly mentioned in the Records, though all our historians are silent about it, and only say, that the duke and the earl of Salisbury were displaced from their offices, by an express order, under the great seal, some time after the parl. broke up. See Hollingshead, p. 646.

Agreement between the Queen's party, and the confederate Lords.] The queen and her party being again restored to the govt. kept their ground for some time, though the discontented lords watched all opportunities to dislodge them. Some tumults and skirmishes happened betwixt the two parties, and another general battle was dreaded; to prevent which, the pious king and his bps. interfered, and terms of accommodation were offered to reconcile them. A grand meeting of the heads of both parties appeared at London, with numerous retinues of armed followers; and there, sword-in-hand, as it were, a seeming reconciliation was effected, the terms of which are contained in 8 articles. Which award or agreement was sealed with the great seal, in the king's palace at Westminster, March 24, 1458.

The Quarrel renewed.] Affairs continued in a peaceable manner after this but a very short time; for the same year an affray happening near the king's palace at Westminster, between a servant of the king's and some of the earl of Warwick's, the quarrel run so high, that many joining on each side, the earl himself had like to have been slain, who came to appease it. Taking this as a design of the queen's to murder him, and fearing worse might happen, he hastened down to York, where, meeting with the duke and his father, they soon concerted measures together to begin a new commotion. The civil war was again entered into with great warmth on both sides; but fortune did not favour the d. of York and his party in this second attempt; for when the two armies were come so near that a battle was expected, the king's proclamation of a general pardon for past offences, caused most of the duke's followers to throw down their arms and accept it; and their leaders were forced to fly into different countries for protection.

A Parl. called.] Henry having thus gained a victory, without bloodshed, came to Coventry; where he had summoned a parl. to meet on the 20th of Nov. 1460. It appears by the list of the lords, called to this parl. that it was wholly made up of those who were staunch friends to the house of Lancaster: though the abps. bps. &c. were summoned as usual. On the day of their meeting, the king sitting in his chair of state, in the Chapter-house, belonging to the priory of our lady at Coventry, the lords and commons being, also, present, Wm. bp. of Winchester, then chanc. made a notable declaration, says our authority, why this parl. was called. But he gives us no more of it, than that he willed the commons to choose their Speaker, and present him the next day to the king. Accordingly, the commons presented Tho. Tresham, esq. whose excuse being rejected, with the common protestation, he was allowed.

The duke of York, &c. attainted.] The first thing this parl. went upon, was to bring in, and pass a Bill of Attainder against Rd. duke of York, and others, his accomplices. The instrument is very long, and contains, amongst other matters, the following charges:—1st.

"A commemoration of the king's great care in bringing the said duke up from a child; and the many kindnesses and honours, he had bestowed upon him. Next, the confederation of the said duke with Jack Cade, to get himself advanced to the crown. The duke's coming out of Ireland with forces, even, into the king's court and presence. His practices to be protector. His intent to have raised an army against the king at Dartford in Kent. The duke's submission and oath to the king in Paul's, after the same. The duke's oath at large. His confederacy with the earls of Warwick and Salisbury. A rehearsal of the king's sundry favours and benefits conferred on the said two earls. The king's pardon granted to the said duke and earls, and their promises of due obedience, with a renumeration of divers benefits bestowed upon them after. The ambition of the said duke and earls; their new oaths and promises made to the king; their policy in not coming to the council; and their readiness in getting together from a great distance. The expedition of the earl of Salisbury, with Tho. and John Nevile, knights, sons to the said earl; Tho. Parkin, Wm. Stanley, esqrs. sons to Tho. lord Stanley; and Tho. Oringe of Tongue in the county of York, with 500 men and banners displayed at Bloreheath, on the feast of st. Matthew, an. reg. 37. James lord Audley slain at the battle of Bloreheath, in Staffordshire, by the said earl; and John lord Dudley, with several others taken prisoners. The king's pursuing them for the space of 30 days and nights; the king's pardon offered to them, and their refusal. The assembly of the said duke with Edw. e. of March, Rd. e. of Warwick, Rd. e. of Salisbury, Edm. e. of Rutland, John lord Clinton, John Wenlock, Js. Pickering, John Coniers and Tho. Parr, knights; John Bouchier and Edw. Bouchier, esqrs. nephews to the said duke; Tho. Colt of London, gent. John Clay of Cheshunt in Hertfordshire, Roger Egerton of Shrewsbury, and Rob. Bold, brother to sir M. Bold, esqrs.; who, with many others, pitched their field near Ludlow in the county of Hereford, on Friday, the vigil of the translation of st. Edw. an. reg. 38. That the duke made a pretence to the army that the king was dead, for whose soul mass was said publicly in the said duke's camp. The king's expectation of the duke, and the duke's ranging his army in battle array, fortifying the ground with carts, placing guns between them; an ambush laid, and his intention to have suddenly surprised the king's forces. The departure of the said duke and earls out of the field, about midnight, under colour to repose themselves at Ludlow; and their flight into Wales, because that their army fainted and submitted themselves to the king, who granted them pardon."

Wherefore, for these and many other causes, the said duke, earls, and others, were attainted of Treason by parl. and voted traitors to the king and kingdom; Alice the wife of Rd. earl of Salisbury, sir Wm. Oldhall, knt. and Tho.

Vaughan, of London, esq. were, at the same time attainted as traitors, for procuring and aiding the treasons aforesaid. And all and singular hereditaments, &c. of the said duke, and others, attainted, in fee or fee-tail, were adjudged to be forfeited to the crown; and their heirs disinherited to the 9th generation. Rd. Gray, lord Powis, sir H. Radford, and Walter Devereux, esq. were pardoned their lives, for being in the field with the duke at Ludlow; but their hereditaments, and other profits, were forfeited as before. It was enacted, "That all letters patents and grants of any office to any person that was against the king in the fields of st. Albans, Bloreheath, and Ludlow, shall be void; and that all grants made by Rd. duke of York, or by the earls of Salisbury and Warwick to any persons, being in those fields against the king, be also, void. But that all grants made by the king to persons with him in the said fields, may stand good; some proviso's excepted." At the request of the commons, Walter Hopton, Roger Kenistone, Falk Stafford, Wm. Hastings, son to sir Leonard Hastings, and Wm. Bowes, esqrs. for being in the field against the king at Ludlow, paid their fines, and were pardoned. At the same time the Commons accused the lord Stanley, in sundry particulars, of being in confederacy with the duke of York; and prayed, that he may be committed to prison. Ans. The king will be advised. After which a solemn oath was framed, which all the bps. and lords, there named, did take, subscribe and seal, on the 11th day of Dec. in full parliament.

In this parl. the commons exhibited a complaint against 25 knights and esquires, byname, of several counties, for their manifold robberies, rapes, and executions; against which strict orders were taken to cause them to answer for the same.—It was enacted, "that all letters patents made to any person or persons, of the offices of sheriffs or escheators for life, within the counties of Chester and Flint, be utterly void; except certain persons there named." Lastly, an act was passed, "that all such knights of any county, as were returned to this parl. by virtue of the king's letters, without any other election, should be valid; and that no sheriff, for returning them, shall incur the penalty of the statute made 23 Hen. VI."—After all which, on the 25th of Dec. the chancellor, in the presence of the king and the three estates, and by his majesty's command, after giving thanks to the whole body, dissolved this parl.—These were the transactions of this extraordinary parl. extracted from the records; of which our historians are almost altogether silent; nor is there any mention of it in the Statutes at Large, except that we find an act was made in the next to repeal and abolish all the proceedings of this parl. at Coventry.

The King again taken Prisoner.] But not long after their rising, affairs had a new turn; and the partizans of the house of York overthrew all the measures that had been taken against them. A battle was fought near Northampton, with great obstinacy on both sides; till at length the victory fell to the young earl of March, eldest son to the duke of York, who, in his father's absence in Ireland, was general in chief: 10,000 of the king's forces were slain; amongst whom were Humph. duke of Buckingham, John Talbot earl of Shrewsbury, Tho. lord Egremont, John visc. Beaumont and sir Wm. Lacy. The king himself was again taken prisoner in his tent; whilst the queen, with the young prince Edw. her son, and the duke of Somerset, fled as far as the bishopric of Durham, before they thought themselves safe from the pursuers. This battle was fought July 10th, 1460.

A Parl. called.] The victorious lords having the king once more in their power, and ruling all things, almost at their own pleasure, proceeded vigorously in the execution of their designs. To that end, they summoned a parl. to meet at Westminster, on the 7th of Oct.—In the presence of the king, sitting in his chair of state, in the Painted Chamber at Westminster, and of the lords and commons, George bp. of Exeter, then chancellor of England, made a notable declaration, taking for his theme, 'congregate populum, & sanctificate ecclesiam,' Joel 2. At the conclusion of which, the commons were desired to chuse their Speaker, and present him to the king. The next day the commons made a declaration to the chancellor, that they had made choice of a Speaker; and, on the 4th day of this session, they presented John Green, esq. whose excuse being refused, he was admitted as usual.

Acts of the late Parl. at Coventry repealed.] The first thing this parl. went upon, was to pass an act to repeal the last, held at Coventry, Nov. 20th, 38 Hen. VI. and that all acts, statutes, and ordinances, made by the authority of the said parl. shall be reversed. For which this reason is assigned, "because that parl. was unlawfully summoned, and the knights and burgesses not duly chosen."

The D. of York's claim to the Crown.] We are now arrived at the moment when Richard duke of York made his public claim to the crown of England, in the face of an English parl.—On the 16th of Oct. says Cotton, the council for the duke of York exhibited a writing to the lords, in full parl. containing the Right and Claim of the said duke to the crown of England, and lordship of Ireland. The lords, upon some consultation amongst themselves, agreed that it should be read, but not answered without the king.—The duke, in his claim, derived his pedigree from Henry III. to Edw. III. and proved himself descended in a right line from Lionel duke of Clarence, 3rd son to Edw. III. by which he avouched himself the undoubted heir to the crown before any of the line of John of Gaunt, who was only the 4th son to the said king Edw.

The lords, after a long consultation, thought proper to lay this Claim and Title before the king, who desired them to call the judges, king's serjeants, and the attorney-general, to answer the same. But they, well considering the danger in meddling with this high affair, utterly refused to be concerned in it. Upon which an order was made, that every peer might freely and indifferently speak his mind, without fear and impeachment. And in the end the following objections were made to the duke's claim:—I. "The oaths of all the lords taken to the king in being, and particularly the oath of the duke himself. II. The several acts of parl. made against the title of the said duke. III. Several acts of entail made of the crown of England. IV. That the duke, by pretending to draw his title from Lionel duke of Clarence, should rather bear his arms, than those of Edm. Langley duke of York. V. That at the time Henry IV. took upon him the crown of England, he had the same, not as conqueror, but as right heir to Henry III."

The Answer which Rd. Plantagenet, commonly called duke of York, gave to the objections aforesaid, was as follows: 1st. "That no oath, being the law of man, ought to be performed or kept, when the same tendeth to the suppression of truth and right, which is against the law of God. To the 2nd and 3rd, he knoweth no other acts of parl. than one, 1 Hen. IV. touching a general tail by him a wrong-doer; for if he had any right to the same, he neither needed, nor would have made such an entail. To the 4th, he justly might have born the arms of the duke of Clarence, and of England; only he forbore the same for a time, as he did his claim to the crown. The 5th, being a manifest, and an approved untruth, was only a cloak to shadow the violent usurpation of Henry of Derby."

After this Answer of the duke, to the objections against his title, was read in the house, the lords went upon ways and means to compromise matters, and came to this resolution, "That the king should enjoy the crown of England, during his life; and that the duke and his heirs should succeed after him." Which determination the chancellor was appointed to declare to the king. And the duke of York's pedigree and title being again repeated to him, the king consented to this award; and it was drawn up in form following: "That the king should, during his life, enjoy the crown and pre-eminence of the realm of England. That the said duke, the earl of March, and Edm. earl of Rutland, his sons, should be sworn by no means to shorten the days, or impair the sovereignty of the said king, during his life. That the said duke should be from thenceforth reputed and stiled the very heir apparent to the crown aforesaid, and shall enjoy the same after the death or resignation of the said king. That the said duke shall have lands and hereditaments allotted to him of the clear yearly value of 10,000 marks; that is, 5000 for himself, 3500. for the earl of March, and 1500 marks for the earl of Rutland.

That the compassing the death of the said duke shall be treason. That all the bps. and lords, in full parl. shall swear to the said duke and to his heirs, in form aforesaid. That the said duke, and his two sons, shall swear to defend the lords on this agreement."

The king, on his own free motion, and the consent of the lords, agreed to all the ordinances aforesaid; and utterly repealed the said statute of entail, made, Hen. IV. so, always as, hereafter, no better title could be proved for the defeating of this title and act.—After all this, on the vigil of the feast of All Saints, the duke of York, and the two earls, his sons, came into the parl. before the king and lords; and there both promised and swore to perform the award aforesaid; provided the king, on his part, duly performed the same; which the king then also promised to do. All which protestation the duke and earls required to be enrolled.—Then the king, by his letters patents, assigned to the duke of York several districts and other hereditaments in Wales, and elsewhere, to the yearly value of 10,000 marks as aforesaid; in which grant are some provisoes, particularly for the dutchy of Lancaster. All this was confirmed by the full consent of parl. and an act was published "declaring the duke of York to be right heir to the crown; by which also a power was given him, to ride through the whole kingdom, for suppressing of all rebellions and insurrections: wherein commandment is given to all sheriffs, officers and subjects, to obey him as the king, under some restrictions."

Mr. Daniel tells us, that after the victorious lords, who had now the king in their power, had caused him to call a parl. they sent messengers, with all speed, to Ireland, to inform the duke of York of their success. Ambition, says our author, needs no spurs; the duke presently embarked himself and his retinue at Dublin, landed at Chester, and Oct. 10, made his public entry into London; with trumpets sounding, a naked sword borne before him, a great train of armed men accompanying him; and took up his lodging in the king's own palace, and in his own apartments, the humble king contenting himself with the queen's lodgings.—The parl. had sat 3 days before the duke arrived; and he having passed through the city, in the manner aforesaid, went directly to Westminster, into the house of peers, and placed himself on the king's seat or throne; though Biondi says, that he did not sit down, but only took hold of the cloth of state. He stood a while in that posture, looking upon the lords stedfastly, as though he would read their countenances, their thoughts, and resentment of that action. At that instant, Thomas Bourchier, abp. of Canterbury, came from Henry into the house, and after making the usual reverence to the duke he asked him, "Whether he would not go and pay his respects to the king?" The duke, at this question, was observed to change colour, and then answered him in a passion, "That he knew none in this kingdom.

to whom he owed that duty or honour; but, on the contrary, all men owed it to him; and therefore king Henry ought to come to him.'—The abp. having heard this reply, went back to the king to let him know it; which the duke perceiving, he rose up and followed him into the palace, got possession of the king's lodgings, breaking open several doors and locks for entrance. He staid there but a little while, and then returned to the house again, leaving his servants and chief attendants to keep them for him. Being again seated on the throne, he boldly made his demand of the crown and the regal authority of England, in a speech for that purpose.

The Duke of York slain.] To put the last hand to this affair, the duke of York was very desirous that the queen and her son should also be present to ratify the treaty. The king wrote to them both to come up, but he soon found the spirit of that fierce princess otherwise disposed than his own. In short, she absolutely refused to obey; and having an army with her of 18,000 men, with the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, the earls of Wiltshire and Devonshire, the lord Clifford, and a considerable party of the northern nobility, she hoped to manage better for their common interest than her husband had done.—The duke of York being apprised of the queen's resolution, and the preparations she had made to preserve the crown to her son, marched down his forces into the north; and, leaving Henry to the care of the earl of Warwick and the duke of Norfolk, advanced with the earl of Salisbury as far as Wakefield. He had given orders to his son, the earl of March, to follow and join him with what forces he could raise; and, till their arrival secured himself and his small army in the castle of Sandal, near the town aforesaid. The queen well knew that she had no time to lose, and therefore came herself in person, at the head of her army, to attack the duke before his son could come to his assistance. The duke was scarce 5000 strong, but his great courage was the occasion of his ruin, for scorning to be cooped up in a castle by a woman, contrary to the advice of the earl of Salisbury and other old officers, he ventured to give her battle; where, being overpowered by numbers, he bravely fell, and his small army were cut in pieces. With him was slain also the earl of Salisbury, with many more of note; but none is so remarkable as the death of the young earl of Rutland, scarce 17, who was butchered by the lord Clifford after the battle was over, because he had the misfortune to be son to the duke of York. The queen was highly elated at this victory, and the death of her greatest enemy: she first ordered his head to be struck off, crowned with paper in derision, and, with the heads of the earl of Salisbury, and others, set on one of the gates of York. She then marched southward with her victorious army to deliver her husband; and, in a new parl. to get the late accommodation with the house of York annulled, and set aside. For some time longer fortune was her friend; she defeated the earl of Warwick near St. Alban's, retook the king, and marched for London with her forces, in order to compleat her design. But hearing that the young earl of March, now duke of York, had beaten the earl of Pembroke in Wales, and was marching towards her, joined with the earl of Warwick and his scattered troops, she changed her rout and went northward, not having any confidence in case of a battle, in the Londoners, or her southern subjects.

Edward proclaimed King.] Edward being informed of this, marched directly for the capital, where he was joyfully received; and having assembled all the bishops and lords that were in town, along with the principal citizens, like Alexander, he cut the knot at one stroke, which his father had so long been endeavouring to unloose. In short, in that assembly, he claimed the crown, first by an undoubted hereditary right; and next by an infraction of the 7th article in the Accord, made between Henry and his father, in the last parl. which the said Henry had broken. The affair was pushed so warmly, that he was upon the spot declared king, by the name of Edward IV. March the 5th, 1461; being then just 20 years of age. The next day he made a solemn procession through the city, first to St. Paul's, and next to Westminster-abbey; and was proclaimed king by the title aforesaid, with the usual ceremonies.

Taxes during the Reign of Henry VI.

In his 1st year the commons granted to the king the same subsidy on woollen or staple wares, tunnage and poundage as formerly, for two years to come.—In his 2nd year the same tax was renewed.—In his 3rd year the former subsidies on wools was granted for 3 years longer; and tonnage and poundage for one year; upon condition, that foreign merchants should be strictly looked to for their duties.—In his 4th year the same subsidy on wools, &c. with tonnage and poundage, was granted for two years, as in the preceding parliaments.—In his 6th year the parl. granted a subsidy of 3s. a tun for all wine imported, and 1s. in the pound for all merchandize. Besides this, there was a kind of a Poll-Tax on every parish that was worth ten marks per ann. ten of the chief parishioners were to pay 6s. 8d. a head. And in every parish worth 10l. a year, the like number of parishioners were each to pay a mark. In all corporations, every person worth above 20s. besides his apparel and household goods, was to pay 4d. each to the king; and so proportionably for every 20 they were worth more.—In his 8th year a Supply was granted of one whole 10th and one 15th, to be levied on the laity. The commons, at the special instance of the bp. of Winchester, just then made a cardinal, granted another 10th and a 15th, to be levied as above. They also gave the king a grant of tunnage and poundage, to continue till the next parl.—In the same session they gave the king the same subsidy on wools, as was granted in former parliaments, for two years. And at the same time, they consented to shorten the payment of the last 10th and 15th, to relieve the pressing necessities of the state.—In his 9th year the parl. granted a supply of one 10th and one 15th, and a third of both. They also gave tonnage and poundage for two years, with a subsidy of the like value on all merchants aliens, over and above the said tonnage and poundage. The commons also granted to the king 20s. from every layman holding a knight's fee, and according to the value under or over. The same from the clergy for all lands purchased since the 20th Edw. I. And that all other persons, having hereditaments to the value of 20l. over all reprises not held as above, shall also pay 20s. and so according to rate: but this was afterwards given up by the king.—In his 10th year he had one 10th and half a 15th; also one year's subsidy on wools, and the same tonnage and poundage, as in the last parl. But he released the increase of 6d. in the pound on merchant-strangers.—The next year the parl. granted a 10th and a 15th, to be levied on the laity. They likewise granted the same tonnage and poundage given the last year, for two years to come; as also a subsidy of 53s. 4d. on every sack of wool for three years ensuing; and besides this a vote of credit of 100,000 marks.—In his 14th year a very unusual subsidy was granted, viz. That every person holding any frank tenant in lands, annuities, fees, offices, or hereditaments, above the yearly value of 5l. should pay 6d. for every pound, upon his oath; and a 10th and a 15th was granted on the laity. A subsidy also on every sack of wool, 33s. 4d. from merchants denizens, and 46s. 8d. from aliens; and so according to that rate on other staple ware, with tonnage and poundage for two years.—In his 15th year the subsidies granted were the like 10th and 15th, as in the last. Also the same subsidy on wools, &c. was granted for 3 years to come.—In his 18th year a 10th and a 15th, and half a 15th, was granted to be levied of the laity, as in his fourth year. An impost on wools was also granted for 3 years; and that all aliens, not denizens, within the realm, should pay to the king yearly 16d. for each, being an housekeeper; being none 6d.—In his 23rd year a 10th and a 15th, and a half of both, was granted by parl. A subsidy also of 34s. 4d. of denizens, and 53s. of aliens, for every sack of wool, &c. with tonnage and poundage of denizens, and double of aliens, was granted to the king for four years.—In his 27th year a grant of a 10th and half a 15th, to be levied on the laity, passed both houses; with a grant also of tonnage and poundage, for 5 years to come, on all merchants whatsoever, with an addition of 3s. more on aliens, as well of the Hans-towns as otherwise. Another grant was also made of half a 10th and a whole 15th. Likewise a poll-tax was again renewed and granted to the king of 16d. to be taken of every householder within the realm, not born within the king's dominions, and 6d. of every other person so born, and no householder; with 6s. 8d. of every merchant-stranger, and 20d. of their clerks. Lastly, the like subsidy on wools was granted for four years, as before.—The next year the following subsidy was granted, viz. That every person having by free deed, copy, grant of annuity, or office, the clear yearly value of 20s. in frank-tenement, should pay 6d. and so from 20s. to 20l. From 20l. to 200l. yearly, 12d. in the pound: from 200l. and upwards 2s. for every pound, as well laity as clergy; guardians of wards, men having fees, and all corporations to pay accordingly.—In his 29th year he had a grant of 20,000l. out of the customs of London and Southampton; and a very extraordinary monopoly was granted in order to raise money.—In his 31st year the commons granted one 10th and one 15th; likewise tonnage and poundage during his life. For the same term 53s. 4d. for every sack of denizens, and 5l. from aliens, and so for other staple-ware in proportion. Likewise every merchant, not born within the realm, and no denizen, and keeping house, 40s. and of every such merchant, as shall remain within the realm but six weeks, 20s. And of every merchant alien, being no denizen, 13s. 4d. yearly, during the king's life.

“In his 20th, or according to some authors,” says sir John Sinclair, “in the 22nd year of his reign, the king required a benevolence for the purpose of defending Calais, at that time in imminent danger. These contributions were originally accounted perfectly free and voluntary; they were called ‘liberalitas populi’ by Richard I. ‘curialitas’ by such of his successors as attempted to raise them; and proceeded according to Henry the V.’s confession, ‘ex spontanea voluntate, ac de jure vindicari non possunt.’ But the instructions given by this monarch to his commissioners for procuring the benevolence, contained a very different doctrine. It is there stated, that by law he could compel all his subjects, at their own charges, to attend his wars; but that he was willing to spare such as would contribute as much as two days personal service would stand them in, according to their rank and quality. Thus he publicly declared, that if they did not tax themselves, money would be exacted from them by other means much less pleasing. There is extant in the rolls of parliament, a very particular account of this monarch's revenue, from which it appears, that the annual produce, in consequence of the decrease of the customs, and mismanagement in the collection, had fallen to 64,946l. 16s. 4d.; and such were the deductions from it, and the expences of government, that the charges exceeded the receipts 35,000l. per annum. Nay, it was afterwards declared in parliament, that the income of the crown was reduced by grants, pensions, and otherwise, to only 5000l. During Henry's minority, the revenues of the crown had been greatly diminished by the arts and negligence of those who were in power, and in consequence of the expences incurred in carrying on the war against France, which were principally defrayed from the income of the crown, the parliament furnishing very little assistance. Nor were matters much amended when the king took the government into his own hands: for he suffered himself to be defrauded by his ministers, who devoured the greatest part of his revenues, and who, in the words of an ancient record, gave away the rights, possessions, and profits of the crown, in the manner of a spoil. Different steps were taken by parl. and by his council, to improve the king's situation. In the parl. held anno 1450, a full resumption was made, of all the grants which had taken place since the death of Henry V. To prevent the king from wasting his revenues, his council advised him to convey to the archbishop of Canterbury, in trust, all the profits of wards, marriages, reliefs, escheats, and forfeitures, to defray the expences of the household; and in the 29th year of his reign, those expences were reduced by parl. to 12,000l. per annum; whereof 2000l. was paid out of the queen's jointure, or separate estate. His debts, at the same time, amounted to the enormous sum of 372,000l.; towards the payment of which, the parl. was obliged to give some assistance; and his reign furnishes one of the first examples in the English history, of a debt being contracted on that species of security."

Price of Provisions and Labour during the Reign of Henry VI.; by which a better Idea may be formed of the Value of the foregoing Taxes.

In 1423, wheat sold for 8s. a qr. and malt for 5s.—In 1425, a colt sold for 8s. Pease for 2s. 2d. a qr.; and for 3d. & 1-8th a bushel. An ox's hide for 2s. 5d. A cow's hide for 1s. 3½d. and for 1s. 7½d. A calf's skin for 1½d. Twenty-one lambs for 4s. A dozen of sheep-skins for 3s. A tod of pure wool for 9s. 6d. the tod. Nineteen ells of napkin cloth sold for 5s. A gallon of ale for 1½d. Red wine at 8d. a gallon, or flaggon. Sweet wine at 1s. 4d. A stone catter for a day's labour 4d. A tyler 3½d. A sawyer 4d. For twenty pullets 1s. 8d. For a qr. of an ox to salt 1s. 4d. For a cade of red herrings (720 the cade) 8s. For a frail of figs 3s. 4d. For 12lb. of raisins 1s. 1d. For a great flesh-ax 1s. 4d. For 2 yards of russet cloth for the shepherd 2s. 2d. For 4 qrs. of wheat to be malted 16s. For a bay horse, for the prior's stable, 1l. 6s. 3d. For two colts 9s. For 30 pair of autumnal (winter) gloves for the servants 4s. To the baker's servant for 10 days 1s. For threshing a qr. of wheat 3½d. For 8 woodcocks for a present 1s. For 12 pair of gloves to the bp. of Worcester's servants 5s. For one man plowing and harrowing 12 days 1s.—In 1426, five oxen, each appraised at 3s. 4d. Six cows, each at 2s. 8d. Three horses, each at 3s.—In 1435 and 1436, wheat, on account of a wet autumn in 1434, sold for 1l. 6s. 8d. but the year following it fell to 5s. 4d.—In 1439, wheat sold for 20s. a qr.; and also in some places for 1l. 6s. 8d.—In 1440, the scarcity still continuing, wheat sold for 1l. 4s. a qr.; and malt for 13s. Oats 5s. 4d. Wine 1s. a gallon; and bay salt 1s. a bushel. See Fabian, Kennett, Spelman and Stowe.—From 1444, we have the following account by bp. Fleetwood, viz. For 100 qrs. of wheat 21l. 13s. 4d. each qr. at 4s. 4d. For two bushels of wheat for seed 1s. For two bushels of pease (for seed also) 1s. For 5 qrs. of pease 15s. For 50 qrs. of malt 10l. For six calves 12s. For eight porkers 1l. 4s. without the heads. For 40 geese 10s. For 31 doz. of pigeons 10s. 8d. For 15 doz. of pigeons 7s. 6d. For 100 doz. of pigeons, each doz. at 5½d. For an ox 1l. 11s. 8d. For eight cignets, or young swans, each 3s. For a flitch of bacon 1s. 8d. For 4 oxen, young and lean, 52s. For 26 warp of ling 1l. 10s. 4d. For 100 stockfish 17s. 6d. For a barrel of herrings, i. e. 30 gallons fully packed, 1l. For two plough oxen 1l. 3s. For a qr. of oats 1s. 8d. For 3 bushel of green pease, for seed, 2s. 3d. At this time it appears, that master-traders wrought by the day at 3d. and their labourers or servants at 1d. But then it is believed they had their meat and drink. The yearly wages were, some 1l. 6s. 8d. and others 1l.—In 1445, 7½ qrs. of wheat came to 30s. which is, each qr. at 4s. 6d. Oats, by the qr. at 2s. Twelve flaggons, or gallons of ale 1s. 6d. Hay, by the load, 3s. 6½d. For 3000 red herrings 1l. 11s. Twenty-four bullocks and heifers 6l. each head at 5s. Cloth for surplices for scholars, the ell, at 8d. This was the same as used at the altar; and therefore, in those days was certainly fine.—In 1447, wheat, by the qr. 8s. Oats, the qr. 2s. 1½d.—In 1448, wheat, by the qr. 6s. 8d. Oats, the qr. 2s. A cade of red herrings 5s. 8d. A barrel of white herrings 9s. 3d. In 1449, wheat, by the qr. 5s. A cade of red herrings 6s. A barrel of white herrings 10s. 3d. Fifteen sheep, at 1l. 16s. 10d. each sheep at (within ½) 2s. 5½d. Seven hogs, at 13s. 8d. each hog at (within ½) 1s. 11½d.—In 1450, oats the qr. 1s. 10d. beans the qr. 2s. 6d.—In 1451, wheat, by the qr. at 8s. Oats the qr. 10s. 10½. 26 gallons of ale 3s. each gal. at 1½d. Beans, the qr. 3s. 4d. For a cade of red herrings 7s. 4d. For a barrel of white herrings 13s. 7d.—In 1453, wheat, by the qr. 5s. 4d. Ale, per gallon 1½d. A cade of red herrings 7s. 6d. Fourscore white herrings 1s.—In 1454, oats by the qr. 1s. 10½d.—In 1455, wheat very cheap, the qr. at 1s. 2d. Malt, the qr. at 1s. 5d.—In 1457, wheat, by the qr. 7s. 3d. Oats the qr. 1s. 9½d. A gallon of ale 1d. A cade of red herrings at 6s. 8d. 92 white herrings 1s.—In 1459, wheat by the qr. 5s. Oats the qr. 3s. 10d. A gallon of ale, 1d. A cade of red herrings, at 7s. 10½d. 92 white herrings, at 1s.—In 1460, wheat the qr. at 8s. Oats the qr. 2s. A gallon of ale at 1d. A cade of red herrings, at 7s. 192 white herrings, at 2s.—Here the bp. takes notice, that from 1440 to 1460, wheat was never above 8s. the qr. notwithstanding the sword was drawn betwixt the houses of York and Lancaster, which usually cuts down corn, as well as men.

EDWARD IV.

Edward having thus obtained the title of king, vi et armis, as it were, had yet much to do to get possession of the crown; for the heroic Margaret was still at the head of an army, composed of all the forces belonging to the red-rose party; fighting for a king who had been long recognised as such, and who had been twice victorious in what was then called the royal cause. Edward, therefore, had no time to lose; he knew very well that he had no other way to secure London, but to leave it immediately, and march towards York. The queen was then in that city; and hearing of his approach, she sent out her army, commanded by the duke of Somerset, the earl of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford, to meet him. Some advantage was gained by these generals at first, by the surprise of the important post of Ferrybridge; but the Yorkists having quickly regained it, they marched over the river Aire, and met the bulk of the queen's army, drawn up in order of battle, in the fields near a village called Touton, about two miles south-west of Tadcaster. It is not to our purpose to enter into the particulars of this bloody engagement: one the greatest and most obstinate that was ever fought in this island: it is sufficient to say that Edward was victorious, after the loss of above 36,000 Englishmen, who then fell by each other's swords. King Henry, his queen, and son, fled into Scotland; and Edward marched into York, where he soon took down the heads of his father, the earl of Salisbury, and others, which had been over one of the city gates; and placed in their room the heads of some of the most mortal enemies of his house, who were taken or slain in the battle. Edward stayed some time at York to fix the northern provinces more fully in his interest; and leaving every thing quiet in those countries, he returned to London, and was solemnly crowned soon after at Westminster, with the usual ceremonies.

A Parl. called.] Then to settle all other matters of state, on the most lasting foundation, he summoned a parl. by writs, dated at Westminster, May 23, 1461, to meet at the same place the 6th of July following. But, because the king of Scots was entered into England with an army in favour of king Henry, Edward and his council thought proper to postpone the meeting of the parl.; and, by other writs dated July 26, the same peers were summoned to appear at Westminster, on the 4th of Nov. following. The former writ of summons, directed to Tho. abp. of Canterbury, is in the usual style, with the rest of the bps. abbots, and priors, as well as the temporal lords; but the names of the latter, in this first parl.

Peers summoned to this Parliament.

John duke of Norfolk	John lord Stourton of Stourton
Rd. earl of Warwick	William Bouchier ld. Fitz-Waryn
John earl of Oxford	Henry Bromflete lord Vessey
Wm. earl of Arundel	Ralph lord Boteler of Sudley
Ralph earl of Westmoreland	Thomas lord Gray of Richmond
Henry visc. Bouchier	Jn. ld. Sutton of Dudley
Edward lord Grey of Ruthin	Wm. Fynes lord Say
James lord Berkeley	Rd. Fynes lord Dacre
George lord Latimer	William Nevile lord Fauconberge
Ralph lord Graystock	John Bouchier lord Barners
Wm. lord Bottreaux	Richard Welles lord Willoughby
John lord Beauchamp	Sir Henry Fitz-Hugh
John lord Audley	Sir Henry Grey
Thomas lord Scroope of Masham	Sir Richard West
John lord Clinton	Sir Thomas Stanley
John lord Lovel	Sir John Nevile lord Montacute
Edward Nevil lord Bergavenny
Edward Brook lord Cobham
Reginald lord Gray of Wilton

Besides these lords, &c. other writs were directed to summon the 12 judges there named; and, in the writs for altering the time from July to Nov., seven are called to sit in the house of peers.

The parl. met at the time and place last appointed, when, in the presence of the king, sitting on the throne, and of the lords and commons, George Nevile, bp. of Exeter, declared the cause of the summons, in a notable oration, taking for his theme, 'Bonas facite vias et studia vestra.' Jer. 7. After which he ordered the commons to choose, and the next day to present, their Speaker.

A Speaker chosen.] The receivers and triers of petitions being appointed, on the 3d day of their sitting the commons presented to the king sir James Strangewaies, knt. to be their Speaker, whose excuse being rejected, he, with the common protestation, was allowed. At the same time, the said sir James made a speech to the throne, in which he took occasion to commend the king, for his extraordinary courage and conduct against his enemies; and returned thanks to God for the great victories given to him. The next thing that was done in this parl. was to read a long declaration of the king's title to the crown; containing, in effect, what his father had delivered to parl. the 39th of the last reign. To which was added, a recapitulation of the tyrannous reign of Henry IV. with his heinous murdering of Richard II.

The Reign of Hen. IV. declared to have been an usurpation, &c.] After this an act was passed, that Edward IV. was and is undoubted king of England, from the 4th of March then last past, when all the estates yielded themselves obeisant subjects to the said Edward IV.

and his heirs for ever; affirming the reign of Hen. IV. to have been an intrusion and usurpation. It was also enacted, that Edward IV. was seized of the crown and profits of the realm of England, from the said 4th of March, in such sort as king Rich. II. enjoyed the same, in the 23rd year of his reign.—Then a whole recital of the Concord or Agreement, made between Henry VI. and Rich. duke of York, 39 Hen. VI. was read, and the breach of it by sundry means was declared. By which breach it was also declared, that Edward IV. was discharged from the said Concord, and that no article of it should bind him, as king, to that agreement.

Mr. Habington in his Life of Edw. IV. says, that at his coronation, being seated in the most conspicuous place of the Great Hall at Westminster, he himself made an open Declaration of his double title to the crown. "First, by descent, as beforementioned; and next, by authority of parl.; which, upon examination of the late duke of York's title, conferred the possession of the kingdom immediately on him or his heirs, when Hen. VI. should make forfeiture of it, by death, resignation, or breach of that accord sworn there so solemnly between them. And that this Accord was broken, the slaughter of the said duke, oppressed with unequal numbers of Henry's party, at the battle of Wakefield, did but too sadly manifest. Nevertheless, he protested he would forego the justice of his claim, rather than enter upon it without their free vote. At which, unanimously, the assembly cried out, 'king Edw. king Edw.:' joyful that their voices might confirm him king, who had deigned them so humble a compliment, as to profess that he would not receive the title without their suffrage."

Bills of Attainder.] Next follows a long bill of Attainder of divers persons for the death of Rd. duke of York, and others; particularly, Hen. VI., Margaret, late queen of England, Edw. called prince of Wales, Hen. late duke of Somerset, and Hen. earl of Northumberland. Reciting, that Wm. lord Boneville, sir Tho. Kuriel, knights of the garter, and sir Wm. Gower, knt. standard-bearer to Rd. duke of York, were against law beheaded and murdered. Another bill of Attainder was passed against Tho. Courtney, late earl of Devonshire, Tho. lord Roos, John, late lord Nevile, Baldwyn Fulsthurst, Alex. Hedio, Nich. Latimer, Js. Lutterel, Edm. Mountfort, Tho. Fundern, Hen. Lewis, John Heron of Ford, Rd. Tunstal, Hen. Bellingham, Rob. Whittingham, knts.; Andrew Trollop, late of Guinescoe, esq. with several others, for being at the death of the duke of York, at Wakefield, the 30th of Dec. last past.—And, Hen. duke of Exeter, Wm. visc. Beaumont, John Gray, late lord Rougemont, Randolph, late lord Dacre; Humph. Datren, Philip Wentworth, Wm. Rawkesley, Edm. Hampden, Tho. Findrey, John Courtney, John Ormond, alias Botler, Wm. Milley, Simon

Haynes, Wm. Holland, called the bastard of Exeter, Thos. Ormond, alias Botler, Tho. Everingham, Hen. Roos of Rockingham, with several others, were attainted for being against king Edw. IV. March 29, last, being Palm Sunday, in the fields called Saxton fields, and Towton fields, in the county of York.—Hen. VI., queen Margaret, prince Edw. and some others, there named, were attainted, for delivering up the town of Berwick to James, king of Scots. Likewise, for practising to deliver up the castle and city of Carlisle to the Scots. And the last named persons, with Jasper, earl of Pembroke, Js. earl of Wilts, Rob. lord Hungerford, with certain priests and friars, were also attainted, for procuring foreign princes to invade the king and realm.—Hen. VI. with certain persons aforenamed, Jn. Fortescue, Wm. Talbois, and others, were attainted, for being in the field against Edw. IV. in the bishopric of Durham, the 18th of June last past. And the duke of Exeter aforesaid, Jasper, earl of Pembroke, and others, were attainted for raising war against the king at Tubal, besides Caernarvon in Wales, on Friday next after the feast of st. Edward last past.—The Attainder and Forfeiture of all and singular the hereditaments of the aforesaid Hen. VI. and namely of all the land belonging to the duchy of Lancaster: that the said Edw. IV. shall hold the said duchy and county palatine of Lancaster, to him and to his heirs kings of England, with all offices and liberties to the same belonging, separate from the crown; and that the tenants of the said duchy do enjoy all their liberties, in such wise as when Hen. VI. held the same on the 3d of March last.

Acts of Restitution.] After passing all these bills of Attainder and Forfeitures, the parl. went upon acts of Restitution; and the whole process and judgment, as well by parl. as otherwise, against Rd. earl of Cambridge, and several others, was utterly made void and repealed. The like judgment in parl. against John Montague, late earl of Salisbury, and Tho. lord Despencer, was made void; and Rd. earl of Warwick, and Ann, his wife, the daughter of Isabel, daughter and heir to the said Thomas, in right of the said Ann, was restored to all the hereditaments of the said Thomas. Also, Alice, countess of Salisbury, daughter to Tho. Montague, late earl of Salisbury, son of the said John, was restored to all the hereditaments of the said John. Lastly, Tho. Lumley, knt. son to Ralph Lumley, knt. was also restored to all the hereditaments of the said Ralph, and the judgment against him made void.

Edw.'s first Speech to his Parl.] At the close of the session the king came to the house, and sending for the Commons, after they had given their assent to the Attainder bills and the rest, addressed them in the following speech, which we have given in the orthography of the time, from the Roll itself:—

for the common of this my lond—for the true hertes and tender consideracions that ye have had to my right and title, that y and my ancestres have had unto the coronne of this reame, the which from us have been long time witholde. And now thanked be Almyghty God, of whos grace greweth all victory, by youre true hertes and grete assistens, y am restored unto that is my right and title, wherefore y thanke you as hertely as y can. Also for the tender and true hertes that ye have shewed unto me, in that ye have tenderly had in remembraunce, the correccion of the horrible murdre and cruel deth of my lord my fader, my brother Rutland, and my cosyn of Salysbury and other, y thanke you right hertely, and y shall be unto you with the grace of Almighty God, as good and gracious sovereign lord as ever was eny of my noble progenitours to their subgettes and liegemen. And for the feithfull and lovyng hertes, and also the grete labours that ye have born and susteyned towards me, in the recouering of my said right and title which y now possede, y thanke you with all my herte, and yf y had eny better good to reward you with all then my body ye shuld have it, the which shall alwey be redy for your defence, never sparing nor letting for noo jeopardie. Praying you all of youre herty assistens and good contynuaunce, as y shall be unto you youre veray rightwisse and lovyng liege lord.”

After the king had ended his speech, the Record tells, that the ld. chanc. stood up, and declared, that since the whole business of this parl. was not yet concluded, and the approaching festival of Christmas would obstruct it; he, therefore, by the king's command, prorogued the parl. to the 6th of May next ensuing. At the same time he told them, the king had put out a proclamation against giving of liveries and badges, contrary to law, also against maintenances, robberies and murders; all, and every of which, the bps. lords and commons, there present, promised to obey, and to see observed throughout the kingdom.—Some new commotions happening about this time, prevented Edward from meeting this last parl. at the time of the prorogation. Therefore, it is entered on the Roll, that on the 6th of May, in the 2d year of this reign, because the king could not attend to be there, Thomas, abp. of Canterbury, by the king's letters patents, dissolved the said parl. Dugdale has given us a summons to a parl. at York, to be held the 5th of Feb. 2 Edw. IV. and another the same year to Westminster the 29th of April, but no notice is taken in that author of any other parl. till the 6th of this king.

A Parl. called.] However Cotton gives us the proceedings of a parl. summoned by writs, dated Feb. 28th, 1463, to meet at Westminster the 29th of April following. When and where being all met, as usual, George bp. of Exeter, then ld. chanc. declared the cause of the summons in a set speech; after which he directed the commons to choose a Speaker; and on the 3rd day of the session they presented John Say, esq. who was accepted.

A Subsidy granted.] The only material transaction of this session of parl. was, to grant the king an aid of 37,000l. to be levied in the counties, cities, and towns, according to a rate there expressed. And, on the 27th of June, in the presence of the king, lords and commons, the chancellor, by his maj. command, gave thanks to the commons for the subsidy granted, and prorogued the parl. to the 4th of Nov. next, at Westminster.—On the said 4th of Nov. Thos. abp. of Canterbury, the king's kinsman, by his letters patents, held and continued the parl.; and the same day the chancellor told them that the king, out of his mere grace, released unto the commons 6000 l. parcel of the grant aforesaid; whereupon it was enacted that 31,000l. shall be levied in the manner of a 15th, and be called by that name, and then the chanc. in the king's name, and as his lieut. adjourned the said parl. to the 20th of Feb. ensuing, at York.—At which time and place being again assembled, Wm. bp. of Lincoln, by command of Wm. abp. of York, the king's commissioner, by letters patents, held the said parl. and adjourned it over to the 1st of May next ensuing, at York as aforesaid. The reason for this last adjournment is said, in the Abridgment, to be, because that some conspiracies and rebellions being raised against the king in Gloucestershire, he was obliged to go in person to suppress them.

On the 1st of May the lords and commons were again assembled, in the great hall, within the palace of the abp. at York. The king's letters patents were read, constituting and appointing Rd. earl of Warwick and the earl of Salisbury, his commissioners to hold and continue the said parl. from the said 1st of May to the 25th of Nov. following; and upon reading thereof the abbot of Fountain's, by commission under the privy seal, adjourned the same accordingly. The cause of which last adjournment, is assigned to be, that the king was busily employed, in the more northern parts, for the suppressing of rebels, and defence of the kingdom against a foreign invasion.—On the 25th of Nov. at the same place as before, the parl. once more met, when the same commissioners were appointed, to hold and prorogue the said parl. from that day to the 26th of Jan. next ensuing, at Westminster, and the abbot of St. Mary's in York, by the king's appointment, prorogued the same accordingly.—These interruptions and distant adjournments were occasioned by the unsteadiness of the times.

A Subsidy granted for Life.] On the 26th of Jan. 1465, the parl. met at Westminster, according to the last prorogation. The very first act they went upon was to grant a Supply to the king, which was done too in a very effectual and unusual manner. For, the commons, with the assent of the bishops and lords, granted to the king, during his life, the subsidies following: first, tonnage and poundage of every English merchant, for every sack of wool, 33s. 4d.; for every 240 wool-fells, 33s. 4d.: for every last of hides, 3l. 6s. 8d.; of every merchant stranger, whether denizens or not, for every sack of wool, 3l. 6s. 8d. For every last of hides, 3l. 13s. 4d. For every 240 wool-fells, 3l. 6s. 8d. with a proviso only made, that the town of Calais, and the soldiers in garrison there, may be victualled and paid with part of the said subsidies according to a rate there stated.—It was also ordained, "That the treasurer of Calais be obliged, under a penalty, to account yearly in the Exchequer; and that he may dispose of all the offices, under him, in the town or marches of Calais, to whom he pleases, to hold the same at the king's will."

The Staple of Calais.] The government and Staple of Calais having been often mentioned in the course of this history, it will not be amiss in this place to give some account of it out of the memoirs of Philip de Commynes. That author tells us, "that this was the richest jewel in the English crown, and the most profitable govt. in Christendom, if not in the whole world. That he was there several times, during the differences between the houses of York and Lancaster, and was told by the chief officer of the Staple for cloth, that he would willingly farm the govt. of the town, at 15,000 crowns per ann. for the governor of Calais receives all profits on that side of the sea, has the benefit of convoys, and the entire disposal and management of the garrison." And, in another place, he tells us, "that it is almost incredible what prodigious return for their wools, the merchants make twice every year from that place."

Next came on the attainders of several more persons of quality, and others, who were slain or taken in the late battles. After these, an act of Resumption was passed, whereby the king took into his hands all manner of hereditaments belonging to the crown, the principality of Wales, the duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, and the earldom of Chester; from the feast of the Purification of our Lady last before, in such manner as he had, or ought to have had, on the 4th of March, in the 1st year of his reign; any letters patents, or grants, to the contrary notwithstanding. And that all grants, leases, &c. made by the king, before the said feast, of any hereditaments belonging to his duchy of York, or earldom of March, be also void; but with many provisos.

The last act of this parl. that we think proper to mention, is, That whereas the sum of 32,331l. was due to the mayor and company of the merchants of the staple of Calais, the king, by the authority of parl. in order to content them and discharge that debt, assigned them a power to take a yearly rate out of the subsidy on wool, until full payment be made.

Sumptuary Laws passed.] There were several statutes made in this and the preceding sessions of this long parl. for the encouragement of the woollen manufactory, and trade in general; which the reader will find in the statute-books. One or two, however, deserve mention, which was to restrain the excessive vanity then used in dress or apparel; which, notwithstanding the destruction and misery the civil wars had occasioned, was grown to a very great height. One thing in particular was, the extravagant way the people had got of adorning their feet. They wore the beaks or pikes of their shoes so long, that it encumbered them in their walking, and they were forced to tie them up to their knees. The gentlemen did it with chains of silver, or silver gilt; and those who could not afford to be at that charge, with silk laces. This ridiculous fashion had been in some measure used ever since Rich. II.'s time; but these enormous pikes were now, by act of parliament, curtailed to two inches, under a penalty both to the shoemaker and the wearer.

Likewise, during one of these sessions of parl. a convocation met at London, in which the clergy very willingly gave a 10th to the crown, in acknowledgment for an extensive charter lately granted them. And here, a complaint being made of the violation of sanctuaries, the utmost censures of the church were decreed against those who should drag any persons out of churches, or other privileged places, and carry them to prison. There was also a constitution passed, for the regulation of the clergy's habits.

A Parl. called.] In 1467, a parl. was summoned, by writs dated at Westminster, the 28th of Feb. to meet at the same place, on the 3rd of June following. In the presence of the king, sitting on the throne, in the Painted Chamber of the palace of Westminster, and of the lords and commons, Wm. bp. of Lincoln, in the absence of George abp. of York, chancellor of England, by the king's command, declared the cause of the summons; after which, he ordered the commons to choose their Speaker, and present him as usual. Accordingly, sir John Say, knight, was presented, and accepted by the king.

"John Say, and ye sirs come to this my court of parl. for the commons of this my realm: the cause why I have cald and summoned this my present parl. is, that I purpose to live upon mine own, and not to charge my subjects but in great and urgent causes, concerning more the weale of themselves, and also the defence of them and of this my realme, rather than mine owne pleasure, as heretofore by commons of this land hath beene done, and borne unto my progenitors in time of need; wherein I trust that yee, sirs, and all the commons of this my land will be as tender and kinde unto me in such cases as heretofore any commons have been to any of my progenitors. And for the good will, kindness, and true hearts that yee have borne, continued, and shewed to me at all times heretofore, I thanke you as heartily as I can: also I trust yee will continue in time coming; for which, by the grace of God, I shall be to you as good and gracious a king, and reigne as righteously upon you, as ever did any of my progenitors upon commons of this my realme in dayes past, and shall also in time of need apply my person for the weale and defence of you, and of this my realme, not sparing my body nor life for any jeopardy that might happen to the same."

An act of Resumption was passed, the same in effect as the last parl.; also another, that the king should for ever enjoy all such hereditaments as Rich. duke of York possessed on the 30th Dec. 39 Hen. VI. any grant to the contrary notwithstanding. Rd. Welles, lord Willoughby, son and heir of Leonard Welles, lord Willoughby, was restored in blood to the said lord Leonard, and to all his hereditaments, notwithstanding the attainder made against the said Leonard, 1 Edw. IV. As was also sir Tho. Tresham, and his attainder made void. These were all the transactions of the 1st session of this parl.; for, on the 5th day of July, Robert Stillington, bp. of Bath and Wells, then chancellor, in the presence of the king, lords, and commons, first answered certain petitions from the lower house, and then thanked them, in the king's name, for the statute of Resumption; assuring them, that the king had provided for Calais; had taken the like care for Ireland and Wales; and further, that his maj. desired there might be a due execution of the laws. After which, by the king's command, he prorogued the parl. to the 6th of Nov. next ensuing, at Reading. And from thence the said chancellor again prorogued this parl. by the king's command, from the said 6th of Nov. to the 6th day of May, 1468, at Reading aforesaid. But they did not sit at that place; for the chancellor, at their next meeting, adjourned them from the 6th of May, to the 12th of the same month, at Westminster.

These frequent prorogations were owing to the unquietness of the times, which were far from being settled as yet; but, at this last adjournment, the parl. sat to transact business. For, five days after this meeting, the king sent for the commons into the house of lords, when the chancellor, by his command, spoke to the whole body, to this effect:—"1st, he began with justice, and instanced the good effects of the same. He next declared, that the 3 estates comprehended the govt. of this land; the pre-eminence whereof was due to the king, as chief; the 2nd to the bps. and lords, and the 3rd to the commons. He then put them in mind in what poor estate the king found the crown; despoiled of the due inheritance; wasted in its treasures; the laws wrecked; and the whole, by the usurpation, in a manner subverted. Add to this, the loss of the crown of France, the duchies of Normandy, Gascoigny, and Guienne, the ancient patrimony of the crown of England lost also; and further, he found it involved in a war with Denmark, Spain, Scotland, Britainy, and other parts, and even with their old enemy of France. Then descending, he told them, that the king had appeased all tumults within the realm; and planted such inward peace, that law and justice might be extended. That the king had made peace with Scotland; that the lord Winters was negotiating a league with Spain and Denmark, so as to open a free commerce with those countries. But, what was still the greatest, he had allied himself to the dukes of Burgundy and Britainy, two most powerful princes, in such sort, as they had given the king the strongest assurance of acting vigorously against France, for the recovering of that kingdom, and other the king's patrimonies; of which, since they made little doubt, the king thought proper not to omit such an opportunity, and such a one as never happened before. And, that his maj. might see this kingdom as glorious as any of his predecessors did, he was ready to adventure his own person in so just a cause. Lastly, he told them, that the king had called this parl. to make them acquainted with these matters, and to desire their advice and assistance."

A Subsidy granted.] The answer the commons made to this harangue, was immediately to grant a large subsidy of two 10ths and two 15ths, to be levied on the laity, reserving only 12,000l. to be deducted out of it, for the relief of poor decayed towns. The senate having thus liberally contributed to the supplies of the state, the next thing they went upon was to confirm, by their authority, the king's patents granted to his new queen Elizabeth, for establishing her dower. That the part of the said dower, assigned to her by letters patents under the seal of the duchy of Lancaster, should be valid, though there be no livery and seisin of the same; and that the queen might personally plead and be impleaded in her own name; to which are added the names of the several manors, and other hereditaments, assigned to her majesty, in the duchy of Lancaster and elsewhere, under the great seal, which were all confirmed by parl.—In consideration of 10,000l. paid in part of a greater sum, due by the king to Charles duke of Burgundy, on the marriage between the said duke and the princess Margaret, the king's sister, by the mayor and company of the Staple of Calais; the king, by letters patents, granted, that they should be repaid out of the subsidy on wools; which letters patents were, by common assent, confirmed.

Many good laws were made in this parl. for the encouragement of the woollen manufactories, &c. for the titles of which we refer to the list of acts at the end of this reign. One thing in the Abridgment of the Records is remarkable enough: "that a bill was brought in this parl. whereby all such as should rob any church of any pax, cope, granel, mass book, or any other trinket," (whereof, says Win. Prynne, the whole rabble is named) "shall be deemed a traitor, and be burned for the same; and that all such persons shall be deprived of the benefit of their clergy; that an appeal for restitution may also lie, and that all justices of peace may enquire of the same." The publisher remarks, that by the preamble to these motions, it seems that this bill was made against the Lollards; but the king's answer to it was, Le roi s'avisera.

Edw. forced to leave the kingdom, and Hen. VI. restored.] The civil wars, which had been carried on so long and with such fury by both parties, were not yet at an end; for, soon after the dissolution of this parl. Edw. was obliged, for his own safety, to leave the kingdom. This happened in 1470; and, in the month of Oct. this year, the earl of Warwick released king Henry from his imprisonment, and he was once more restored to the English crown. However, we find that writs of summons, went out in Edw.'s name, dated at Westminster, Aug. 10, for a parl. to meet at York, Sept. 22, following. But, a stop was put to this meeting by other writs, dated Sept. 7, the same year; and the reason of the prohibition is given in the body of the instrument to be, "because the king was certainly informed that rebels, enemies at home, and foreign enemies, both from France and Scotland, had entered this kingdom in a hostile manner, and with armed force had actually invaded it, &c."

A Parl. called.] Historians inform us that after the great earl of Warwick had raised Henry from a prison to a throne, from whence he was called, "The setter up and puller down of kings," a parl. was called to meet at Westminster, Nov. 26, 1470, wherein nothing was denied which the prevailing party thought fit to authorize. For here Edw. was declared a traitor to his country; an usurper of the crown; and had all his goods confiscated; the like judgment passed against his brother Rd. duke of Gloucester, and all his adherents; of whom, John Tiptoft earl of Worcester, lord high constable of England, and lord deputy of Ireland, was beheaded. All the statutes made by Edw. were revoked; all the attainders, against the earls of Oxford, Pembroke, and many others, reversed; the crowns of England and France, entailed on Henry and his heirs male; and, for want of such, unto George duke of Clarence and his male issue, and he was declared immediate heir to his father Rd. duke of York. Lastly, the earl of Warwick, was made Protector of the kingdom, and Clarence his son-in-law joined in commission with him. We have been more careful to collect what historians have left us concerning the proceedings of this parl. since there is not one word of all this matter on record. Probably, if these proceedings were entered on the Rolls, Edw. who soon after was restored, caused them to be erased and abrogated. Dugdale, indeed, has given us the summons to this parl. the date of which is 49 Hen. VI. [9 & 10 regis Edw. IV.] wherein the first writ to the peers is directed to Henry's most dear cousin George duke of Clarence, who had then revolted from his own family; but there is no mention at all of it in the Abridgment of the Records.

Edw. restored, and Henry's death.] However, this dream of regal power in Henry lasted but a small time; for the fugitive Edw. having gained some aids from his brother-in-law, the duke of Burgundy, and being promised more in England, landed at Ravensburg in Yorkshire. At his first arrival, he seemed to lay aside his claim to the crown; pretending only to his rights as duke of York; but, having possessed himself of that city, and got his friends about him, he soon threw off that mask, and marching forward, with a now powerful army, was met and joined by his brother the duke of Clarence, with a very considerable reinforcement. Edw. being now strong enough to cope with his enemy the earl of Warwick, marched on directly for London; and at his approach the citizens opened their gates to him; the earl of Warwick was not there, but Henry fell once more into his enemies hands. The earl, however, was advancing towards London, with a powerful army, against whom the warlike Edw. opposed himself; and, at Barnet their armies meeting, a dreadful battle ensued; where, at first, Warwick's good fortune in war gave him great hopes of a compleat victory; but, by a fatal mistake amongst his own men, the day was changed, and Edw. was victorious, with the death of the earl of Warwick, and the marquis of Montacute his brother; 10,000 Englishmen more falling, on both sides, at that battle. In a few weeks after this, another battle was fought at Tewkesbury, between king Edw. and the martial queen Margaret, where the heroine was also defeated; her son prince Edw. made a prisoner and destroyed; all the nobility and gentry with her taken or slain, and her whole army cut to pieces. This victory was soon after followed by the death of the pious Henry; said to have been murdered in the Tower, by the hands of Rd. duke of Gloucester, king Edw.'s brother.

A Parl. called.] It was not till 1472 that we meet with any more parliaments; when writs of summons were issued out, dated at Westminster the ninth of Aug. for a parl. to meet at the same place on the 6th of October. The following is a List of the

Peers summoned to this Parliament.

This parl. being assembled before the king in the Painted Chamber, Robert, bp. of Bath and Wells, then chancellor, opened the cause of their meeting; after which he directed the commons to choose and present their Speaker: and Wm. Allington, esq. was chosen, presented, and accepted by the king for that purpose.

A Supply granted.] The first thing the commons went upon was the Supply; and 14,000 archers were voted to serve the king at their costs for one year; the same to be levied according to a proportion out of all lands and tenements. The lords spiritual and temporal did also tax themselves, by way of grant unto the king, towards furnishing the forces aforesaid, the tenth of one whole year's revenue of all and singular their lands and possessions.—The commons then, by a long Protestation delivered to the king and lords, required that the statutes made against riots, maintenancies, oppressions, and for regulating labourers, may be executed. And the same day, Nov. 30th, the bp. of Rochester, by the king's command, returned thanks to the commons for their grant, and prorogued the parl. from the same day to the 8th of Feb. 1473, next ensuing, at Westminster.

At this session the king's letters patents for creating Edward, his first begotten son, prince of Wales and earl of Chester, were confirmed by Parl.; likewise the king's letters patents for granting and delivering to the young prince the hereditaments and other appurtenances belonging to the said principality and to the duchy of Cornwall, was, by the same authority, confirmed.—Next follow several acts of mercy in reversing the attainders of divers persons.

This parl. continued sitting till the 8th day of April, when the commons granted the king one 10th and one 15th, reserving out of it 6000l. to be distributed to certain decayed towns. And, it was ordained that the money arising from the 10ths given by the lords in the first session of this parl. be paid into the hands of the treasurer of England. Also in consideration of 23,000l. due by the king to the mayor and merchants of the staple at Calais, the king by a long act granted to them a 15th, in like manner as in the parl. of the 7th of Edw. IV.—On the 8th of April aforesaid, the chancellor, after giving thanks to the commons for the Subsidy, by the king's command prorogued the parl. to the 6th of Oct. following. But before they parted it was agreed and ordained, "That the king, on any urgent occasion which required their attendance, might call and reassemble the said parl. giving only, by proclamation, 20 days notice."

On the 6th of Oct. this parl. met again, and continued sitting from day to day, to the 13th of Dec. following. During which time some more Attainders were reversed; and a suit, or contention at law, was terminated between the king with the English merchants, of one side, and the merchants of the Hans-towns, in Germany, or the Stilliards, on the other party, and a free intercourse between these countries and merchants was settled for ever. The king also confirmed to the said foreign merchants, of the Stilliards, their old liberties, granted to all foreign merchants, of every country by name, by Edw. I. but afterwards particularly to these merchants of the Stilliards, by Edw. II. wherein is to be noted the customs they were then rated at, and the king's grant not to raise the same, all which was confirmed by this parl.

A new Act of Resumption.] A new Act of Resumption was also made, whereby the king took into his hands all the hereditaments of the crown, with the duchies of Lancaster and York, from the feast of st. Thomas in the year 1473, and of which the king was seized March 4th, anno regni 1. or what came into the king's hands since, by attainder or otherwise. And a special commission was given to the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, for assuring the payment of certain of the king's debts granted out of the said duchy, under the seal of that office. In this is a number of provisions, particularly one, that the same should not prejudice the corporation, union, and annexation of the duchy of Lancaster and county palatine, nor the officers nor tenants of those districts. Several provisions were also made to particular people, by name, in this commission; amongst which, says Cotton, we must not forget one provision, for mother Cobb, midwife to Elizabeth, the king's best beloved wife, and queen of England.

On the 13th of Dec. the bp. of Durham, then chancellor of England, after giving thanks, on the king's behalf and by his command, to the three estates, prorogued this parl. once more to the 20th of Jan. 1474.—We learn that this parl. again assembled on the day aforesaid, and continued to sit till the 1st of Feb. when the said bp. of Durham, as chancellor, called the commons before the king and told them, "that they were then assembled to consult which way the king might proceed in the wars; but, because his maj. had yet heard nothing from his brother the duke of Burgundy, relating to that affair, whereon much depended; it was the king's command that this parl. should be prorogued to the 9th of May ensuing."

At the time appointed by the last prorogation this same parl. met again at Westminster; and now, by the common consent, the king granted to his brother George duke of Clarence and Isabel his wife, and to his other brother Rd. duke of Gloucester and Ann his wife, daughter and heir to Rd. Neville, late earl of Warwick, and daughters and heirs apparent to Ann countess of Warwick, "that they shall enjoy to them, and the heirs of their said wives, all the hereditaments belonging to the said Ann, in such wise as if the said Ann was naturally dead; and that their said wives should be of blood to the said Ann and enjoy all benefits accordingly, she being for ever barred from claiming the same. Also that both the said dukes and likewise their wives, and the heirs of both, may make partition of the premises to stand good in law; and that the said dukes or either of them, overliving his wife, shall during his life enjoy her property. That all alienations, discontinuances, charges and incumbrances, suffered by either of the said dukes or their wives, to debar the other of the said pur-parties, shall be utterly void. Moreover, that if the said duke of Gloucester be at any time hereafter divorced from the said Ann his wife, and suffer any such incumbrance as above, that it shall be void. And further, that if the said duke Rd. upon such divorce, doth his uttermost to be reconciled, during his wife's life, that then after the death of his said wife, he shall enjoy her purparty."—The effect of the grant made to the mayor and company of the staple at Calais, 13 Edw. IV. was in a manner recited; and it was further enacted, "That the said mayor, during the term there mentioned, shall pay 1000 marks for the fees and rewards of the king's judges, serjeants, and attornies."

This session only continued to the 28th of May, when the bp. of Lincoln, as chancellor, prorogued the parl. to the 6th of June next ensuing. At which time, besides reversing the attainders of a few more gentlemen, and some other acts on private affairs, a subsidy was granted by the commons to the king of one 10th and one 15th; also 51,117l. 4s. 7½d. as full payment for the wages of 14,000 archers granted before; and for the raising of this, every county, city, and town was severally taxed. And on July 13th, the aforesaid chancellor, by the king's command, prorogued the parl. to the 23d of Feb. next ensuing, at Westminster.

This parl. being again assembled, on the 23rd of Feb. 1475, an ordinance was immediately made by them for the speedy levying the 10th, on all revenues granted in the 12th of this reign. The whole business of this session seems, by the Records, to be taken up with Attainders, and revoking Attainders, Grants of forfeited Estates, &c. the fatal consequences of civil wars. However, we find in the Statute Books several acts, made for the public good, in the different sessions of this long parl. to which we must also refer. Before its dissolution, the commons made another grant to the king of one 10th, and one 15th, with a third of each of them. Which grant being read, and agreed to by the lords, the ld. chanc. on the 14th day of March, by the king's command, returned thanks to the three estates, and dissolved the parliament.

We have not in the course of these enquiries, hitherto, met with a parl. of so long a duration; they having sat, with the several prorogations, near two years and a half. During which "the History of Croyland" takes notice, that no less than three several lord chancellors presided. "The first," adds that authority, "was Rt. (Stillington) bp. of Bath, who did nothing but by the advice of his disciple John (Alcock) bp. of Worcester; the next was Lawrence (Boothe) bp. of Durham, who tired himself with doing just nothing at all; and the third was Thos. (Rotheram) bp. of Lincoln, who did all, and brought every thing to a happy conclusion."

But, the nation was no ways pleased with this piece of pageantry; the money which had been squeezed, as it were out of every one's purses, was given and granted for a quite different purpose than to be spent in a pompous parade. A war with France, on the old quarrel, was what all wished for; and it was with great difficulty that Edward prevented his chief ministers from being called to an account, at his return; being greatly suspected that they had been touched with French gold, in order to advise him to consent to a peace. An historian remarks, "that surely there is some in-born malice rancouring in the genius of our nation against the French; the Saxon government having once received a final overthrow from them, in the conquest of duke William. Or else, it would be a wonder why the English were never sparing of their lives or treasure, when any war was to be advanced against the French."

The king was in his nature so liberal to those who had any ways befriended him, that he soon got quit of all the treasure that was left after his French expedition. And, knowing well the fickleness of the nation; how prone they were to raise insurrections, and how fond of novelties, he durst not call a parl. to lay on any new subsidy, but took other very different ways to restore his treasury. Under the force of a statute, which had been passed in parl. he first took into his own hands all the revenues of the crown.

A Parl. called.] It was not till near 3 years after the last parl. was dissolved, that we meet with any account of another; but no writs of summons are given to it, either in Dugdale or Cotton. The last authority, however, mentions the proceedings of a parl. held at Westminster, on the 16th of Jan. 1477, in the 17th of Edw. IV.; and our Statute Books, by a recital of several acts there made, confirm it.—At the time appointed, the parl. met at Westminster; when Thos. Rotheram, bp. of Lincoln, in the presence of the king, lords, and commons, in the Painted Chamber, declared the cause of the summons, under this text, "Dominus regit me, et nihil mihi deerit." Upon which he largely treated "of the obedience which subjects owe to their prince; and shewed, by many examples, out of the Old and New Testament, what grievous plagues had happened to the rebellious and disobedient; particularising that saying of St. Paul, "Non sine causa rex gladium portat." He added, that the majesty of the king was upheld by the hand and counsel of God, by which he was advanced to the throne of his ancestors." And concluded with observing, "that under the person of the king, with the persons of the bps. and lords, and under those of the commons, 'si dominus regit me nihil mihi deerit, sed in loco pascuæ illos collocabit.' Then he directed the commons to choose their Speaker amongst themselves, as usual, and present him to the king, who next day presented Wm. Allington, esq. for that office, who was allowed accordingly.

Several useful Acts passed.] On the petitions of the commons some useful acts were made this parl. among which are these: "That all Irish money should be prohibited in this kingdom. That it should be felony to carry out of England or Wales any coin of this realm, or any plate, bullion, jewels of gold or silver, without the king's licence, &c. An act against unlawful games, such as are there called klosse, half-bowle, rayles, hand in hand, or quechbord, on pain of 2 years imprisonment, and forfeiture of 40l.; and whosoever should suffer any other person to play at such games in his house or other place, shall suffer 3 years imprisonment, and forfeit 20l. A long act for regulating apparel, which had then grown to a very great extravagance. An act was made to repeal a parl. holden 9 Edw. IV. (or 39 Henry VI.) with all the acts therein made, and their exemplifications." Lastly, Cotton mentions an act to continue only to the next parl. "to oblige all Irishmen born, or coming of Irish parents, who reside in England, either to repair and remain in Ireland, or else to pay yearly a certain sum there rated, for the defence of the same." Also, "that an ordinance was made for John Atwill, a burgess in this parl. for the city of Exeter, (who had been condemned in the exchequer, on 8 several informations, at the suit of John Taylor, of the same town) to have as many supersedeas as he pleased, until his coming to his own home." An act of privilege directly in the face of the other courts of justice, and somewhat extraordinary at that time. The reader may observe that no Supply was either asked or granted this parl.; some other necessities of state requiring this meeting; and the king still subsisting himself on his own revenues.

A Quarrel between the King and the duke of Clarence.] About this time a discord arose between the king and his brother, George duke of Clarence, which ended in the destruction of the latter. "It was observed, says the 'History of Croyland,' that the duke withdrew himself, by little and little, from the king's presence; in council he would scarce speak a word, nor would he willingly either eat or drink in the king's palace. This coldness in the duke was thought by many to proceed from the general resumption of crown lands; which as has been said, the king had practised; by which the duke had lost the noble lordship of Tutbury, and several other lands which the king had formerly given him. Add to this, that on the death of Charles duke of Burgundy, Mary, his only daughter and heir, by Margaret, king Edward's sister, was designed by her mother to be given to Clarence, his own wife being newly dead; but the king, says our authority, not willing his ungrateful brother should gain such a fortune, impeded the match so much, that it never took place; and the young lady was afterwards married to the emperor of Germany's son, Maximilian. The duke's anger was by this usage much more raised against the king; and they began to regard one another with no brotherly aspects. Besides, flatterers and tale-bearers, who always haunt the courts of princes, by carrying and repeating stories, made the matter still worse between them. But the reason of the duke's imprisonment is said to be this: one John Stacey, whom our author calls an astronomer, and a great necromancer, was joined in confederacy with Tho. Burdet, esq. one of the duke's servants; and they were accused of compassing the death of Rich. lord Beauchamp, at the instigation of his wife, an adulteress, by making of leaden images, and other things to that purpose. Stacey having passed a severe examination, on the exercising this damnable art, says the monk, confessed many matters, both against himself and against the said Burdet, who was thereupon taken up. They were both tried in Westminster-Hall, at the bar of the King's Bench, most of the lords temporal sitting with the judges, where they were found guilty, and condemned to suffer death for it. Being drawn to Tyburn, and permitted to speak what they pleased, Stacey said little; but Burdet, with great boldness and many words, declared his innocence, and ended his discourse with these words of Susanna, 'Ecce morior, cum nihil horum fecerim.' The next day the duke of Clarence came into the Council Chamber at Westminster, and brought with him a famous divine, of the order of Minarets, who had taken the confession and declaration aforesaid, and repeated it to the lords of the council, which, as soon as he had done, the duke withdrew. The king was at that time at Windsor; and when he was told this affair, he fell into a vehement passion at his brother; and recollecting in his mind all the informations he had received against him, he summoned him to appear before him on a day appointed, in the palace at Westm. when the lord mayor and aldermen of London were present; and there the king, with his own mouth, "accused the duke of many articles, particularly the last mentioned; aggravating it vehemently against him, and charging the duke with stigmatising him as a reprobate to the laws of the land, and that his judges and juries were equally unjust." Upon which the duke was sent prisoner to the Tower, from which imprisonment death only freed him.

The d. of Clarence tried.] What followed in the next parl. adds our former authority, 'mens refugit enarrare;' since it was a melancholy sight to see such discord arise between two persons so near akin in humanity; for no one charged the duke but the king, nor no one answered the king but the duke. Some, however, were produced, of whom it was much doubted, whether they came as accusers of the duke or evidences for him. The duke answered all objections to his conduct by a flat denial; offering, if it might be granted, to defend his cause by combat. 'Quid multis immorer?' The house of lords were of opinion, that the evidence against the duke was sufficient; and therefore proceeded to condemnation, the sentence of which was pronounced by Henry duke of Buckingham, for that time made lord high steward of England. Execution, however, was delayed, till the Speaker of the commons and his brethren were called before the other house, when a rehearing of the whole matter was made before them. The consequence of all which was, that the duke was put to death, within the Tower of London, in a few days; but what kind of death he suffered is unknown, though most authors agree that he was drowned in a butt of malunsey wine.

Bill of Attainder against the d. of Clarence.] Habington, the particular writer of this king's life, has not only laid the death of the Duke of Clarence to the evil machinations of his brother Gloucester, but has also given us the sum and substance of the Bill of Attainder against him; which, as it lays the matter fully open, we shall give in his own words: "In his Attainder, according to the form, are crimes enough to make his death have appearance of justice, the execution of which the king seemed rather constrained to, than to have sought. For there are reckoned up, how the duke of Clarence to bring the present govt. into hatred with the people and thereby the present state into trouble, had not only in his speeches frequently laid injustice to the king's charge in attainting Tho. Burdet falsely, convict of many notorious treasons; but suborned many of his servants and divers others, corrupted with money, to divulge the like seditious discourses: That he had spread abroad impious rumours that the king dealt by necromancy; and that, upon offence against such of his subjects whom by order of law he could not destroy, he was accustomed to take them away by poison: That he had not rested there, but thereby to advance himself to the kingdom, and for ever to disable the king and his posterity from the crown, he had, contrary to truth, nature and religion, viper-like destroying her who gave him life, published that the king was a bastard and no way capable to reign: that to make this his so monstrous ambition more successful, and already to begin his usurpation, he had caused many of the king's subjects to be sworn upon the most blessed sacrament to be true to him and his heirs, without any exception of their allegiance; after which so solemn oaths, he discovered to them his resolution to right himself and his followers, who had both suffered by the king's violent wresting away their estates; and in particular to revenge himself upon the king, who (as he most impiously and falsely suggested) had by art-magic contrived to consume him as a candle consumeth in burning. And what most expressed the treason of his designs, that he had got out an exemplification under the great seal of Hen. VI. late king; wherein was shewed how by the parl. it was enacted, that if the said Henry and Edw. his son should die without issue-male, the kingdom should descend upon the duke of Clarence and his heirs; whereby clearly appeared his intention, immediately to possess himself of the crown, with destruction of king Edw. and his children, by pretence of a general election of the commonwealth. This was the sum of his Attainder, which we may well believe had not so easily past but by the king's public declaring himself: the secret working of the duke of Gloucester; and the passionate urging of the queen's kindred. But this attainder hath in it one thing most remarkable, that Clarence here falsely was accused of laying bastardy to the king, to endeavour possession of the crown; which afterwards was alledged indeed by Rd. duke of Gloucester, to the absolute disinheret of the king's sons."

A Parl. called.] It was not till 5 years after the dissolution of the last parl. that we meet with another on Record, which was summoned by writs, dated at Westminster, Nov. 15th, in the 22d and last year of this king, to meet at the same place, on the 20th of Jan. following (1482). The first writ to the peers, was directed to his most dear first born son, Edw. prince of Wales, &c; and the next to the king's other son, Rd. duke of York.—Being all assembled on the day appointed, the abp. of York, Tho. Rotheram, lord chanc. opened the session by a speech on this subject, 'Dominus illuminatio mea & salus mea.' After which he directed the commons to chuse a Speaker; who, the next day, presented John Wood, esq. for that office.

A Subsidy granted.] The first thing on record, which was done in this parliament, is, that the commons voted a supply; and by the consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, a 10th and a 15th, to be levied on the laity, was granted; except a deduction of 6000l. to be bestowed on decayed towns. Also a yearly subsidy to be levied on all strangers, as well denizens as others. And at the request of the commons, in recompence of the above grant, the king commanded that all the statutes, concerning weights and measures, labourers, beggars, and vagabonds, should be proclaimed and duly observed.—A yearly rent, or annuity, out of the king's customs and other revenues, amounting to the sum of 11,000l. was settled by parl. for defraying the king's household expences.

Grants.] The rest of the business transacted in this parl. was chiefly gifts and exchanges of manors and other hereditaments, in the duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, which would be too tedious to mention. Except, that a very large grant to Rd. duke of Gloucester, of the wardenship of the North-marches, together with the castles, towns, lordships, customs, and fee-farm of Carlisle and Newcastle; with several of the king's hereditaments, belonging to the duchy of Lancaster, in Cumberland; and several countries and lands within Scotland there mentioned, and some royal prerogatives within the same, to hold the same of the king by knight's service, was confirmed by parliament.

A sumptuary Law.] Some acts are, also, in the Statute-Books, made this parl. for the advantage of the public, to which we refer; and shall only mention one, by which all former statutes made, touching the excess of Apparel, were repealed. And, what kind of apparel, temporal men, of every degree and estate, were allowed to wear. Also, "That none, under the degree of a lord, except certain persons particularly named, shall wear any gown, or mantle, unless it be of such a length, that a man standing upright, it shall cover his privy members and buttocks."

The King greatly distressed.] But, though our Records inform us of no public affairs being transacted this parl. yet the history of Croyland tells us, "That Edw.'s foreign negotiations were driven to a very disagreeable crisis. He now found out, that Lewis the French king, had long made his game of him; and, at present, seemed so much to despise his power, that he not only withdrew the annual tribute, but actually forbad the marriage of the dauphin with the princess Elizabeth, Edward's eldest daughter, though they had been solemnly contracted: that the Scots, having a mind to break the truce, first despised the match that was agreed upon between their king and Cicely, another daughter of Edw.'s and then openly espoused the cause of France. Other foreign concerns relating to his friend the duke of Austria, gravelled him; nor were his domestic affairs in any profound degree of tranquillity. Under these dilemmas, he found himself necessitated to call a parl. to whom he opened the cause of his troubles. and the fraudulent usage he had met with from the powers abovementioned; and begged of them to assist him to revenge the affront. Nevertheless, he darst not ask any subsidy from the commons; but took more freedom with the clergy, to whom he told his necessities, in a kind manner; and they, with as much benignity granted a 10th; and were so complaisant to him, that whatever the king asked they granted." Here the monk falls into an exclamation against such practices; which because it is singular in its kind, we shall give in his own words. "O servile, pernitiosum exitium ecclesiæ! avertat Deus, ab omnibus regum succedentium animis, factum ejusmodi in ullam trahere consequentiam; ne forsan ipsis ea mala, sive deteriora, excogitare possint, eveniant, quæ mox huic regi, et suæ clarissimæ posteritati, miserabiliter evenerunt."

Death of Edw. IV.] Cotton has given us the names of the peers summoned to attend a parl. at Westminster, Jan. 20. in the 23d year of this king. But there are no proceedings of such a parl. on record; it is probable they never met, being prevented by the last sickness and death of the king, which happened soon after. For he died at his palace of Westminster the 9th of April 1483, and the 23d year of his reign.

Taxes in the Reign of Edw. IV.

Edward IV. had no subsidy granted him till the third year of his reign, when the parl. gave him an aid of 37,000l. to be levied according to a certain rate: but he afterwards released 6000l. of the said grant.—The next year he had tonnage and poundage of every English merchant, for every sack of wool 33s. 4d.; for every 240 wool-fells 33s. 4d.; for every last of hides 3l. 6s. 8d.; and of every merchant-stranger, whether denizens or not, for every sack of wool 3l. 6s. 8d.; for every last of hides 3l. 13s. 4d.; for every 240 wool-fells 3l. 6s. 8d. And all this was granted him for his life.—In his 8th year he had a subsidy of two 10ths and two 15ths, to be levied on the laity. This year Henry VI. was restored; but soon after Edward recovered the crown; and, in his 12th year the commons voted a supply of 14,000 archers at their own cost, the same to be levied according to a proportion out of all lands and tenements. The lords also taxed themselves, by way of grant, unto the king, towards furnishing the forces aforesaid, the 10th part of one whole year's revenue of their lands and possessions.—In his 13th year the commons granted the king one 10th, and one 15th.—The next year a subsidy was granted by the commons of one 10th and one 15th; also 51,117l. 4s. 7½d. for the wages of the 14,000 archers voted in his 12th year.—In his 15th year, he had a 10th, a 15th, and a 3rd of each; besides this, the king raised money after a new invention, called, 'A Benevolence.'—In his 22nd year he had a 10th and a 15th granted him to be levied on the laity. The clergy also granted a 10th.

Price of Provisions in the Reign of Edw. IV.

In 1463, wheat sold at London for 2s. a quarter; barley at 1s. 10d.; pease 3s. 4d.; oats 1s. 2d. Also in the same year in Norfolk, wheat sold for 1s. 8d.; barley 1s.; malt 1s. 8d.; oats 1s.—In 1464, white wheat sold for 6s. 8d. a quarter.—In 1475, oats sold for 1s. 10d. a quarter; and a load of hay for 6s. 8d.

EDWARD V.

By the death of Edward IV. the first prince of the York line, the inheritance of the crown descended, by right of succession, to his eldest son Edward, then prince of Wales; who, from the day of his father's death, was stiled king of England, and proclaimed as such, by the name of Edward V. being then about 13 years of age. This is the preamble that the great sir Thos. More gives to his life and reign of this unfortunate young king; whose state and dignity was soon undermined by his unnatural and barbarous uncle Richard, duke of Gloucester. The short reign, if we may so call it, of this prince, was so wholly taken up with the wicked intrigues of his uncle to dispossess him, that no parliament could be called; for he was not even suffered to live to his coronation. Therefore, to the particular writer abovementioned, of this king's life, and to the more general English historians, we must refer our readers; since all that was done, in this short interval of sovereignty, relating to our purpose, will be comprised in the reign of the successor; this young king and his brother being both taken off by cruel means to make way for him. Edward V. begun his life and ended it in a very unhappy manner; for he was born in a sanctuary, and died in a prison. He first saw light in Westminster abbey, where his mother had taken sanctuary, after the earl of Warwick had driven her husband Edw. IV. out of the kingdom, in Sept. 1470; and he was murdered in the tower of London, in July 1483, a little while after his uncle Richard's coronation.

RICHARD III.

A Parl. called.] In the short reign of this king we meet with but one parl. which was called to Westminster Jan. the 23, 1484, in the first year of it. The form of the writ of summons, directed to Thos. abp. of Canterbury, the rest of the bps. abbots, priors, &c. and to the temporal lords, is as usual; the first writ to the latter is directed to his most dear first-born son Edward, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester. This prince, who was then about ten years of age, had been so created at York, some months before, at his father's second coronation in that city. He enjoyed this dignity but for a short time, for he died the next year; and lived not to see his father's dismal catastrophe, nor to taste perhaps of greater misery himself. The rest of the peers, as they stand in Dugdale's catalogue, are as follows:—

Peers summoned to this Parliament.

John duke of Norfolk	Richard West lord de la War
John duke of Suffolk	Walter Devereux lord Ferrers
Wm. earl of Arundel	Jn. l. Scroop, of Bolton
Edmund earl of Kent	Thos. lord Lumley, of Lumley
Ralph earl of Westmoreland	Thomas lord Stanley, of Stanley
Henry earl of Northumberland	John Broke l. Cobham
William earl of Huntingdon	Jn. Blount l. Mountjoy
Thos. earl of Surrey	John Stourton lord Stourton
William earl of Nottingham	John Sutton l. Dudley
Francis Visc. Lovel	John lord Dynham, of Care Dynham
Edward Visc. Lisle	Rich. lord Fitz-Hugh
Ralph lord Greystock	John lord Zouch
John lord Scroop, of Masham	Thomas Arundell lord Matravers
Rich. ld. Beauchamp, of Beauchamp	Humphrey ld. Dacre, of Gilsland
John lord Audley	John l. Gray, of Powis
George lord Neville, of Bergavenny.	Wm. ld. Hastings, of Welles
Reginald lord Grey, of Wilton	Owen ld. Ogle, of Ogle
George Stanley lord de la Strange	Edw. lord Hastings, of Hungerford
Henry lord Grey

Names of the Judges summoned to this Parl.

Sir Wm. Husee, knt. chief justice	Sir Richard Neal
Sir Thomas Brian	Sir Thomas Tremayle
Sir Guy Fairfax	Sir John Vavasour, and
Sir William Jenny	Morgan Kidwelly, esq.
Sir John Catesby	the king's attorney general.
Sir Roger Tounsend

Our older chronicles, and more modern historians, are very brief in their account of the proceedings of this parl. The 'History of Croyland,' cotemporary with these times, might be expected to furnish more matter for these enquiries, relating to it: but there it is only cursorily mentioned; though some hints are given, about the methods taken to force the Act of Succession through the houses, as are almost incredible. It is there said, "That in this parl. the king, in order to strengthen his title to that crown, which he had in the preceding summer gained, brought an affair, relating to matrimonial contracts, to be disputed before an assembly of laymen. And, though it was well known that such a court had nothing to do in this matter, yet so great was the dread and fear, which then possessed the boldest, that they not only undertook the affair, but gave sentence accordingly. For," adds he, "so many great men, peers and commoners, were proscribed" he means attainted "as was never known since the time of the triumvirate of Octavius, Anthony and Lepidus. Besides, a great quantity of money was drawn out of the king's treasury at this time, in order to gain this act, and chiefly distributed amongst his northern friends, whom he planted, also, for his greater security, in every part of the kingdom; which gave much offence to his more southern subjects, and made them pay more regard to the hopes of a future revolution, than to the present tyrant."

Fabian, who lived in this king's time, and ends his chronicle with the next reign, has not one single word of this parl. Hall and Hollingshead only say, that in the beginning of 1484, a parl. was summoned, in which the earl of Richmond, and his followers, were attainted, and the people burthened with severe taxes and impositions; and that the money so collected was wasted on this king's creatures, or squandered away prodigally, to stop the mouths of such as knew any thing of his guilt in the death of his nephew.

Polydore Virgil writes, that "after this parl. had attainted all the exiled persons, and confiscated their estates to the king's use, Richard was not content with these rich spoils, but commanded them to grant him a large supply; for, in order to vindicate himself from calumny, and to buy the favour of the people, he had bestowed such largesses of money amongst them, that his treasury was very low. But the most extraordinary stretch was, that Tho. Stanley should be also declared an enemy to the state, on account of his wife Margaret's being mother to the earl of Richmond, who was commonly thought to be at the head of the conspiracy. And though a woman's politics may be judged of small moment, yet this parl. thought proper to take notice of her, and commanded her husband, in whom they could find no guile, to confine her closely; and suffer no messengers, of any account, to pass between her son and her, that might disturb the peace of the kingdom." The same author adds, that by consent of this parl. a peace with the Scots, who had begun hostilities on the English borders, was concluded.

The particular writer of this king's life (a), and a very particular one he is indeed, for, he has taken great pains to wash his black-moor white, is more explicit than any other in his account of the proceedings in this parl. He says, "That in this parl. were many good laws enacted; the marriages of king Edw. were debated; that with the lady Gray adjudged unlawful, and her children illegitimate;

there being proof of a former contract and marriage with the lady Eleanor Talbot, daughter to the old earl of Shrewsbury, and relict of the lord Butler of Sudeley, then, and long after, living. All that had been inferred by the duke of Buckingham, or contained in the bill supplicatory, demonstrated, was again consulted, and judgment given against that marriage; the incapacity also of the children of the earl of Warwick and his sister, the lady Eliz. Plantagenet, were all decreed and confirmed by act of parl. There was likewise notice taken of the earl of Richmond's pretence to the crown, by a title derived from the house of Lancaster; who was at that time in France labouring to engage the king and the duke of Britain in his quarrel. Oh! the infinite windings and perplexed steps we labour thorough, to get that which we must bid good night to to-morrow; and yet the true and rightful Lancaster had no finger in this; for this earl was not then granted to be of the house of Lancaster; until the pope, by his bull, had given him that title; and himself, after he was king, by his prerogative assumed it. In this parl. he was attainted of high treason, and with him John earl of Oxford, Tho. marq. of Dorset, Jasper earl of Pembroke, Lionel bp. of Salisbury, Pierce bp. of Exeter, the lady Margaret countess of Richmond, Tho. Morton bp. of Ely, Tho. Nandich by the stile of Tho. Nandich of Cambridge, conjurer, Wm. Knevet of Buckingham smeared with the same pitch, Geo. Brown of Beachworth, Tho. Lukener of Tratton, John Guilford, John Fogg, Edw. Poinings, Tho. Fieries of Cherstmonceux, Nich. Gainford, Wm. Clifford, John Dorrel, with others of Kent and the west country. There was further enacted, for the approbation and confirming the true and lawful title of king Rich. this clause or sentence. 'It is declared, pronounced, decreed, confirmed and established, by the authority of this present parl. that king Rich. III. is the true and undoubted king of this realm; as well by right of consanguinity and heritage, as by lawful election and coronation.' &c."

The reader will observe, that this parl. is not introduced in Cotton's "Abridgment of the Records," or in the Roll itself, with that formality as most of or all the rest are. There are no writs of summons, nor names of peers; no speech from the throne, or from the lord chanc. declaring the cause of the meeting, nor any Speaker to the commons mentioned in it. Neither is there any notice taken of a tax or subsidy; though this imposition is said by historians to have been very grievous and burdensome to the people. Nor is it surprising, that the Act of Attainder against the earl of Richmond and his followers is not to be found on Record: conquest and succession to the crown soon after gave him power enough, not only to abrogate that act, but even to erase it from the Records. And the reason the abovesaid Roll is yet extant, may be assigned to the policy of the conqueror; since it conveyed a stigma of blot on the house of York, by bastardising of Edward's children: and yet this politic successor was obliged to marry the eldest princess of that house, by compact and agreement with his coadjutors; in order to settle for ever those fatal differences, which had divided and torn the nation for so many years, about the disputed titles of York and Lancaster.

Richard was well aware that this proposed union was the greatest motive the malecontents to his govt. had to draw in many more indifferent people, not only to wish for, but to endeavour to bring it about. In order, therefore, to frustrate this project, he took a resolution to add incest to the rest of his crimes, by marrying the princess Elizabeth, his eldest brother's daughter, himself. The "History of Croyland" informs us, that "during the sitting of this parl. Richard, by fair promises, mixed with some terrible threats, had at last prevailed upon the too easy queen to send all her daughters to court, where they were received, by their unnatural uncle, with all seeming tenderness and affection. At this time also the king got together almost all the lords spiritual and temporal in the kingdom, the chief of the members of the house of commons, and the principal persons of his household, into a private parlour of the palace, and commanded them to take a new-coined oath, by whom framed is uncertain, to be true to the succession of his only son Edward, in case of his father's mortality; and they were all likewise obliged to sign their names to it." But to proceed.

Henry earl of Richmond attainted.] Mr. Rapin observes, that "Richard called this parl. at a very seasonable juncture. The duke of Buckingham's conspiracy seeming entirely stifled by the death of that lord, and the retreat of the earl of Richmond, there was not in the kingdom any person in a condition to lift up his head against him. So the parl. consisting no doubt of representatives devoted to the king, declared Edward IV.'s issue illegitimate, and confirmed Richard's irregular election, with his pretended right to the crown. This act was absolutely necessary for Richard's security; besides, the parl. thereby avoided the trouble of enquiring after the fate of Edw. V. whom all England had for some months acknowledged for king. Then an act of Attainder was passed against Henry earl of Richmond, and all his adherents, by virtue whereof all their estates were forfeited to the king. By this act, which declared all those rebels and traitors that were concerned in the duke of Buckingham's and the earl of Richmond's conspiracies, all the late executions were in some measure justified; because still such as had suffered were considered as guilty of the crime condemned by this act."

Useful Acts passed.] It must, however, be allowed, that other business was done in this parl. besides settling the Succession, and passing the bill of Attainder. Many wholesome laws were enacted in it; a plain evidence of which is their standing unrepealed, in our Statute-books, to this day. Some of the most remarkable we shall mention. "1. That whereas the subjects of this realm had of late been burdened with a new imposition, called a Benevolence, the same should not thenceforth be enacted. 2. That every justice of peace shall have power to admit a prisoner, arrested for felony, to bail; and that no officer shall seize the goods of a prisoner, arrested for felony, till he be attainted. 3. That no person shall be impannelled upon juries, but who hath 20s. freehold, or 26s. 8d. copyhold, at the least. 4. That wine and oil-vessels shall contain as follows: every tun shall hold 252 gallons; a pipe 126 gallons; a tertian 84 gallons; a hogshead 63 gallons; a barrel 31½ gallons; a rundlet 18½ gallons." The act against collecting Benevolences has this remarkable preamble: "The king, remembering how the commons of this his realm, by new and unlawful inventions, and inordinate covetousness, against the law of his realm, have been put to great thralldom, and insupportable charges and exactions, and especially by a new imposition called a Benevolence; whereby for divers years the subjects and commons of this land, against their wills and freedoms, have paid great sums of money to their almost utter destruction; for divers and many worshipful men of this realm, by occasion thereof, were compelled to break up their households, and to live in great penury and wretchedness, their debts unpaid, and their children unpreferred; and such memorials as they had ordained to be done for the wealth of their souls anentised and annulled, to the great displeasure of God, and destruction of this realm. Therefore, &c." It is easy to see that the intent of this act had a double aspect, to make Richard's own govt. seem mild and sparing of his subjects money, at the same time that it cast an odium on that of his brother Edw. But it was not very long after passing this act, that Rich. himself broke it; for, on the first news of the earl of Richmond's invasion, having sufficiently emptied his coffers, and squandered away the great treasure left by his brother, he had recourse to the very same means (which he had condemned in open parl.) to procure more. "And," says the History of Croyland, "the word Benevolence which had been used with so much contempt, converted itself; for the king sent out his creatures, who were children of this world, and therefore wiser than the children of light, who by prayers and threats, by hook or crook, scraped and gleaned together vast sums of money from almost all sorts of people, and carried it to the king's treasury."

Richard killed.] This is all we can collect relative to the transactions of this parl. What we have else to say in this reign is, that a new invasion, happening soon after under the earl of Richmond, king Richard lost his life and his crown in the battle of Bosworth, Aug. 22, 1485, and the conqueror was proclaimed, at the head of his army, king of England, &c. in the open field.

HENRY VII.

A Parl. called.] Henry having taken possession of the English crown, the solemnity of his coronation was performed in the usual place and manner, on the 13th of Oct. 1485. The next year, in order to gain a further sanction to his title, he called a parl. by writs bearing date at Westminster, Sept. 15, 1486, to meet at the same place on the 7th of Nov. following. A list of the peers, on this other great revolution in the state, is as follows:—

Peers summoned to this Parliament.

The great lord Bacon, in his "History of the Life and Reign of king Henry VII." from whom all our modern historians have copied, is so very exact in his account of the proceedings in the first parl. called by this king, that we are persuaded that noble author's own words will be more acceptable than any abridgment or alteration of them. He tells us, "That on the 7th of Nov. the king held his parl. at Westminster, which he had summoned immediately after his coming to London. His ends in calling a parl. and that so speedily, were chiefly three; 1st, to procure the crown to be entailed upon himself; 2nd, to have the attainders of all of his party, which were in no small number, reversed, and all acts of hostility by them done in his quarrel, remitted and discharged; and, on the other side, to attain by parl. the heads and principals of his enemies. The 3rd, to calm and quiet the fears of the rest of that party, by a general pardon; not being ignorant in how great danger a king stands from his subjects, when most of his subjects are conscious in themselves, that they stand in his danger. Unto these 3 special motives of a parl. was added, that he, as a prudent and moderate prince, made this judgment; that it was fit for him to hasten to let his people see, that he meant to govern by law, howsoever he came in by the sword; and fit also to reclaim them to know him for their king, whom they had so lately talked of as an enemy or banished man. For that which concerned the entailing of the crown, (more than that he was true in his own will, that he would not endure any mention of the lady Elizabeth, no not in the nature of special entail), he carried it otherwise with great wisdom and measure. For he did not press to have the act penned by way of declaration or recognition of right; as on the other side, he avoided to have it by new law or ordinance; but chose rather a kind of middle-way, by way of establishment, and that under covert and indifferent words; 'That the inheritance of the crown should rest, remain, and abide in the king, &c.' which words might equally be applied, That the crown should continue to him; but whether as having former right to it, which was doubtful, or having it then in fact and possession, which no man denied, was left fair to interpretation either way. And again, for the limitation of the entail, he did not press it to go farther than to himself and to the heirs of his body, not speaking of his right heirs; but leaving that to the law to decide; so as the entail might seem rather a personal favour to him and his children, than a total disinherison to the house of York. And in this form was the law drawn and passed. This statute he procured to be confirmed by the pope's bull the year following, with mention nevertheless, by way of recital, of his other titles, both of descent and conquest. So as now the wreath of three was made a wreath of five, for to the three first titles of the two houses, and conquest, were added two more, the authorities parliamentary and papal."

"The king likewise in the reversal of the attainders of his partakers, and discharging them of all offences incident to his service and succour, had his will and acts passed accordingly. In the passage whereof, exception was taken to divers persons in the house of commons, for that they were attainted, and thereby not legal, nor habilitate to serve in parl. being disabled in the highest degree: and that it should be a great incongruity to have them to make laws, who themselves were not in-lawed. The truth was, that divers of those which had in the time of king Rd. been strongest and most declared for the king's party, were returned knights and burgesses for the parl. whether by care or recommendation from the state, or the voluntary inclination of the people; many of which had been by Rd. III. attainted by outlawries, or otherwise. The king was somewhat troubled with this: for though it had a grave and specious shew, yet it reflected upon his party. But wisely not shewing himself at all moved therewith, he would not understand it but as a case of law; and wished the judges to be advised thereupon; who, for that purpose, were forthwith assembled in the Exchequer-Chamber, which is the Council-Chamber of the Judges; and upon deliberation they gave a grave and safe opinion and advice, mixed with law and convenience; which was, that the knights and burgesses attainted by the course of law, should forbear to come into the house, till a law were passed for the reversal of their attainders."

"It was at that time incidently moved amongst the judges in their consultation, what should be done for the king himself, who likewise was attainted; but it was with unanimous consent resolved, 'That the crown takes away all defects and stops in blood; and that from the time the king did assume the crown, the fountain was cleared, and all attainders and corruption of blood discharged.' But nevertheless for honour's sake it was ordained by parl. that all records wherein there was any memory, or mention of the king's attainder, should be defaced, cancelled, and taken off the file."

"But on the part of the king's enemies, there were by parl. attainted, the late duke of Gloucester, calling himself Rich. III. the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Surry, visc. Lovel, the Id. Ferrers, the Id. Zouch, Rich. Ratcliffe, Wm. Catesby, and many others of degree and quality. In which bills of Attainders nevertheless, there were contained many just and temperate clauses, savings and provisoes, well shewing and fore-tokening the wisdom, stay, and moderation of the king's spirit of govt. And for the pardon of the rest that had stood against the king, the king upon a second advice, thought it not fit it should pass by parl. the better, being matter of grace, to impropriate the thanks to himself; using only the opportunity of a parliament-time, the better to disperse it into the veins of the kingdom. Therefore during the parl. he published his royal proclamation, offering pardon and grace of restitution, to all such as had taken arms, or been participant of any attempts against him; so as they submitted themselves to his mercy by a day, and took the oath of allegiance and fidelity to him. Whereupon many came out of sanctuary, and many more came out of fear, no less guilty than those that had taken sanctuary."

"As for money or treasure, the king thought it not seasonable, or fit, to demand any of his subjects at this parl.; both because he had received satisfaction from them in matters of so great importance, and because he could not remunerate them with any general pardon, being prevented therein by the coronation pardon, passed immediately before. But chiefly, for that it was in every man's eye, what great forfeitures and confiscations he had at that present to help himself; whereby those casualties of the crown might in reason spare the purses of his subjects; especially in a time when he was in peace with all his neighbours (a). Some few laws passed at that parl. almost for form-sake; amongst which there was one, to reduce aliens, being made denizens, to pay strangers customs; and another, to draw to himself the seizures and compositions of Italian goods, for not employment, being points of profit to his coffers, whereof from the very beginning he was not forgetful; and had been more happy at the latter end, if his early providence, which kept him from all necessity of exacting upon his people, could likewise have tempered his nature therein. He added during parl. to his former creations, the ennoblement or advancement in nobility of a few others: the lord Chandos of Britain, was made earl of Bath, and sir Giles Dawbeney was made lord Dawbeney, and sir Robert Willoughby lord Brooke. The king did also with great nobleness and bounty, which virtues at that time had their turns in his nature, restore Edw. Stafford, eldest son to Henry duke of Buckingham, attainted in the time of king Rich. not only to his dignities, but to his fortunes and possessions, which were great; to which he was moved also by a kind of gratitude, for that the duke was the man that moved the first stone against the tyranny of king Rich. and indeed made the king a bridge to the crown upon his own ruins. Thus the parl. broke up."

A Parl. called.] In 1488 another parl. was called, by writs bearing date Sept. 1st, to meet at Westminster on the 9th of Nov. following, and in the 3d year of Henry's reign. Being all assembled, lord Bacon informs us that, Tho. Morton, abp. of Canterbury and chancellor of England, declared the cause of the summons in words to this effect:

The Lord Chancellor's Speech to both Houses.] "My lords and masters: the king's grace, our sovereign lord, hath commanded me to declare unto you the causes that have moved him at this time to summon this his parl. which I shall do in few words; craving pardon of his grace and you all, if I perform it not as I would. His grace doth first of all let you know, that he retaineth in thankful memory the love and loyalty shewed to him by you, at your last meeting, in establishment of his royalty; freeing and discharging of his partakers, and confiscation of his traitors and rebels; more than which could not come from subjects to their sovereign in one action. This he taketh so well at your hands, as he hath made it a resolution to himself to communicate with so loving and well-approved subjects, in all affairs that are of public nature, at home or abroad. Two, therefore, are the causes of your present assembling: the one, a foreign business; the other, matter of govt. at home. The French king (as no doubt you have heard) maketh at this present hot war upon the duke of Brittain. His army is now before Nants, and holdeth it straitly besieged, being the principal city (if not in ceremony and pre-eminence, yet in strength and wealth) of that duchy. You may guess at his hopes, by his attempting of the hardest part of the war first. The cause of this war he knoweth best. He alledgeth the entertaining and succouring of the duke of Orleans, and some other French lords, whom the king taketh for his enemies. Others divine of other matters. Both parts have by their ambassadors divers times prayed the king's aids: the French king, aids or neutrality; the Brittons, aids simply; for so their case requireth. The king, as a Christian prince, and blessed son of the holy church, hath offered himself as a mediator, to treat a peace between them. The French king yieldeth to treat, but will not stay the prosecution of the war. The Brittons, that desire peace most, hearken to it least; not upon confidence or stiffness, but upon distrust of true meaning, seeing the war goes on. So as the king, after as much pains and care to effect a peace as ever he took in any business, not being able to remove the prosecution on the one side, nor the distrust on the other, caused by that prosecution, hath let fall the treaty; not repenting of it, but despairing of it now, as not likely to succeed. Therefore, by this narrative, you now understand the state of the question, whereupon the king prayeth your advice; which is no other but Whether he shall enter into an auxiliary and defensive war for the Brittons against France? And for the better to open your understandings in this affair, the king hath commanded me to say somewhat to you for him, of the persons that do intervene in this business; and somewhat of the consequence thereof, as it hath relation to this kingdom; and somewhat of the example of it in general; making nevertheless no conclusion or judgment of any point, until his grace hath received your faithful and politic advices. First, for the king our sovereign himself, who is the principal person you are to eye in this business: his grace doth profess, that he truly and constantly desireth to reign in peace. But his grace saith, he will neither buy peace with dishonour, nor take it up at interest of danger to ensue; but shall think it a good change, if it pleased God to change the inward troubles and seditions, wherewith he hath been hitherto exercised, into an honourable foreign war. And for the other two persons in this action, the French king and the duke of Brittain, his grace doth declare unto you, that they be the men unto whom he is of all other friends and allies most bounden; the one having held over him his hand of protection from the tyrant, the other having reached forth unto him his hand of help, for the recovery of his kingdom. So that his affection toward them in his natural person is upon equal terms. And whereas you may have heard, that his grace was enforced to fly out of Brittain into France, for doubts of being betrayed; his grace would not in any sort have that reflect upon the duke of Brittain, in defacement of his former benefits; for that he is thoroughly informed, that it was but the practice of some corrupt persons about him, during the time of his sickness, altogether without his consent or privity. But howsoever these things do interest his grace in his particular, yet he knoweth well, that the higher bond that tieth him to procure by all means the safety and welfare of his loving subjects, doth disinterest him of these obligations of gratitude, otherwise than thus; that if his grace be forced to make a war, he do it without passion or ambition.—For the consequence of this action towards this kingdom, it is much as the French king's intention is. For if it be no more, but to range his subjects to reason, who bear themselves stout upon the strength of the duke of Brittain, it is nothing to us. But if it be in the French king's purpose, (or if it should not be in his purpose, yet if it shall follow all one, as if it were sought,) that the French king shall make a province of Brittain, and join it to the crown of France; then it is worthy the consideration, how this may import England, as well in the increasement of the greatness of France, by the addition of such a country, that stretcheth his boughs unto our seas, as in depriving this nation, and leaving it so naked of so firm and assured confederates, as the Brittons have always been. For then it will come to pass, that whereas, not long since, this realm was mighty upon the continent, first in territory, and after in alliance, in respect of Burgundy and Brittain, which were confederates indeed, but dependant confederates; now the one being already cast, partly into the greatness of France, and partly into that of Austria, the other is like wholly to be cast into the greatness of France; and this island shall remain confined in effect within the salt waters, and girt about with the coast countries of two mighty monarchs.—For the example, it resteth likewise upon the same question, upon the French king's intent. For, if Brittain be carried and swallowed up by France, as the world abroad conceive it will, then it is an example very dangerous and universal, that the lesser neighbour's estate should be devoured by the greater. For this may be the case of Scotland towards England; of Portugal towards Spain; of the smaller estates of Italy toward the greater; and so of Germany; or as if some of you of the commons might not live and dwell safely, besides some of these great lords. And the bringing in of this example will be chiefly laid to the king's charge, as to him that was most interested and most able to forbid it. But then on the other side, there is so fair a pretext on the French king's part (and yet pretext is never wanting to power) in regard the danger imminent to his own estate is such, as may make this enterprise seem rather a work of necessity than of ambition, as doth in reason correct the danger of the example. For that the example of that which is done in a man's own defence cannot be dangerous, because it is in another's power to avoid it. But in all this business, the king remits himself to your grave and mature advice, whereupon he purposeth to rely. For that which may concern govt. at home, the king hath commanded me to say unto you, That he thinketh there was never any king (for the small time that he hath reigned) had greater and juster cause of the two contrary passions, of joy and sorrow, than his grace hath. Joy, in respect of the rare and visible favours of Almighty God; in girding the Imperial sword upon his side, and assisting the same his sword against all his enemies; and likewise in blessing him with so many good and loving servants and subjects, which have never failed to give him faithful council, ready obedience, and courageous defence. Sorrow, for that it hath not pleased God to suffer him to sheath his sword (as he greatly desired otherwise than for administration of justice) but that he hath been forced to draw it so oft to cut off traiterous and disloyal subjects, whom (it seems) God hath left (a few amongst many good) as the Canaanites among the people of Israel, to be thorns in their sides, to tempt and try them; though the end hath been always (God's name be blessed therefore) that the destruction hath fallen upon their own heads. Wherefore his grace saith, That he seeth that it is not the blood spilt in the field that will save the blood in the city; nor the marshal's sword that will set this kingdom in perfect peace; but that the true way is, to stop the seeds of sedition and rebellion in their beginnings; and for that purpose to devise, confirm, and quicken good and wholesome laws, against riots, and unlawful assemblies of people, and all combinations and confederacies of them, by liveries, tokens, and other badges of factious dependence; that the peace of the land may, by these ordinances, as by bars of iron, be soundly bound in and strengthened, and all force both in court, country, and private houses, be suppress. The care hereof, which so much concerneth yourselves, and which the nature of the times doth instantly call for, his grace commends to your wisdoms. And because it is the king's desire, that this peace, wherein he hopeth to govern and maintain you, do not bear only unto you leaves for you to sit under the shade of them in safety, but also should bear you fruit of riches, wealth, and plenty: therefore his grace prays you, to take into consideration matter of trade, as also the manufactures of the kingdom, and to repress the bastard and barren employment of monies, to usury and unlawful exchanges, that they may be (as their natural use is) turned upon commerce, and lawful and royal trading. And likewise, that our people be set on work in arts and handicrafts; that the realm may subsist more of itself, that idleness be avoided, and the draining out of our treasure, for foreign manufactures, stopped. But you are not to rest here only, but to provide further, that whatsoever merchandize shall be brought in from beyond the seas may be employed upon the commodities of this land; whereby the kingdom's stock of treasure may be sure to be kept from being diminished, by any overtrading of the foreigner. And, lastly, because the king is well assured that you would not have him poor that wishes you rich; he doubteth not, but that you will have care, as well to maintain his revenues of customs, and all other natures, as also to supply him with your loving aids, if the case shall so require. The rather, for that you know the king is a good husband, and but a steward in effect for the public; and that what comes from you is but as moisture drawn from the earth, which gathers into a cloud, and falls back upon the earth again. And you know well, how the kingdoms about you grow more and more in greatness, and the times are stirring, and therefore not fit to find the king with an empty purse. More I have not to say to you; and wish that what hath been said had been better expressed; but that your wisdoms and good affections will supply. God bless your doings."

(a) Though lord Bacon says this, yet we are informed by the collection of public acts, that the usual tonnage and poundage, and the subsidy on wools, wool-fells and hides, were granted by this parl. Rymer's Fœd. Tom. XII. p. 335. The clergy also granted a tenth. Ibid. p. 323.

A Supply voted for a War with France.] This parl. not only advised the king to espouse the cause of the duke of Brittainy, and send him some speedy aid, but unanimously voted the king a large supply for that purpose. Accordingly, Rob. lord Brock was sent over to his aid, with a body of 8000 choice men, well armed; but it all came to nothing; for the duke having lost a battle and soon after his life, the English forces were recalled, and the district of Brittainy was reduced under subjection to the crown of France, in which state it has ever since remained.

Acts passed.] Many excellent laws were made in this parl. and as lord Bacon has elegantly and judiciously drawn them all up under their several heads, we cannot do better than give them in his own words as follow:

"First, the Authority of the Star-Chamber, which before subsisted by the ancient common laws of the realm, was confirmed in certain cases by act of parl. This court is one of the sagest and noblest institutions of this kingdom. For in the distribution of courts of ordinary justice, (besides the high court of parl.) in which distribution the king's bench holdeth the pleas of the crown; the common place, pleas civil; the exchequer, pleas concerning the king's revenue; and the chancery the pretorian power for mitigating the rigour of law, in case of extremity, by the conscience of a good man: there was nevertheless always reserved a high and pre-eminent power to the king's council, in causes that might in example, or consequence, concern the state of the commonwealth, which if they were criminal, the council used to sit in the chamber, called the Star-Chamber; if civil, in the White-Chamber, or White-Hall. And, as the chancery had the pretorian power for equity, so the Star-Chamber had the censorian power for offences, under the degree of capital. This court of Star-Chamber is compounded of good elements, for it consisteth of 4 kinds of persons; counsellors, peers, prelates, and chief judges. It discerneth also principally of 4 kinds of causes; forces, frauds, crimes various of stellionate, and the inchoations or middle acts towards crimes capital, or heinous, not actually committed or perpetrated. But that which was principally aimed at by this act was force, and the two chief supports of force, combination of multitudes, and maintenance or headship of great persons."

"From the general peace of the country, the king's care went on to the peace of the king's house, and the security of his great officers and counsellors. But this law was somewhat of a strange composition and temper; That if any of the king's servants under the degree of a lord, do conspire the death of any of the king's counsel, or lord of the realm, it is made capital. This law was thought to be procured by the lord chanc. who being a stern and haughty man, and finding he had some mortal enemies in court, provided for his own safety; drowning the envy of it in a general law, by communicating the privilege with all other counsellors and peers, and yet not daring to extend it further, than to the king's servants in Checkrowle, lest it should have been too harsh to the gentlemen, and other commons of the kingdom; who might have thought their ancient liberty and the clemency of the laws of England invaded, if the will in any case of felony should be made the deed. And yet the reason which the act yieldeth (that is to say, That he that conspireth the death of counsellors may be thought indirectly, and by a means to conspire the death of the king himself) is indifferent to all subjects, as well as to servants in court. However it seems this sufficed to serve the lord chancellor's turn at this time: but yet he lived to need a general law, for that he grew afterwards as odious to the country, as he was then to the court."

"From the peace of the king's house, the king's care extended to the peace of private houses and families; for there was an excellent moral law moulded thus; The taking and carrying away women forcibly, and against their will, (except female wards and bond women) was made capital.—There was made also another law for peace in general, and repressing of murders and manslaughters, and was in amendment of the common laws of the realm, being this; That whereas by the common law, the king's suit in case of homicide, did expect the year and the day, allowed to the party's suit by way of appeal; and that it was found by experience, that the party was many times compounded with, and many times wearied with the suit, so that in the end such suit was let fall, and by that time the matter was in a manner forgotten, and thereby prosecution at the king's suit by indictment (which is ever best, flagrante crimine) neglected; it was ordained, That the suit by indictment might be taken as well at any time within the year and the day, as after, not prejudicing nevertheless the parties suit.—The king began also then, as well in wisdom as in justice, to pare a little the Privilege of Clergy, ordaining, That clerks convicted should be burnt in the hand, both because they might taste of some corporal punishment, and that they might carry a brand of infamy. But for this good act's sake, the king himself was after branded by Perkin's proclamation, for an execrable breaker of the rights of holy church.—Another law was made for the better peace of the country; by which law the king's officers and farmers were to forfeit their places and holds, in case of unlawful retainer, or partaking in riots and unlawful assemblies.—There was also made good and politic laws in that parl. against Usury, which is the bastard use of money; and against unlawful chievances and exchanges, which is bastard usury. And also for the security of the king's customs; and for the employment of the proceedings of foreign commodities, brought in by merchant-strangers, upon the native commodities of the realm: together with some other laws of less importance."

An Insurrection in the North.] But, notwithstanding these good and salutary laws were, by the three estates, enacted; yet the people were so far from being well reconciled to the govt. that they seemed to watch all opportunities to rebel against it. Accordingly, when the king's commissioners came down to levy the subsidy in Yorkshire and the bishopric of Durham, the inhabitants began to mutiny; saying openly, That they had lately endured a thousand injuries, and that they neither could nor would pay the tax demanded. This was their pretence; but lord Bacon observes that "the refusal did not proceed from any present necessity, but from the old humour of those countries; where the memory of king Richard was so strong, that, like lees, it lay in the bottom of men's hearts; and, if the vessel was but stirred, it would come up." The commissioners, being somewhat astonished, referred the matter to the earl of Northumberland, who was the principal man for authority in those parts. The earl instantly informed the court of it, and signified in plain terms how boisterous these northern people were, and desired the king's directions about the affair. Henry sent back a peremptory answer, "That he would not abate one penny of a Subsidy, which had been granted him by parl.; because it might encourage other counties to expect the like release, or mitigation; but, chiefly, because he would never suffer that the base multitude should frustrate the authority of parl. wherein their votes and consents were included." Upon this dispatch from court the earl assembled the principal justices and freeholders of the county; and delivered the king's mind to them in the very same imperious language it was sent; which should not have been so, but that, as lord Bacon observes, "this harsh business was unfortunately fallen into the hands of a harsh man." In short, it proved fatal to himself; for this message did not only irritate the people greatly, but made them conceive that the deliverer of it was the principal contriver and persuader of the council. A mob, or rabble of people, rose instantly upon it, and, assailing the duke's house, slew him and several of his servants. Nor did it stop here, for the rabble creating for their leader one sir John Egremont, a factious person, and one who for a long time had borne the king an ill will; being animated, also, by another incendiary, a mean fellow, called John à Chambre, who bore a principal sway amongst them, they broke out into an open rebellion, and gave out in flat terms, that they would march against Henry, and fight for the maintenance of their liberties. When the king was advertised of this new insurrection, he seemed little troubled at it, but sent down the earl of Surrey with a sufficient force against the rebels; who, fought with, and defeated them, taking prisoner one of their leaders John à Chambre; the other, sir John Egremont, found means to escape into Flanders, to the lady Margaret duchess of Burgundy; whose court was then an asylum for all the enemies to king Henry. Soon after this defeat the king came down to York, where John à Chambre was executed in great state. The rest of the rebels were pardoned; and the king having settled these northern commotions, returned to London; leaving the earl of Surrey his lieut. in those parts, and sir Rd. Tunstall for his principal commissioner to levy the Subsidy; of which, adds lord Bacon, he did not remit one denier. This insurrection happened in 1489.

A Parl. called.] At the end of the 4th year of his reign, the king thought fit to call another parl. but the express time is not mentioned in Dugdale; for the summons to this, and the parliaments in the two succeeding years, are not to be found on the Rolls. However, the Statute Books say, it began Jan. 13, 1490.—Many wise laws were made in this parl. a short account of which we shall give in the words of lord Bacon.

Acts passed.] "The king, finding by the insurrection in the north, there was discontentment abroad, in respect of the Subsidy, he thought it good to give his subjects yet farther contentment, and comfort in that kind. Certainly his times for good commonwealths laws did excel; so as he may justly be celebrated for the best law-giver to this nation, after king Edw. 1. For his laws (who so marks them well) are deep, and not vulgar; not made upon the spur of a particular occasion for the present, but out of providence of the future, to make the estate of his people still more and more happy; after the manner of the legislators in ancient and heroical times.—First, therefore, he made a law suitable to his own acts and times. For, as himself had in his person and marriage made a final concord, in the great suit and title for the crown; so by this law he settled the like peace and quiet in the private possessions of the subjects. Ordaining, That Fines thenceforth should be final to conclude all strangers rights; and that upon Fines levied, and solemnly proclaimed, the subject should have his time of watch for 5 years after his title accrued; which, if he fore-passed, his right should be bound for ever after; with some exception nevertheless, of minors, married women, and such incompetent persons.—“Another statute was made of singular policy, for the Population apparently, and (if it be thoroughly considered) for the Soldiery and Military Forces of the realm.—Inclosures at that time began to be more frequent, whereby arable land which could not be manured without people and families was turned into pasture, which was easily rid by a few herdsmen; and tenancies for years, lives, and at will (whereupon much of the yeomanry lived) were turned into demesnes. This bred a decay of people, and, by consequence, a decay of towns, churches, tithes, and the like. The king likewise knew full well, that there ensued withal upon this a decay and diminution of subsidy and taxes; for the more gentlemen, ever the lower books of subsidies. In remedying of this inconvenience, the king's wisdom was admirable, and the parliament's at that time. Inclosures they would not forbid, for that had been to forbid the improvement of the patrimony of the kingdom; nor tillage they would not compel, for that was to strive with the nature and utility. But they took a course to take away depopulating Inclosures, and depopulating Pasturage, and yet not by that name, or by any imperious express prohibition, but by consequence. The ordinance was, That all houses of husbandry that were used with 20 acres of ground and upwards, should be maintained and kept up for ever; together with a competent proportion of land to be used and occupied with them, and in no wise to be severed from them; as by another statute, made afterwards in his successor's time, was more fully declared. This upon forfeiture to be taken; not by way of popular action, but by seizure of the land itself, by the king and lords of the fee, as to half the profits, till the houses and lands were restored. By this means the houses being kept up, did of necessity inforce a dweller; and the proportion of land for occupation being kept up, did of necessity inforce that dweller, not to be a beggar or cottager, but a man of some substance, that might keep hinds and servants, and set the plough on going. This did wonderfully concern the might and manhood of the kingdom to have fermes, as it were of a standard sufficient to maintain an able body out of penury; and did in effect amortize a great part of the lands of the kingdom unto the hold and occupation of the yeomanry, or middle people, of a condition between gentlemen and cottagers or peasants. Now, how much this did advance the military power of the kingdom, is apparent by the true principles of war, and the examples of other kingdoms. For it hath been held by the general opinion of men of best judgment in the wars, that the principal strength of an army consisteth in the infantry or foot. And to make good infantry, it requireth men bred, not in a servile or indigent fashion, but in some free and plentiful manner. Therefore if a state run most to noblemen and gentlemen, and that the husbandmen and ploughmen be but as their work-folks and labourers, or else mere cottagers (which are but house beggars) you may have a good cavalry, but never good stable bands of foot.—The king also, having care to make his realm potent, as well by sea as by land, for the better maintenance of the Navy, ordained, That Wines and Woods from the parts of Gascoigny and Languedoc, should not be brought but in English bottoms; bowing the ancient policy of this estate, from consideration of plenty to consideration of power. For that almost all the ancient statutes incite by all means merchant-strangers, to bring in all sorts of commodities; having for end cheapness, and not looking to the point of state concerning the naval power.—The king also made a statute in that parl. monitory and minatory, towards Justices of Peace, that they should duly execute their office; inviting complaints against them, first to their fellow justices, then to the justices of assize, then to the king or chancellor; and that a proclamation, which he had published of that tenor, should be read in open sessions 4 times a year, to keep them awake.—He made also laws for the correction of the Mint and counterfeiting of foreign Coin current. And that no payment in gold should be made to any merchant stranger, the better to keep treasure within the realm, for that gold was the metal that lay in least room.—He made also statutes for the maintenance of Drapery, and the keeping of Wools within the realm; and not only so, but for stinting and limiting the prices of cloth; one for the finer, and another for the coarser sort. Which I note, both because it was a rare thing to set prices by statute, especially upon our home commodities; and because of the wise model of the act, nor prescribing prices, but stinting them not to exceed a rate, that the clothier might drape accordingly, as he might afford.”—Divers other good statutes were made that parl. but these were the principal. And here I do desire those, into whose hands this work shall fall, that they do take in good part my long insisting upon the laws that were made in this king's reign; whereof I have these reasons: both because it was the pre-eminent virtue and merit of this king, to whose memory I do honour; and because it hath some correspondence to my person; but chiefly, because, in my judgment, it is some defect even in the best writers of history, that they do not often enough summarily deliver and set down the most memorable laws, that passed in the times whereof they write, being indeed the principal acts of peace. For though they may be had in original books of law themselves; yet that informeth not the judgment of kings and counsellors, and persons of estate, so well as to see them described, and entered in the table and pourtrait of the times."

A Parl. called.] We have now lapse of 3 years, before we meet with an account of another parl.; in which interval, the exigencies of the state had rendered it absolutely necessary to enter into a war with France. On the 12th of Aug. 1492, writs were issued for calling a parl. to meet at Westminster, on the 17th of Oct. following. The first writ to the peers is directed to his most dear first-born son Arthur, prince of Wales, &c. a child then about two years of age.

The King's Speech.] At the time appointed, being all assembled as usual, the king himself spoke to them, from the throne, in these words:—My lords, and you the commons;—when I purposed to make a war in Brittainy by my lieut. I made declaration thereof to you by my chancellor; but now that I mean to make a war upon France in person, I will declare it to you myself. That war was to defend another man's right, but this is to recover our own; and that ended by accident, but we hope this shall end in victory. The French king troubles the christian world. That which he hath is not his own, and yet he seeketh more. He hath invested himself of Brittainy. He maintaineth the rebels in Flanders, and he threateneth Italy. For ourselves, he hath proceeded from dissimulation to neglect, and from neglect to contumely. He hath assailed our confederates; he denieth our tribute. In a word, he seeks war; so did not his father, but sought peace at our hands; and so perhaps will he, when good council or time shall make him see as much as his father did.—Meanwhile, let us make his ambition our advantage; and let us not stand upon a few crowns of tribute or acknowledgement, but (by the favour of Almighty God) try our right for the crown of France itself; remembering that there hath been a French king prisoner in England, and a king of England crowned in France. Our confederates are not diminished. Burgundy is in a mightier hand than ever, and never more provoked. Brittainy cannot help us, but it may hurt them. New acquets are more burthen than strength. The malecontents of his own kingdom have not been base, popular, nor titular impostors, but of an higher nature. The king of Spain (doubt ye not) will join with us, not knowing where the French king's ambition will stay. Our holy father the Pope likes no Tramontanes in Italy. But howsoever it be, this matter of confederates is rather to be thought on than reckoned on. For, God forbid, but England should be able to get reason of France, without a second.—At the battles of Cressy, Poitiers, Agencourt, we were of ourselves. France hath much people, and few soldiers. They have not stable hands of foot. Some good horse they have, but those are forces which are least fit for a defensive war, where the actions are in the assailants choice. It was our discords only that lost France; and (by the power of God) it is the good peace which we now enjoy, that will recover it. God hath hitherto blessed my sword. I have in this time that I have reigned, weeded out my bad subjects and tried my good. My people and I know one another, which breeds confidence. And if there should be any bad blood left in the kingdom, an honourable foreign war will vent it, or purify it. In this great business, let me have your advice and aid. If any of you were to make his son knight, you might have aid of your tenants by law. This concerns the knighthood and spurs of the kingdom, whereof I am father; and bound not only to seek to maintain it, but to advance it. But for matter of treasure, let it not be taken from the poorer sort; but from those, to whom the benefit of the war may redound. France is no wilderness; and I, that profess good husbandry, hope to make the war, after the beginnings, to pay itself. Go together in God's name, and lose no time; for I have called this parl. wholly for this cause."

War with France—a Benevolence granted.] Lord Bacon observes, "That the parl. took fire immediately at this speech, being ever affectionate to a War with France: but, at this time the more so, in order to repair the dishonour they thought the king had sustained by the loss of Britany.—Therefore they advised the king, with great alacrity, to undertake the war of France. And although the parl. consisted of the first and second nobility, together with the principal citizens and townsmen, yet worthily and justly respecting more the people, whose deputies they were, than their own private persons; and finding by the ld. chancellor's speech the king's inclination that way, they consented that commissioners should go forth, for the gathering and levying of a Benevolence, from the more able sort. This tax, called Benevolence, was devised by Edw. IV. for which he sustained much envy. It was abolished by Rd. III. by act of parl. to ingratiate himself with the people; and it was now revived by this king, but with consent of parl. for so it was not in the time of Edw. IV. But by this way he raised exceeding great sums; insomuch as the city of London, in those days, contributed 9000*l.* and better, and that chiefly levied upon the wealthier sort.—There is a tradition of a dilemma, that bp. Morton, the chancellor, used to raise up the Benevolence to higher rates; some called it his fork, and some his crotch. For he had couched an article in the instructions to the commissioners, who were to levy the Benevolence, that if they met with any that were sparing, they should tell them, that they must needs have because they laid up; and if they were spenders, they must needs have because it was seen in their port, and manner of living. So neither kind came amiss.—This parl. was merely a parl. of war; for it was in substance but a declaration of war against France and Scotland, with some statutes conducing thereunto; as the severe punishing of Mortpays, and keeping back of soldiers wages by captains; the like severity for the departure of soldiers without licence; strengthening of the common law in favour of protections, for those that were in the king's service; and the setting the gate open and wide, for men to sell or mortgage their lands without fines for alienation, to furnish themselves with money for the war; and lastly, the avoiding of all Scottish men out of England. There was also a statute, for the dispersing of the standard of the exchequer, throughout England; thereby to size weights and measures; and two or three more of less importance."

A Peace concluded.] Great preparations were now made for the French war, and the king actually embarked with them at Sandwich, Oct. the 6th, and the same day landed at Calais. Afterwards Henry besieged Boulogne, in form; but there he received such overtures of a peace from the French king, as were very acceptable to him; and money, the idol which Henry always worshipped, soon brought it to a conclusion. In short, the price of a peace was stated on one side, and agreed to on the other; by which Henry filled his coffers, but it was by the emptying of a great many of the purses of the nobility and principal persons in the army; who had many of them sold or engaged their estates upon the hopes of this war. These stuck not to say, "That the king had made good what he had said in parliament; that after the war was once begun, he doubted not but to make it pay itself. And he had kept his promise accordingly." Henry received from the French king, in ready money, 745,000 ducats, which amounts to 136,250*l.* English; and a pension of tribute of 25,000 crowns yearly.

Soon after the king's return from France, another conspiracy broke out against him; which had like to have proved of worse consequence than any that hitherto happened. Margaret, dutchess of Burgundy, sister to Edw. IV. was a princess who watched all opportunities to disturb Henry's repose; and had now spirited up one Perkin Warbeck, a bold and comely youth, to personate Richard duke of York, said to have been murdered with his brother in the tower. To the noble historian, and the more general histories, we refer our readers for the particulars of this affair; which continued in agitation some years before it was entirely settled.

A Parl. called.] In the midst of these commotions, Henry thought fit to call another parl. the writs of summons bearing date at Westminster, Sept. 15th, 1497, for a parl. to meet at the same place on the 14th of Oct. following; which is scarcely a month's notice.

Acts passed.] "The principal law," says lord Bacon, "that was made this parl. was a law of a strange nature; rather just than legal, and more magnanimous than provident. This law did ordain, That no person that did assist in arms, or otherwise, the king for the time being, should afterward be impeached therefore, or attainted; either by the course of the law, or by act of parl.: but if any such act of attainder did happen to be made, it should be void, and of none effect; for that it was agreeable to reason of estate, that the subject should not enquire of the justness of the king's title, or quarrel; and it was agreeable to good conscience, that, whatsoever the fortune of the war were, the subject should not suffer for his obedience. The spirit of this law was wonderfully pious and noble; being like in matter of war unto the spirit of David in matter of plague, who said, 'If I have sinned, strike me; but what have these sheep done?' Neither wanted this law parts of prudent and deep foresight: for it did the better take away occasion for the people to busy themselves, to pry into the king's title; for that howsoever it fell, their safety was already provided for.—There was also made a shoaring or underpropping act for the Benevolence; to make the sums which any person had agreed to pay, and nevertheless were not brought in, to be leviable by a course of law. Which act did not only bring in the arrears, but did indeed countenance the whole business, and was pretended to be made at the desire of those, that had been forward to pay.—In this parl. also was made that good law, which gave the attain upon a false verdict between party and party, which before was a kind of evangile, irremediable.—There was another law made against a branch of ingratitude in women, who having been advanced by their husbands, or their husbands' ancestors, should alien, and thereby seek to defeat the heirs, or those in remainder, of the lands, whereunto they had been so advanced. The remedy was, by giving power to the next, to enter for a forfeiture.—There was also enacted that charitable law, for the admission of poor suitors in forma pauperis, without fee to counsellor, attorney, or clerk."

A Parl. called.] Though in the acts of this parl. there is no mention made of the opposition then on foot; yet it is certain that Henry was not without his apprehensions. The impostor, Perkin Warbec, had prevailed upon the king of Scots to espouse his quarrel; who actually invaded England the next year; and Henry found himself obliged, at last, to lay the affair before a parl. which was summoned to meet at Westminster, on the 16th of Jan. 1498. Lord Bacon says, "that in a speech from the throne, he did much exaggerate."

rate both the malice and the cruel predatory war lately made by the king of Scotland; 'that this king being in amity with him, and no ways provoked, should so burn in hatred towards him, as to drink of the lees and dregs of Perkin's intoxication, who was every where else detected and discarded. And that when he perceived it was out of his reach to do the king any hurt, he had turned his arms upon unarmed and unprovided people, to spoil only and depopulate, contrary to the laws both of war and peace: concluding, that he could neither with honour, nor with the safety of his people, to whom he did owe protection, let pass these wrongs unrevenged.' The parl. understood him well, and gave him a subsidy, limited to the sum of 120,000*l.* besides two 15ths. For his wars were always to him as a mine of treasure, of a strange kind of ore, iron at the top, and gold and silver at the bottom.—At this parl. there were no laws made to be remembered. Only there passed a law, at the suit of the merchant-adventurers of England, against the merchant-adventurers of London, for monopolizing and exacting upon the trade; which it seemeth they did, a little to save themselves, after the hard time they had sustained by want of trade. But those innovations were taken away by parliament."

A Subsidy granted.] The Subsidy granted this parl. according to Fabian, was two 10ths and a half, two aides and two 15ths, in order to raise the sum of 120,000*l.* for the Scotch war. The king borrowed also of the city of London 4000*l.*; but Hall and Hollingshead both say, that though this Subsidy, now granted, was not great, yet the common people grudged much to pay it; always hating such taxes and exactions.—No sooner did this Subsidy begin to be levied in Cornwall, than the Cornish men rose in an actual rebellion against it; under the leading of one Flamnock, a lawyer, and one Michael Joseph, a blacksmith. These captains marched their followers towards Keut; and at Welles were joined by James Touchet, lord Audley, who, to the great joy of the insurgents, accepted of the sole command over them. From Welles they marched to Blackheath, where the king's forces met and defeated them without much trouble; the lord Audley and the other leaders were taken prisoners, and soon after executed.—Not long after the conclusion of the last parl. Perkin Warbec's affairs came to a crisis; and after many struggles to subvert the present govt. he was taken at last, and committed prisoner to the tower; from whence, not long after, he was drawn to Tyburn, and there executed.

A Parl. called.] It was not till 7 years after the last, that Henry thought fit to summon another parl. The summons to this parl. is not on record; but our Statute Books inform us, that it met on the 16th of Jan. 1505.—The king's pretence in assembling this parl. was the necessity of reviving certain statutes and making some new ones. But the real motive was to demand a Subsidy for his eldest daughter's dowry, just then married to the king of Scots. "The custom of demanding money on such occasions," says Rapin, "was too advantageous to this king to suffer it to be abolished. The new queen's portion was but 30,000 nobles; but, the subsidy granted may be well thought more considerable, besides a handsome present made by the clergy on the same account. So that instead of emptying his coffers, by the marriage of his daughter, he filled them the fuller for it.—Fabian, whose chronicle ends in the last year of this king, informs us, that it was not a subsidy, but only an aid of 36,000*l.* that was granted; though he does not tell us whether it was on the marriage of the princess or not.

Acts passed.] Lord Bacon begins his account of the proceedings in this parl. with observing, "That a man may easily guess how absolute the king took himself to be with his parliament, when his creature Dudley, that was so odious to the public, was made Speaker of the house of commons." He tells us, "that there were not any memorable statutes made in it, relating to public govt.; and those that were passed, had still a stamp of the king's wisdom and policy; that is, of his craft and avarice. The noble historian has given us so full a view of this king's unjust exactions, drawn up in a very few words, at the end of his account of the acts made in this parl. that it cannot be unacceptable to our readers.

"There was a statute made for the disannulling of all Patents of Lease or Grant, to such as came not upon lawful summons to serve the king in his wars, against his enemies or rebels, or that should depart without the king's licence; with an exception of certain persons of the long robe. Providing nevertheless, that they should have the king's wages, from their house, till their return home again.—Another statute was made, prohibiting the bringing in of Manufactures of Silk wrought by itself, or mixed with any other thread. But it was not of Stuffs of whole piece (for that the realm had of them no manufacture in use at that time) but of knit silk, or texture of silk; as ribbands, laces, cawls, points, and girdles, &c. which the people of England could then well skill to make. This law pointed at a true principle; that where foreign materials are but superfluities, foreign manufactures should be prohibited. For that will either banish the superfluity or gain the manufacture.—There was a law also of Resumption of Patents of Goals, and the re-annexing of them to the sheriffwicks; privileged officers being no less an interruption of justice, than privileged places.—A law was made to restrain the Bye-Laws or Ordinances of Corporations, which many times were against the prerogative of the king, the common law of the realm, and the liberty of the subject, being fraternities in evil. It was therefore provided, that they should not be put in execution without the allowance of the chancellor, treasurer, and the two chief justices, or three of them, or of the two justices of circuit where the corporation was.—Another law was, in effect, to bring in the Silver of the realm to the Mint, in making all clipped, diminished, or impaired coins of silver, not to be current in payments; without giving any remedy of weight, but with an exception only of a reasonable wearing, which was as nothing in respect of the uncertainty; and so, upon the matter, to set the mint on work, and to give way to new coins of silver, which should be then minted.—There was likewise a long statute against Vagabonds, wherein two things may be noted; the one the dislike the parl. had of goaling of them, as that which was chargeable, pesterous, and of no open example. The other, that in the statutes of this king's time, for this of the 19th year is not the only statute of that kind, there are ever coupled, the punishment of vagabonds, and the forbidding of dice and cards, and unlawful games, unto servants and mean people, and the putting down and suppressing of ale-houses, as strings of one root together, and as if the one were unprofitable without the other.—As for Riot and Retainers, there passed scarce any parl. in this time without a law against them, the king ever having an eye to might and multitude."

A Subsidy and a Benevolence.] "There was granted also in this parl. a Subsidy, both for the temporality and the clergy. And yet nevertheless, ere the year expired, there went out commissions for a general Benevolence; though there were no wars, no fears. The same year the city gave 5000 marks, for confirmation of their liberties; a thing fitter for the beginnings of kings' reigns than the latter ends. Neither was it a small matter, that the Mint gained upon the late statute, by the recoinage of groats and half groats, now twelve-pences and sixpences. As for Empson and Dudley's mills, they did grind more than ever. So that it was a strange thing, to see what golden showers poured down upon the king's treasury at once. The last payments of the Marriage Money from Spain; the Subsidy; the Benevolence; the Recoinage; the Redemption of the City's liberties; the Casualties. And this is the more to be marvelled at, because the king had then no occasions at all of wars or troubles. He had now but one son and one daughter unbestowed. He was wise; he was of an high mind; he needed not to make riches his glory. He did excel in so many things else; save that certainly avarice doth ever find in itself matter of ambition. Belike he thought to leave his son such a kingdom, and such a mass of treasure, as he might choose his greatness where he would."

This was the last parl. called in the reign of Henry VII. who lived not three years after the dissolution of it. He died at Richmond, in Surrey, April 22, 1509, in the 52nd year of his age, and the 23rd of his reign.

Taxes in the Reign of Henry VII.

In his 3rd year a large supply was granted him for a war with France; but the value of it uncertain.—In his 7th year a Benevolence was granted by parl. for the same purpose.—In his 11th year the remaining arrears thereof were collected to the full.—The next year he had a subsidy of 120,000l. besides two 15ths. In his 19th year he had an aid of 36,000l. for the dowry of his eldest daughter, then married to the king of Scots. And, in the same year, a subsidy in parl. both from the temporality and clergy; nevertheless he issued out commissions for raising a general Benevolence.

Price of Provisions in the Reign of Henry VII.

In 1485, wheat sold at 3s. per bu. and bay salt the same price; hay, 5s. per load.—In 1489, oats at 2s. per qr.—In 1491, wheat 14s. 8d. per qr.—In 1494, oats at 2s. and beans 3s. 4d. per qr.—In 1491, wheat sold for only 4s. per qr. and the next year only 3s. 4d. But in 1497, it rose to 20s.—In 1498, hay sold from 8s. 2d. to 10s. and 12s. per load.—The next year, wheat sold for 1l. 4s. per qr.; and in 1504, for 5s. 8d. per bushel.—The next year, a load of hay sold for 6s. and oats 3s. per qr.—In 1506, oats 2s. and beans 3s. 8d. per qr. Next year about the same price.—And, in 1508, oats sold for 1s. 10d. per quarter.

On the day appointed, Jan. 21, 1510, the parl. met in the great chamber of the palace at Westminster, near the royal chapel, or oratory; and the king sitting on his throne, Wm. Warham, abp. of Canterbury, lord high chanc. of England, by the king's command, declared the cause of the summons under this text, 'deum timete, regem honorificate.' Pet. ii. Which the prelate divided into two parts: to the first he said, "that fear was essential in many proceedings; and that it particularly required kings and great men to fear God above all others; by the neglect of which, not only kings and their subjects, but even cities, commonwealths, and kingdoms, were afflicted, chastised, or almost totally subverted. For this cause only, that the fear of God was not before their eyes." To the 2nd part he argued, "that kings ought to be honoured by their subjects; and that to honour the king is to choose judgment or understanding. In enlarging upon which, he shewed many sorts or kinds of judgment; concluding, that the abovesaid honour was the most powerful when the king's subjects governed themselves well; and, when there was occasion, reformed themselves also. And, when the judges, acting by the royal authority, administer such judgment as is both just and right, humane and natural. Saying, how necessary good laws are for the right govt. of any kingdom, 'quia leges sunt norma reipublicæ bene instituendæ;' by an exact observation of which all republics must prosper. He argued also that our forefathers were accounted wise, not so much from many excellent laws which they made and published, for the benefit of posterity; but for a diligent and indifferent observation of them. Hence Almighty God ought to be prayed to, that good and nourishing laws might not only be enacted in this parliament, which he aptly termed the stomach of the nation, but that they might be also uprightly executed. Upon justice, he said, that it chiefly and necessarily behoved kings to govern their dominions wisely; and then introduced several other officers trusted with the affairs of the public. The judges, who rightly and duly administered justice, he said, were the eyes of the commonwealth; the learned expositors of the laws he styled the tongues of it. Others were the messengers of the govt. as the sheriffs and magistrates of cities and counties; the former of which, who did not execute their offices rightly, he compared to Noah's raven. The collectors of the taxes and customs he called the commonwealth's spies, of which number few he said were found to be good. Others were the pillars of the govt. as juries of 12 men are. Lastly, says our authority, 'cum magno auditium plausu,' he went upon the state of the whole kingdom, and urged that it was the real interest of each separate body, spiritual, temporal, and commonalty, to unite in supporting the crown; that justice, which is the queen of virtues, may be auspicious in the nation; that both bp. and peer may join in reforming the errors of past times; in utterly abolishing all iniquitous laws; in moderating the rough and severe ones; in enacting good and useful statutes; and, when made, to see that they should be faithfully, honestly, and inviolably observed. Which, if this parl. will perform, then he affirmed, that there was no one could doubt, but that God should be feared, the king honoured, and, for the future, the commonwealth served with good counsellors, every way useful to the king and kingdom."

A Speaker chosen.] After this discourse was ended, the chancellor, in the king's name, directed the commons to meet and choose their Speaker. Accordingly, on the next day, they presented Tho. Inglefield, esq. as their Speaker; whose excuse, for insufficiency, being not accepted, he was confirmed. At the same time it was unanimously agreed, by the lords, to meet the next morning, and every day during the sitting of this parl. at 9 of the clock, in order to do business.

Jan. 24, the lords again met, when 4 bills were presented and read. The first, as usual, to confirm the liberties of holy church. The next, to prevent false returns in escheats to the crown. One for forfeited patents granted for life; and another for reforming excess in apparel. The two first and the last were read twice on that day, and committed to the king's attorney and solicitor general for their amendments.

Proceedings against Empson and Dudley.] Lord Herbert tells us, "That at this time it was thought fit for many reasons, but especially for contenting the commonality, which seemed to be wholly altered by the rigorous proceedings of Henry VII. to call a parl. which began in Jan. following." He adds, "that the principal persons designed to be struck at in it, were Empson and Dudley, two of the late king's chief ministers; and who were now not only exposed to the revenge of all men, but had been publicly tried at Guildhall, some time before, for high treason, found guilty and condemned for it."

The reader may observe, that the lord chanc. glances strongly in his speech at the opening of this parliament, against such iniquitous practices, of which these men had been found guilty. And the principal scope of the members of both houses seemed to have reference to this business alone; especially the lower house were so warm in it, that the king thought proper, adds the historian above quoted, to restrain his own authority, in some sort, in order to enlarge the people's confidence and affection to him.—The first stroke that we find in the Journal-Book, made at these oppressors, is in a bill brought from the commons, and read in the upper house, for removing and abolishing both the names and offices of all Promoters and Commissaries for ever. To which the lords agreed, and ordered farther, that the names of those officers should be entered on the parl. roll, as a perpetual memorial of their infamy and disgrace.—The next is, that a bill of Attainder against the persons and estates of sir Tho. Empson, knt. and Edm. Dudley, esq. was brought up to the lords, and passed without opposition. Several of the statutes by which the late king took advantage of the people, were now either repealed, explained, or limited. Amongst which, the benefit of forfeitures for penal laws was reduced to the term of 3 years next succeeding, the offence committed to the king; and to any other person within one year. Lastly, some untrue inquisitions, found by Empson and Dudley, as also some assurances of lands passed to them, were annihilated and made void. But though these men were cast into prison, and thus loaded, as it were, by a double sentence of both jury and parl. yet the king was not over hasty in ordering their execution. Till the next year, in a progress he made, the people's clamours were so great against these criminals, that, for their satisfaction, he sent a special writ to have their heads struck off.

A Subsidy.] On the last day of the session, Feb. 23, the commons, with consent of the lords, granted a supply of two 10ths and two 15ths. After which being all met in the chamber called the Cross-Chamber of the palace; the king on his throne, and the peers in their parl. robes; the Speaker of the commons, now sir Tho. Inglefield, knt. spoke to the king on presenting the bills to this effect. "He first bestowed great praises on his maj. for the gifts of nature, fortune, and grace, which God had given to him. But more particularly enlarged on his promising valour, wonderful temperance, divine moderation in justice, and his avowed desire for clemency. At the same time he declared, by many examples, the great good will and due obedience which his subjects payed him; and as a testimony of which, the grant for the subsidy, which he then presented, containing a very large sum of money, was a sure and certain proof of their fidelity and affection towards his majesty's person and govt." After this harangue was ended, all the bills passed by this parl. were separately read for the royal assent; and then the lord chanc. returning thanks to the whole body, for their great care and diligence in enacting them, by the king's command, dissolved the parliament.

A Parl. called.] On the 28th of Nov. writs were issued for a parl. to meet at Westminster, on the 4th of Feb. 1512. At which time being all assembled in the Painted-Chamber, the king sitting on the throne, Wm. abp. of Canterbury, still lord chanc. opened the session by a speech from this text, 'Justitia & pax osculatæ sunt.' This he divided into 2 parts. "In the former of which he took notice, how necessary and wholesome it was for any powerful empire or govt. on any urgent occasion, such as the present was, to call parliaments, or public councils. This was the constant custom of the Roman govt. It was also the advice of Solomon, saying, 'Choose ye just men; be wise all ye that preside over the people.' He shewed that the divine wisdom, coming from kings and rulers, was far above all earthly knowledge. And from the love of justice and peace, those fruitful, mutual and amicable commodities, necessary in society, might sooner be gained. But then, lastly, he shewed, that when the streams of justice are perverted by men who seek to obtain their worldly promotions and power, variously and scandalously, 'per fas aut nefas;' by neglect of the poor, and being wholly swayed by carnal affections; by making juries forswearing themselves, by threats and other overbearing ways; then he said, it was full time to reform these abuses, lest worse should follow."—To the second part, he said, "Of holy peace, which Christ had left to his disciples by this text, and when wars should happen, God only suffered them on account of the sins committed by wicked princes or rulers. He told them, that in proclaiming war with an enemy, we should first examine the justness of the quarrel and the intention of the proclaimer. He added further, what was absolutely necessary in those that took the field and hoped for victory, first, that they should walk in the ways of the lord, and in him alone place their dependance; that every man should keep the post he was ordered to; that each individual should be content with his pay, and avoid all plunder." Lastly, he told them, "that this parl. was called, in order to correct and amend all the statutes and ordinances, which were found to be contrary to the common course of justice and the laws. At the conclusion, he directed the commons to choose their Speaker, and afterward present him to the king."

War with France.] The next day the commons presented sir Rob. Sheffield, knt. for their Speaker, who was approved of by the king and confirmed accordingly. On the 15th day of this session a direct declaration of War with France was made to them. At which time, the ld. chanc. by the king's command, opened to the bps. and lords the more secret causes for calling this parl. He acquainted them first, "that the king of Scots had many ways insulted and even destroyed several of the king's subjects, on the borders. Next, the war between the king of Castile and the duke of Guelderland, the king's ally, was to be considered. And, lastly, an account, translated into English, was read by the Master of the Rolls, concerning the dissensions, which were then on foot, between the pope and Lewis XII. of France; containing a recital of all the contumelies, mischiefs and injuries, which had been done to the holy see, by the said French king." And, afterwards, the said ld. chanc. with the lord treasurer, and other peers, went down to the lower house to acquaint the commons with these matters.—The proposal of a war with France was no sooner propounded to the houses, than accepted of. The Lords passed a bill, containing certain privileges granted to the marq. of Dorset, and other great men, that would go beyond sea with the king. And, the Commons voted a large supply, of two 10ths and two 15ths, with tonnage and poundage, to carry on the war.

Acts passed.] The most remarkable Acts passed, in the first session of this parl. were these:—"Every person that is or shall be in the king's wars, beyond the sea, or upon the sea, shall have a protection of 'Profecturus,' or 'Moraturus, cum clausula, volumus.' And he may alienate his lands, holden 'in capite,' without licence. And, if he die in that service, his heir within age and in ward, his executors, feoffees, or assigns, shall have the wardship and marriage, towards the performance of his will."—Penalties were ordained for captains that abridged the number of their soldiers, or detained their wages; also, for soldiers departing without licence.—Because money, plate, and jewels, &c. being carried out of the kingdom, impoverished it; it was enacted, that every offender that way should forfeit double value." An ordinance formerly made against escheators, commissioners, and finding and turning of officers, was also confirmed.—Because several unlawful games kept men from shooting in the long bow, they were put down, and archery commanded. For the better understanding of which act another passed, whereby the use of the cross-bow was also forbidden.—In this parl. the king reversed the attainder against the late sir Edm. Dudley, and restored his son John to all his lands and possessions.—March 30, the parl. by the king's command, was prorogued to the 4th of Nov. following, on which day it met accordingly.

A Subsidy and a Poll-Tax.] Lord Herbert writes, "That the king being now resolved to go abroad in person, in order to secure his own dominions from the Scots, he sent the earl of Surrey with an army into Yorkshire, to protect those northern parts of the kingdom. Whilst this was doing, he called a parl. to meet at Westminster; where, besides enacting several good laws, he had a grant of two more 10ths and 15ths, as a subsidy. Besides this, he had a Poll-Tax granted him; which was, of every duke 10 marks: of every earl 5l.; a lord 4l.; a knight 4 marks; of every man worth 800l. in goods the same; of each man who had 40s. in wages, 12d.; and of all who were at, or above, 15 years of age, 4d.

Acts passed.] The first act passed this session was, in order to secure the sea-coasts; by erecting of bulwarks, brays and walls, in Cornwall, and elsewhere; and fortifying the castles on these coasts. Nor was this precaution without reason, for the very next summer the French landed a number of men in Sussex, but they were soon beat back again to their ships. Lord Herbert says, that after passing the above-mentioned act, and others of less concern, this parl. was again prorogued to Jan. the 23rd, 1513.

After Henry's return to England, the parl. met as before mentioned. The title of the first act passed, in the Statute Books, is to ordain, "How the king's new subjects of Tournay and Terwin, in France, may have assurance and recovery of their debts due to them by Englishmen; and how Englishmen of them." It was also enacted, "That every man that would sue for the king's pardon, granted on certain articles, should have it."—In this session Margaret, daughter to George duke of Clarence, late wife to sir Rd. de la Pole, petitioned the king, that since Edw. earl of Warwick, her brother, had been attainted in a parl. held the 19th Hen. VII. and all his lands confiscated, it would please the king to restore her to blood and inheritance, and that she might be stiled countess of Salisbury; which was granted, and confirmed by parliament.

A Parl. called.] In the 6th year of his reign, Henry called another parl. And writs were accordingly issued out, dated Nov. 23, to meet at Westminster, on the 5th Feb. 1514. Being all assembled, as usual, before the king, in the Painted Chamber at Westminster, Wm. abp. of Canterbury, and chancellor, made an oration on these words; ‘Nunc reges intelligite, erudimini qui judicatis terram.’ On which words he observed, “That the ancients with great care, study and love, nourished the commonwealth; and that it was their greatest glory and comfort, when they saw it flourish under their auspices. But our republic sickens and decays; because the moderns prefer their own private affairs to the public. In order, therefore, to restore the commonwealth to its pristine sanity, the ablest physicians are, first, a wise king, which is the standard of the people, and a multitude of wise counsellors, which give health to the whole world. Afterwards, he told them that the ruling rod of a kingdom was what all kings ought chiefly to understand, since it went by a triple direction. The first was, that kings should carry themselves towards God, both in loving, fearing, and serving him. Next, that they should know how to govern themselves by knowledge, judgment, and reformation. Lastly, that every king ought to learn how to carry himself towards his subjects; viz. in administering impartial justice, in giving audience equally, and in taking the trouble himself to hear the complaints of his subjects. To this he added what qualities belonged also to good counsellors, viz. that they should give such counsel as was heavenly, honourable to the king, and useful both to the people and commonwealth. That they should be speakers of truth, and not flatterers; firm and not wavering in their councils, and neither covetous nor ambitious.” To the second part of his text he said, “that it behoved them to judge righteously, without dread or fear of any man; for by fear, the course of justice hath been oftentimes hindered and perverted. The principal cause of which fear is the want of love for justice; he exhorted them, therefore, that they all should endeavour to cherish that love, according to the saying of Solomon, “love ye justice.” Finally, he exhorted them, diligently to observe the abovesaid instructions, and that what wanted reformation in the state he hoped would be amended in this present parl.—The chancellor having recommended the commons to choose a Speaker, the next day they presented Tho. Nevile, esq. for that office; whose excuse being rejected, with the usual protestation, he was allowed.

Feb. 10, the lord chanc. attended by the

abp. of York, the bps. of Winchester and Durham, the earl of Surrey, lord treasurer, the earl of Worcester, with other peers, went down to the house of commons, where the chancellor declared the more particular causes of the calling this parl. He first acquainted them, “that the money granted to the king by the last parl. was not yet fully received; and that it had been thought necessary to collect the Poll-Tax, he supposed, not from the poor and needy, but from the rich, and those who were able to pay it.” “That the Scotch had lately, at several times, done great injuries to the king’s subjects, both by land and sea, and were daily meditating more. By which attempts, his maj. being sufficiently provoked, had determined to declare war against them. Therefore the chancellor exhorted the commons diligently to consider these things, and the king’s necessary expences on that occasion.”

Feb. 15, a contest arose in the house of lords, concerning the super-eminence of seats in parl. Tho. earl of Surrey claimed the first place amongst the earls, both in and out of parl. as being the eldest son and heir to the duke of Norfolk. On this occasion Garter king at arms was sent for before the lords, who shewed his book of the arms and families of the ancient nobility and other peers of this kingdom; but said, that as concerning the superiority of seats in parl. he could not determine. Whereupon the lord chanc. deferred the decision of this question to Saturday following. And on that day the lord chanc. declared and decreed, “that the earl of Surrey, with much humility and discretion, had agreed to content himself with his place in parl. according to his creation, and not dignity; provided always that his place of honour and dignity out of parl. should be reserved to him. And that if hereafter any ancient records should be found, in the Tower of London, or elsewhere, proving the said pre-eminent place in parl. to belong to the said earl, that then the said seat should be restored unto him, notwithstanding this present decree against it.”

Acts passed.] This parl. sat till the 5th of April, when they were prorogued to the 12th of Nov. following. The most remarkable statutes made in this session are drawn up by lord Herbert in this manner:—“I shall set down the laws enacted in this parl. where I find one of their chief cares was, to put into better order the former laws concerning Apparel; which yet was not so well digested, but that the year following even the law itself changed fashion. Howsoever, that of Archery, made before, was not only confirmed, but made perpetual; so that notwithstanding the use of calevers, or hand-guns, for muskets were not yet known, it was thought fit to continue the bow. Hand-guns and cross-bows were forbidden, under certain penalties, to all men that had less than 500” (the stat. says 300) “marks per an. The Wages for artificers were also settled, and the price of Watermen. A penalty also was imposed on those who changed tillage into pasture. And very good order taken concerning deceit in Cloth, as being the only cause they had not so good vent abroad. The commission of sewers, extending to the making up of the sea-walls, &c. in England, the marches of Calais, Guisnes, and Hames, began 6 Hen. VI. and continued 4 Hen. VII. for 25 years, being now upon expiration, was continued also for 10 years more. It was commanded that the river of Canterbury should be deepened. It was provided that wool should not be carried beyond sea; which was to the benefit of the clothiers. No second letters patents also might be taken, without mentioning the first; which was very equal both for the king and subject. And because divers now, being weary with sitting so long in parl. did depart home without licence, they only remaining who factiously combined themselves, with intention to gain the major part of voices in any thing they desired to obtain, it was ordered they should lose their wages if they went without the leave of the Speaker and common house, to be entered in the book of the clerk of parliament."

A Parl. called.] The next session of this parl. met, according to prorogation, on the 12th of Nov. 1516. On the 15th, two bills were brought into the lords by the king's solicitor; one concerning Conspiracies, and the other relating to what service was due to the king, in his wars, by those who held lands, in fee, or annuities, from the crown. But though it appears by the Journal, that the latter of these was read 3 times by the lords, passed, and sent down to the commons, yet it is probable they were both thrown out there; for we do not find that either of them, by the printed books, were passed into statutes.

Nov. 28th, the clerk of the parl. was commanded by the lord cardinal, and other lords, that he would annex to the act of Resumption, a certain provision, then brought and signed with the king's own hand, for George earl of Shrewsbury; and that he should enter the same on the Rolls of parl. There was no act of resumption passed into a law this parl. that we can find; and this is only mentioned, because it is the first time that the name of the famous Cardinal Wolsey has occurred in these inquiries.

No matters of any consequence happened till Dec. 20, when a bill was brought into the lords, signed with the king's own hand, concerning the lady Mary, as she is there called, dowager of France, the king's sister, relating to her jointure, and which had passed the commons. This bill was read by the lords 3 times in one day and assented to; but of what further concern it was, neither history nor the statute books inform us.—Another item, in the Journal of this day, is also somewhat remarkable, viz. "That it being Thursday in the afternoon, and the vigil of st. Thomas the apostle, it was ordered, that every lord who was at that time absent should pay 10l."—The next day, it is said that a bill was brought into the lords, concerning a Subsidy; that it was read the first time, and then ordered to be carried to the commons by the lord chanc. But what this subsidy was, or whether it passed the lower house or not, is uncertain.—Dec. 22, a bill for a general Pardon from the king, was passed, with 9 exceptions contained in it. And the same day the lord chanc. sent for the commons into the house of lords; and, after giving them thanks for their speedy and hearty dispatch of business for the public good, he exhorted both lords and commons to take care, that the laws and statutes, in this case provided, be well and regularly kept and observed, in the several parts of the kingdom where they dwelt. And then, by the king's command, dissolved this parliament.

Acts passed.] The most remarkable acts passed in this session were these; "An Act to prevent tillage from being turned into pasture. A repeal of licences granted to strangers, for bringing in of Gascoign, or Guienne wines, or Thoulouse woad; which added much to the increase of our own shipping. A time was stated, without which all motions, bills, suits, indictments, or informations popular, shall be sued, either for the king or party. The act concerning Labourer's Wages, made in the year preceding, was also repealed; because it concerned certain labourers in London.

A Parl. called.] It was full 7 years after the dissolution of the last, before another parl. was called. The book of printed Statutes, and Dugdale's Summons to Parliament, both inform us, that it was not till the 14th year of this king, that a parl. was again summoned, to meet at the Black Fryers in London, on the 15th of April, 1523. At the time appointed, J. Stowe writes, That the king being seated on the throne in the parl. chamber, at his feet, on the right side, sat the cardinal of York and the abp. of Canterbury; and at the rail behind stood dr. Tunstal, bp. of London, who made an eloquent oration to the parl. on the office of a king, to this effect. He first said, "That a king must be a man of judgment, according to the saying of David, 'Deus judicium regi da,' &c. And that he must also be a man of great learning, according to this text, 'Erudimini qui judicatis terram.' According to this saying of the prophet, he added, that God had sent them a prince of great judgment, learning, and experience; who, according to his princely duty, forgot not to study how to put forward every thing that might be profitable to his people and realm. Lest this saying of Seneca might be laid to his charge, 'es rex, et non habes tempus esse rex?' Which is as much as to say, Art thou a king, and dost nothing profitable to thy people? Art thou a king, and wilt not provide a remedy for the diseases of the commonwealth? For this cause the king hath called this parl. both for remedying the mischiefs that are in the common law, as recoveries, foreign vouchers, corrupt trials; as also for making and ordering new statutes, which may be to the great advantage of the commonwealth. Lastly, he willed the commons to repair to their own house, to elect a Speaker; and certify it to the lord chanc. who would acquaint them when his maj. would have him presented before him."

Sir T. More elected Speaker.] Accordingly the commons chose for their Speaker sir Tho. More, knt. who being presented for that purpose, pleaded his disabilities as usual; and in his speech brought in a story of Phormio, the philosopher, who desired Hannibal to come to his lectures, which when he consented to and came, Phormio began to read De Re militari, of chivalry; that as soon as Hannibal heard this, he called the philosopher an arrogant fool, to presume to teach him, who was already master of chivalry and all the arts of war. "So, says sir Tho. if I should presume to speak before his maj. of learning, and the well ordering of the govt. or such like matters, the king, who is so deeply learned, such a master of prudence and experience, might say to me as Hannibal to Phormio." Wherefore, he humbly besought his maj. to order the commons to chuse another Speaker. — To this speech the cardinal, as chancellor, replied, that his maj. by long experience of his service, was well acquainted with his wit, learning, and discretion; and that therefore he thought the commons had chose the fittest person of them all to be their Speaker." Who then made the usual protestation, and was admitted.

Wolsey goes to the Commons to hasten the Supply.] Though it is said, in the declaration, at the opening of this session, that the amending the old laws and making new ones, was the only occasion of the summons; yet history informs us, that the necessities of the state, for money, was the real motive for calling this parl. In making this demand, the cardinal thought proper that the spirituality should lead the van, in granting the Subsidy. Accordingly, the bps. and clergy, with some little opposition, taxed themselves to the one half of their revenues spiritual, to be paid in 5 years following. After this, Wolsey fearing some opposition to his demands in the commons, proposed to go there himself, and give his reasons why the Subsidy should be granted. We are told, that this new way of making a demand was much debated in the house: and if they did admit the cardinal, whether it should be with a few followers only, or with his whole train. The majority was for the former, but the Speaker, sir Tho. More, gave his opinion on the question in these words (a), "Maisters, for as much as my lord cardinal, lately, as yee woote well, layde to our charge the lightness of our tounge, for thinges uttered out of this house, it should not in my minde be amisse to receave him with all his pompe; with his maces, his pillars, his pole-axes, his cross, his hatte, and the great seale too; to the intent that if he finde the like faulte with us then, we may lay the blame upon those whome his grace bringeth with him." This was agreed to, and the cardinal in the manner aforesaid, went into the house, and there in a long and eloquent oration to them, "he charged Francis the French king with breach of faith, in falsifying the league sworn to for the general peace of Christendom. Besides, his neglect of the stipulated annuity for Tournay, and some other matters. Insomuch, that the king could do no other, in this public cause, than join with Charles the emperor in a war against him. That the charge thereof had been estimated, and amounted to 800,000*l.* Therefore he required, that the abovesaid sum should be raised out of the 5th part of every man's goods and lands, to be paid in 4 years."

The author of the Life of Sir T. More, tells us, that the house were silent to this demand, contrary to the minister's expectation, and when he demanded some reasonable answer, every member held his peace. At last, the Speaker falling on his knees, with much reverence, "Excused the silence of the house; abashed, as he said, at the sight of so noble a personage, who was able to amaze the wisest and most learned men in the realm. But with many probable arguments he endeavoured to shew the cardinal that his manner of coming thither was neither expedient nor agreeable to the ancient liberties of that house. And, in conclusion, told him, That except all the members present could put their several thoughts into his head, he alone was unable, in so weighty a matter, to give his grace a sufficient answer." Whereupon the cardinal, displeased with the Speaker, suddenly rose up in a rage and departed. The next day, says lord Herbert, sir T. More, enforced the cardinal's arguments, by endeavouring to demonstrate, "That it was not a great deal, on this occasion, to pay 4*s.* in the pound." To this he was answered, "That though some men were well monied, yet, in general, it was known, that the 5th of men's goods was not in plate or money, but in stock and cattle. And, that to pay away all their coin, would alter the whole frame and intercourse of things. For, if tenants come to pay their landlords in corn and cattle only, and the landlord again could not put them off from paying these things they had no need of, there would be a stop in all traffic and merchandize, and consequently the shipping of the nation must decay; and the nation itself, for want of money, grow, in some sort, barbarous and ignoble. They were desired to consider, that the king had already got of them, by way of loan, 2*s.* in the pound, which amounted to 400,000*l.* and now to have 4*s.* would come to, in the whole, 1,200,000*l.* which first and last is full 6*s.* in the pound, and is almost a 3rd of every man's goods; and cannot be had in coin in the whole kingdom. For proof of this, it was alledged, that supposing 15,000 parishes in England, and each parish should pay 100 marks, this would only amount to 1,500,000 marks, which is but 1,000,000*l.* And how many parishes are there in England, out of cities and towns, one with another, able to spare 100 marks? It was said, indeed, that there were no less than 40,000 parish churches in England, whereas it may be proved there are not 13,000 parishes; then reckon that the whole sum cannot amount to above 1,000,000*l.* and the king demanding 800,000*l.* and he, after this valuation, having received 400,000*l.* therefore it was judged impossible to levy the sum demanded; for if all the coin should come into the king's hands how should men live?"

To these arguments it was replied by the courtiers, "That the money demanded ought not to be accounted as lost, or taken away, but only to be transferred into other hands of their kindred or nation; herein therefore, that no more was done than what we see ordinarily in markets; where, though the money change masters, yet every one is accommodated. Howsoever, that no man ought to refuse unto him that fighteth for the honour and safety of his country, so much as will maintain him, since he denies it not even to his labourer. That those who are employed, must have been fed when they staid idle at home, and yet that they asked no more now, to give the uttermost proof of well-deserving patriots. Howbeit, you may reply, this will exhaust the coin from the poorer sort; but, to avoid this objection, let the richer go themselves. Let them shew, in defending their country, that they merit the better and greater parts thereof. Our king will not deny them this honour. Or, when they would desire to be exempt, and lay the burthen and hazard upon others, let them not grudge yet the giving so poor a stipend, as some of their servants at home would scarcely take to stand bare-headed to them. Neither are they to value themselves more than others, because they have larger possessions, unless they employ it for the public good. Nor is it well said of you, when you object that this will carry the money out of England, and leave it in France; for doth it not carry the men too, and so in effect prove but the same expence? Notwithstanding, if you be so obstinate as to believe that making war in a country brings money to it, do but conceive a while, that the French had invaded us; would the money they brought over, think you, enrich our country; should any of us be the better for it? Let us therefore lay aside those poor scruples, and do what may be worthy the dignity and honour of our nation. When you did conceive the worst that can fall out, you should yet eat your beef and mutton here, and wear your country cloth; while others, upon a short allowance, fought only that you might enjoy your families and liberty. But I say confidently you need not fear this penury or scarceness of money; the intercourse of things being so established throughout the world, that there is a perpetual derivation of all that can be necessary to mankind. Thus your commodities will ever find out money; while, not to go far, I shall produce our own merchants only, who will be always as glad of your corn and cattle, as you can be of any thing they bring you. Let us therefore, in God's name, do what becomes us; and for the rest, entertain so good an opinion of our soldiers, as to believe, that instead of leaving our country bare, they will add new provinces to it; or, at least, bring rich spoils and triumphs home."

A Subsidy granted.] At last, after much debate and contention, it was agreed by the commons, that every man of estate of 20*l.* yearly and upwards, should pay 2*s.* in the pound; and from 20*l.* a year downwards to 40*s.* 1*s.* in the pound; and under 40*s.* every head of 16 years old or more should pay 4*d.* in two years. The cardinal hearing no more was intended, seemed much troubled; and therefore, coming to the lower house of parl. he told them, that he desired to reason with those who opposed his demands; but being answered, that it was the order of that house to hear, and not to reason, but amongst themselves, the cardinal departed. Yet, by the liberal motion of some of the lower house, those of 50*l.* land and upwards, were induced to give 1*s.* more, being 3*s.* in the pound, for 3 years to come; which at length being continued to the 4th year, and extended to those who were worth 3*l.* in goods, was all that could be obtained."—Hall informs us, "That it was one sir John Husee, a Lincolnshire knight, who, to please the cardinal, first made the motion in the commons, for 12*d.* in the pound on land, upon all those who were worth 50*l.* a year and upwards, to be paid in 3 years. That, on the question's being put, 10 or 12 gent. said yea; and on the negative's being asked, not one nay was heard. For the commons would not condemn nor hinder the landed men from charging themselves; so that by 10 or 12 persons the gentlemen were burthened with 12*d.* more than others, for which the said sir John had much evil will."—This grant was passed on the 21st of May; at which time, because Whitsuntide was near, the parl. was adjourned to the 10th of June.

Hall proceeds and tells us, "That when the parl. began again, the landed men, who were charged 12*d.* in the pound on 50*l.* a year and upwards, moved the house, that all such as were worth 50*l.* a year, or upwards, in goods, should pay the same tax in 4 years. This motion occasioned a great debate in the house; and June 22nd the question was put, and it being doubtful whether the yeas or nays had it, the house divided, the citizens and burgesses by themselves, and the knights of shires on the other side; the former stiffly affirming that the motioners were enemies to the realm. At the last, the Speaker called them altogether, and after long persuasion, and tampering by private means, it was agreed that 12*d.* in the pound should be paid in 4 years, on 50*l.* in goods"—On the 31st of July, this parl. was adjourned to Westminster, and there continued until Aug.

Acts passed.] Lord Herbert has left us an abstract of the most remarkable statutes made in this session, which is as follows:—"That our merchants might have 8 days preference before strangers, for buying of broad white woollen cloth, brought to Blackwell-Hall in London, unless in fairs, ports, creeks, &c. That strangers using a handy-craft, should take no apprentices, nor above 2 journeymen, unless they were the king's subjects. That they should be under the search and reformation of the wardens and fellowship of handicrafts, and one substantial stranger, to be chosen by the said wardens. That they should cause a mark to be put on the wares and workmanship to be known thereby. That if they were falsely and deceitfully made, they should be forfeit. That this provision should extend to strangers living in other towns than London. That if strangers were wronged, they might seek their remedy from the lord chanc. and treasurer of England, or the justices of assize in the counties where they lived. That during this parl. their apprentices or journeymen might continue as before, and so to endure to the last day of the next parl. This act was not yet to extend to strangers of Oxford, Cambridge, and the sanctuary of St. Martin's-le-Grand in London. That if the officers refused to put a mark on the wares, or workmanship of joiners, blacksmiths, &c. being strangers, that then it was lawful for the strangers to sell them without the said mark. That lords and others, the king's subjects, of 100l. yearly, might take and retain strangers, being joiners and glaziers, for their private service, this act notwithstanding. That Englishmen living under foreign princes, and being sworn to them, should pay such custom to our king, subsidy and toll, as other strangers of those parts do. And that the governor of the merchant-adventurers, or the king's ambassadors in foreign countries, shall certify their names to the chancery, to the intent that order may be given therein to the king's officers in havens, ports, and creeks. Yet if any such Englishman did return to inhabit here, that then he should be restored to all the liberties of a subject." The statute of 6 Hen. VIII. 13, forbidding shooting in cross-bows, or hand-guns, was dispensed with in men of 100l. per annum. That coiners, who make money in any mint in England, should coin of every 100l. of gold, 20l. into half angels or pieces of 40d.; and of every 100l. worth of bullion, plate or silver, a portion into groats, two-pences, pence, half-pence, and farthings; the farthings to have a mark different from half-pence. That they who bring less than 100l. in bullion or plate to the mint, shall have the 10th thereof in half-pence and farthings. That they which be in the king's service in wars may aliene their lands, for performance of their wills, without any fine for alienation. And if any of them die in the king's service in war, his coffees or executors shall have the wardship of his heir and lands."

Though we find that a sufficient time was allowed for the payment of the last Subsidy, yet the war with France and Scotland so exhausted the king's treasury, that the very next year it was required, from all men worth 40l. that the whole subsidy, granted as before, payable in 4 years, should be anticipated, and brought to the king in one entire payment. This unprecedented proceeding gave the commons great disgust; and they did not fail, says lord Herbert, to impute it all to the cardinal minister. Speed informs us, that it was so insupportable to the poorer sort of subjects, that the payment of it was utterly denied to the collectors, with weepings, cursings, and great exclamations, which almost grew to an open rebellion. The county of Kent refused it to lord Cobham; Essex would not so much as talk with the commissioners about it; Huntingdonshire did the same; London would be taxed by none but their aldermen; and Suffolk rose up in arms, making poverty their captain. The blame of all fell upon the Cardinal; but he, being now by his church dignities rendered almost an English pope, looked down upon their threats with contempt, and despised their menaces. However, a little time after, they gave this haughty prelate some terrible reasons to alter his opinion. This minister had been so rebuffed by the commons, in his last demand of a Supply, that he was in no haste to advise the king to call another parl. For, as in his ministry there had been none called for 7 years before this last, so it was 6 or 7 years more before another was summoned.

Money demanded without consent of Parl.] During this time one of his greatest attempts to raise money without the help of parl. happened in 1526, when commissions were sent into every county in England, for levying the 6th part of every layman's goods, and the 4th of the clergy's. This the people resented so much, that it had like to have occasioned a rebellion. They alledged, 1st, that these commissions were against law; next, their own poverty; and that the king, since the 14th of his reign, had received of them twenty 15ths. But, as lord Herbert observes, "this seemed all to be done without the king's knowledge; so, when the consequence of it appeared, it was resolved to disavow the whole proceeding. And the king sent letters all over England, declaring he would ask nothing of them but by way of Benevolence. So that the Cardinal, by these means, got many a curse, and the king as many blessings."

In 1528 began the important affair of the divorce between Henry VIII. and his queen Katherine. We shall leave a thorough disquisition of this matter to lord Herbert, bp. Burnet, and our general historians of these times; and shall only collect what an English parl. had to do in this great and memorable event.

Wolsey's disgrace.] But before it took place, it proved the ruin of the Cardinal; for, being detected of some underhand dealing, between the pope and the king, and having managed so ill as to make both queen Katherine and Mrs. Anne Bullein, his enemies, he fell first into disgrace, and afterwards under the monarch's highest displeasure. The Cardinal was first indicted in the King's Bench, on the statute 16 Rich. II. concerning Premunires; found guilty; and sentence was passed upon him, "That he was out of the king's protection; his lands, goods, and chattels forfeit; and that his person might be seized on." He was afterwards tried by a great council, collected for that purpose in the Star-Chamber; where he met with no better treatment. And, lastly, the king remitted the whole affair to a parl. which began to sit at Westminster, Nov. 3, 1529.

On the first day of this parliament's meeting, sir Tho. More, now lord chanc. made an eloquent oration, says Hall, to this effect: "That, like as a good shepherd, who not only tendeth and keepeth well his sheep, but also foreseeth and provideth against every thing, which either may be hurtful or noisome to his flock; or may preserve and defend the same against all chances to come; so the king, who was the shepherd, ruler, and governor of this realm, vigilantly foreseeing things to come, considered how divers laws, by long continuance of time and mutation of things, were now grown insufficient and imperfect: and also, that by the frail condition of man, divers new enormities were sprung up amongst the people, for the which no law was made to reform the same, he said, was the very cause why, at this time, the king had summoned his high court of parl. He resembled the king to a shepherd or herdsman also for this cause; if a king is esteemed only for his riches, he is but a rich man; if for his honour, he is but an honourable man; but compare him to the multitude of his people, and the number of his flock, then is he a ruler, a governor of might and power; so that his people maketh him a prince, as of the multitude of sheep cometh the name of a shepherd. And, as you see, that amongst a great flock of sheep some be rotten and faulty, which the good shepherd sendeth from the sound sheep; so the great wether, which is of late fallen, as you all know, juggled with the king so craftily, scabbedly, and untruly, that all men must think, that he imagined himself that the king had no sense to perceive his crafty doings, or presumed that he would not see or understand his fraudulent juggling and attempts. But he was deceived; for his grace's sight was so quick and penetrable, that he not only saw him, but saw through him, both within and without; so that he was entirely open to him. According to his desert, he hath had a gentle correction; which small punishment the king would not should be an example to other offenders; but openly declareth, that whosoever hereafter shall make the like attempt, or commit the like offences, shall not escape with the like punishment. Lastly the chancellor said, that because they of the house of commons were a great number, and could not speak all at one time; therefore the king's pleasure was, that they should resort to their own house, and there, amongst themselves, according to ancient custom, choose an able person to be their common mouth, or Speaker; and after they have so done, to advertise his grace thereof, who will declare to them his pleasure, what day he will have him presented in this place."

A Speaker chosen.] On the 6th of Nov. the commons presented Tho. Audley, esq. to the king as their Speaker, who there made another eloquent oration, which, says Hall, consisted of two points: the first was, "that he much praised the king for his equity and justice, mixed with mercy and pity; so that no offence was forgotten or left unpunished; and, in the punishment, the extremity or rigour of the law was not cruelly extended; which should be a cause both to bridle all men from doing the like offences, and an encouragement to offenders to confess their faults, and occasion amendment and reconciliation." To the 2nd point, "he endeavoured to disable himself, for want of sense, learning, and discretion, for the taking so high an office; beseeching king to cause his commons to resort again to their house, and there to choose another speaker for that parl." To this the king replied, by the mouth of the chancellor, "that whereas he sought to disable himself in sense and learning, his own elaborate discourse there made testified to the contrary: and touching his discretion and other qualities, the king himself had well known him and his doings, since he was in his service, to be both wise and discreet; and so, as an able man, he accepted him, and admitted him Speaker."

Articles against Cardinal Wolsey.] The principal thing we meet with is, that certain articles were now preferred against the Cardinal. Lord Herbert has copied them from the original record, which he says, he has thought fit to transcribe, because our vulgar chronicles have misrepresented them: and, though many in number, they must find a place in these enquiries.

"Constrained by necessity of our fidelity and consciences, complain and shew to your royal majesty, we your grace's humble, true, faithful and obedient subjects, That the lord cardinal of York, lately your grace's chancellor, presuming to take upon him the authority of the pope's legate 'de latere,' hath, by divers and many sundry ways and fashions, committed notable, high, and grievous offences; misusing, altering, and subverting the order of your grace's laws, and otherwise contrary to your high honour, prerogative, crown, estate, and dignity royal; to the inestimable damage of your grace's subjects of every degree, and consequently to the great hindrance, diminution, and decay of the universal wealth of this your grace's realm, as it is touched summarily and particularly in certain articles here following; which be but a few in comparison of all his enormities, excesses, and transgressions, committed against your grace's laws. That is to say—I. Where your grace, and your noble progenitors within this your realm of England, being kings of England, have been so free, that they have had in all the world no other sovereign, but immediately subject to Almighty God in all things, touching the regality of your crown of England; and the same pre-eminence, prerogative, jurisdiction, lawful and peaceable possession, your grace, and your noble progenitors have had, used, and enjoyed without interruption, or business therefore, by the space of 200 years, and more; whereby your grace may prescribe against the pope's holiness, that he should not nor ought to send, or make, any legate to execute any authority legantine, contrary to your grace's prerogative within this your realm: now the lord cardinal of York, being your subject, and natural liege born, hath of his high, orgillous, and insatiable mind, for his own singular advancement and profit, in derogation, and to the great inbleishment and hurt of your said royal jurisdiction and prerogative, and the large continuance of the possession of the same, obtained authority legantine, by reason whereof he hath not only hurt your said prescription, but also, by the said authority legantine, hath spoiled and taken away from many houses of religion in this your realm much substance of their goods; and also hath usurped upon all your ordinaries, within this your realm, much part of their jurisdiction, in derogation of your prerogative, and to the great hurt of your said ordinaries, prelates, and religious.—II. Also, the said ld. cardinal, being your ambassador in France, made a treaty with the French king for the pope, your maj. not knowing any part thereof, nor named in the same; and binding the said French king to abide his order and award, if any controversy or doubt should arise upon the same betwixt the said pope and the French king.—III. Also, the said ld. cardinal being your ambassador in France, sent a commission to sir Gregory de Casalis, under your great seal in your grace's name, to conclude a treaty of amity with the duke of Ferrara, without any command or warrant of your highness, nor your said highness advertised, or made privy to the same.—IV. Also, the said ld. cardinal, of his presumptuous mind, in divers and many of his letters and instructions sent out of this realm to outward parts, had joined himself with your grace, as in saying, and writing in his said letters and instructions, 'the king and I.' And, 'I would ye should do thus.' 'The king and I give unto you our hearty thanks.' Whereby it is apparent, that he used himself more like a fellow to your highness than like a subject.—V. Also, whereas it hath ever been accustomed within this your realm, that when noblemen do swear their household servants, the first part of their oath hath been, that they should be true liege-men to the king, and his heirs kings of England; the same ld. cardinal caused his servants to be only sworn to him, as if there had been no sovereign above him.—VI. And also, whereas your grace is our sovereign lord and head, in whom standeth all the surety and wealth of this realm, the same lord cardinal, knowing himself to have the foul and contagious disease of the great pox broken out upon him in divers places of his body, came daily to your grace, rowning in your ear, and blowing upon your most noble grace, with his perilous and infective breath, to the marvellous danger of your highness, if God of his infinite goodness had not better provided for your highness. And when he was once healed of them, he made your grace to believe that his disease was an impostume in his head, and of none other thing.—VII. Also, the said ld. cardinal, by his authority legantine, hath given, by prevention, the benefices of divers persons, as well spiritual as temporal, contrary to your crown and dignity, and your laws and estatutes therefore provided, by reason whereof he is in danger to your grace of forfeiture of his lands and goods, and his body at your pleasure.—VIII. Also, the said ld. cardinal, taking upon him otherwise than a true counsellor ought to do, hath used to have all ambassadors to come first to him alone, and so hearing their charges and intents, it is to be thought he hath instructed them after his pleasure and purpose, before that they came to your presence; contrary to your high commandment by your grace's mouth to him given, and also to other persons, sent to him by your grace.—IX. Also, the said lord cardinal hath practised so, that all manner of letters sent from beyond the sea to your highness have come first to his hands, contrary to your high commandment by your own mouth, and also by others sent to him by your grace; by reason whereof your highness, nor any of your council, had knowledge of no matters, but such as it pleased him to shew them; whereby your highness, and your council have been compelled of very force to follow his devices, which oftentimes were set forth by him under such crafty and covert means, that your highness and your council hath oftentimes been abused. Insomuch, that when your council hath found, and put divers doubts and things which have afterwards ensued, he to abuse them used these words, 'I will lay my head that no such thing shall happen.'—X. Also, the said ld. cardinal hath practised that no manner of person, having charge to make espiall of things done beyond the sea, should at their return come first to your grace, nor to any other of your council, but only to himself, and in case they did the contrary, he punished them for so doing.—XI. Also, the said lord cardinal hath granted licence under your great seal for carrying out of grain and other victual, after the restraint hath been made thereof, for his own lucre, and singular advantage of him and his servants, for to send thither as he bare secret favour, without your grace's warrant or knowledge thereof.—XII. Also, the said lord cardinal used, many years together, not only to write unto all your ambassadors resident with other princes, in his own name, all advertisements concerning your grace's affairs being in their charge, and in the same his letters wrote many things of his own mind, without your grace's pleasure being known, concealing divers things which had been necessary for them to know, but also caused them to write their advertisements unto him; and of the same letters he used to conceal, for the compassing of his purposes, many things both from all your other counsellors, and from yourself also.—XIII. Also, where good hospitality hath been used to be kept in houses and places of religion of this realm, and many poor people thereby relieved, the said hospitality and relief is now decayed, and not used; and it is commonly reported that the occasion thereof is, because the said lord cardinal hath taken such impositions of the rulers of the said houses, as well for his favour in making of abbots and priors, as for his visitation, by his authority legantine. And yet, nevertheless, taketh yearly of such religious houses, such yearly and continual charges, as they be not able to keep hospitality, as they used to do, which is a great cause that there be so many vagabonds, beggars and thieves.—XIV. Also, where the said lord cardinal said, before the suppression of such houses as he hath suppressed, that the possessions of them should be set to farm among your lay-subjects, after such reasonable yearly rent, as they should well thereupon live, and keep good hospitality: and now the demesne possessions of the said houses, since the suppression of them, hath been surveyed, met and measured by the acre, and be now set above the value of the old rent: and also such as were farmers by covent-seat and copy-holders be put out, and amoved of their farms, or else compelled to pay new fines, contrary to all equity and conscience.—XV. Also, the said lord cardinal, sitting among the lords, and other of your most hon. council, used himself that if any man would shew his mind according to his duty, contrary to the opinion of the said cardinal, he would so take him up with his accustomed words, that they were better to hold their peace than to speak, so that he would hear no man speak but one or two great personages, so that he would have all the words himself, and consumed much time with a fair tale.—XVI. Also, the said lord cardinal, by his ambition and pride, hath hindered and undone many of your poor subjects for want of dispatchment of matters; for he would no man should meddle but himself. Insomuch, that it hath been affirmed by many wise men, that ten of the most wisest and most expert men in England were not sufficient, in convenient time, to order the matters that he would retain to himself; and many times he deferred the ending of matters, because that suitors should attend and wait upon him, whereof he had no small pleasure that his house might be replenished with suitors.—XVII. Also, the said lord cardinal, by his authority legantine, hath used, if any spiritual man having any riches or substance, deceased, he hath taken their goods as his own; by reason whereof their wills be not performed; and one mean he had, to put them in fear that were made executors to refuse to meddle.—XVIII. Also, the said lord cardinal constrained all ordinaries in England yearly to compound with him, or else he will usurp half or the whole of their jurisdiction by prevention, not for good order of the diocese but to extort treasure; for there is never a poor arch-deacon in England, but that he paid yearly to him a portion of his living.—XIX. Also, the said lord cardinal hath not only, by his untrue suggestion to the pope, shamefully slandered many good religious houses, and good virtuous men dwelling in them, but also suppressed by reason thereof above 30 houses of religion; and where, by authority of his bull, he should not suppress any house that had more men of religion in number, above the number of 6 or 7, he hath suppressed divers houses that had above the number; and thereupon hath caused divers offices to be found by verdict, untruly, that the religious persons, so suppressed, had voluntarily forsaken their said houses, which was untrue; and so hath caused open perjury to be committed, to the high displeasure of Almighty God.—XX. Also, the said lord cardinal hath examined divers and many matters in the chancery, after judgment thereof given at the common law, in subversion of your laws; and made some persons restore again to the other party condemned, what they had in execution by virtue of the judgment in the common law.—XXI. Also, the said lord cardinal hath granted many injunctions by writ, and the parties never called thereunto, nor bill put in against them. And, by reason thereof, divers of your subjects have been put from their lawful possession of their lands and tenements. And, by such means, he hath also brought the more party of the suitors of this your realm before himself, whereby he and divers of his servants have gotten much riches, and your subjects suffered great wrongs.—XXII. Also, the said lord cardinal, to augment his great riches, hath caused divers pardons granted by the pope to be suspended, which could not be revived till that the said lord cardinal were rewarded, and also have a yearly pension of the said pardon.—XXIII. Also, the said lord cardinal, not regarding your laws nor justice, of his extort power, hath put out divers and many farmers of his lands, and also patents of the archbishopric of York, and bishopric of Winchester, and of the abbey of st. Albans, which had good and sufficient grant thereof by your laws.—XXIV. Also, the same lord cardinal, at many times when any houses of religion have been void, he hath sent his officers thither, and with crafty persuasions hath induced them to compromit their election in him. And that, before ever he named, or confirmed any of them, he and his servants received so much great goods of them, that in manner it hath been to the undoing of the house.—XXV. Also, by his authority legantine, the same lord cardinal hath visited the most part of the religious houses and colleges in this your realm, hath taken of them the 25th part of their livelihood, to the great extortion of your subjects, and derogation of your laws and prerogative, and no law to bear him so to do.—XXVI. Also, when matters have been near at judgment by process at your common law, the same lord cardinal hath not only given and sent injunctions to the parties, but also sent for your judges, and expressly by threats commanding them to defer the judgment, to the evident subversion of your laws, if the judges would so have ceased.—XXVII. Also, whereas neither the bishopric of York nor Winchester, nor the abbey of st. Albans, nor the profit of his legation, nor the benefit of the chancery, nor his great pension out of France, nor his wards, and other inordinate taking could not suffice him, he hath made his son Winter to spend 2700l. by year, which he taketh to his own use, and giveth him not past 200l. yearly to live upon.—XXVIII. Also, where the said lord cardinal did first sue unto your grace to have your assent to be ‘Legatus de latere,’ he promised and solemnly protested before your maj. and before the lords both spiritual and temporal, that he would nothing do nor attempt by virtue of his legatcy, that should be contrary to your gracious prerogative, or regality, or to the damage or prejudice of the jurisdiction of any ordinary, and that by his legatcy no man should be hurt or offended; and upon that condition, and no other, he was admitted by your grace to be legate within this your realm, which condition he hath broken, as is well known to all your subjects. And when that he made this promise, he was busy in his suit at Rome, to visit all the clergy of England, both exempt and not exempt.—XXIX. Also, upon the suit of the said lord cardinal at Rome to have his authority legantine, he made untrue surmise to the pope’s holiness against the clergy of your realm, which was, that the regular persons of the said clergy had given themselves in ‘reprobum sensum,’ which words st. Paul writing to the Romans applied to abominable sin: which slander to your church of England shall for ever remain in the register at Rome against the clergy of this your realm.—XXX. Also, the said lord cardinal had the more part of the goods of dr. Smith, late bp. of Lincoln, bp. Savage of York, Mr. Dalby, arch-deacon of Richmond, Mr. Tonyers, Dr. Rothall, late bp. of Durham, and of Dr. Fox, late bp. of Winchester, contrary to their wills, and your laws and justice.—XXXI. Also at the oyer and terminer at York, proclamation was made, that every man should put in their bills for extortion of ordinaries, and when divers bills were put in against the officers of the said lord cardinal, of extortion, for taking 12d. of the pound for probation of testaments, whereof divers bills were found before justice Fitzherbert and other commissioners, the same lord cardinal removed the same indictments into the chancery by certiorari, and rebuked the same indictment for the same cause.—XXXII. Also, the said lord cardinal hath busied, and endeavoured himself by crafty and untrue tales, to make dissention and debate amongst your nobles of your realm, which is ready to be proved.—XXXIII. Also the said lord cardinal’s officers have divers times compelled your subjects to serve him with carts for carriage. And also his servants have taken both corn and cattle, fish, and all other victuals at your grace’s price, or under, as though it had been for your grace, which is contrary to the laws.—XXXIV. Also, the said lord cardinal hath misused himself in your most hon. court, in keeping of as great estate there in your absence, as your grace would have done, if you had been there present in your own person.—XXXV. Also his servants, by virtue of your commission under your broad seal by him to them given, have taken cattle, and all other victuals at as low price as your purveyors have done for your grace by your prerogative, against the laws of your realm.—XXXVI. Also, where it hath been accustomed that your purveyors for your hon. household have had yearly out of your town and liberty of st. Alban’s, 3 or 400 quarters of wheat. Truth it is, that since the lord cardinal had the room of abbot there, your said purveyors could not be suffered by him and his officers to take any wheat within the said town or liberties.—XXXVII. Also he hath divers times given injunction to your servants that have been for causes before him in the Star-Chamber, that they, nor other for them, should make labour, by any manner of way, directly or indirectly, to your grace, to obtain your gracious favour or pardon, which was a presumptuous intent for any subject.—XXXVIII. Also the said lord cardinal did call before him sir John Stanley, knt. which had taken a farm by covent-seal of the abbot and convent of Chester, and afterwards by his power and might, contrary to right, committed the said sir John Stanley to the prison of Fleet, by the space of an year, unto such time as he compelled the said sir John to release his covent-seal to one Leghe of Adlington, which married one Larke’s daughter, which woman the said lord cardinal kept, and had with her two children. Thereupon the said sir John Stanley, upon displeasure taken in his heart, made himself monk in Westminster, and there died.—XXXIX. Also on a time your grace being at st. Alban’s, according to the ancient custom used within your verge, your clerk of the market doing his office, did present unto your officers of your most hon. household, the prices of all manner of victuals, within the precinct of the verge; and it was commanded by your said officers to set up the said prices both on the gates of your hon. household, and also in the market-place within the town of st. Alban's, as of ancient custom it hath been used; and the lord cardinal bearing the same, presumptuously, and not like a subject, caused the foresaid prices, which were sealed with your grace's seal, accustomedly used for the same, to be taken off, and pulled down in the said market-place, where they were set up, and in the same place set up his own prices, sealed with his seal, and would if it had not been letted, in semblable manner, used your seal standing upon your grace's gates, and also would of his presumptuous mind have openly set in the stocks within your said town your clerk of your market. By which presumption and usurpation your grace may perceive, that in his heart he hath reputed himself to be equal with your royal maj.—XL. Also the said lord cardinal, of his further pompous and presumptuous mind, hath enterprised to join and imprint the cardinal's hat under your arms in your coin of groats, made at your city of York, which like deed hath not been seen to have been done by any subject within your realm before this time.—XLI. Also, where one sir Edw. Jones, clerk, parson of Crowley in the county of Buckingham, in the 18th of your most noble reign, let his said parsonage, with all tythes, and other profits of the same, to one Wm. Johnson, by indenture for certain years, within which years the dean of the said lord cardinal's college in Oxford pretended title to a certain portion of tythes within the said parsonage, supposing the said portion to belong to the parsonage of Chichelley, which was appropriated to the priory of Tykeford, lately suppressed; where, of truth, the parsons of Crowley have been peaceably possessed of the said portion time out of mind: whereupon a subpoena was directed to the said Johnson, to appear before the said lord cardinal at Hampton Court; where, without any bill, the said lord cardinal committed him to the Fleet, where he remained by the space of 12 weeks, because he would not depart with the said portion; and, at the last, upon a recognizance made, that he should appear before the said lord cardinal wheresoever he was commanded, he was delivered out of the Fleet. Howbeit, as yet the said portion is so kept from him, that he dare not deal with it.—XLII. Also, where one Martin Docowra had a lease of the manor of Balsall, in the county of Warwick, for a term of certain years, an injunction came to him out of the chancery, by writ, upon pain of 1000*l.* that he should avoid the possession of the same manor, and suffer sir George Throgmorton, knt. to take the profits of the same manor, to the time the matter depending in the chancery, between the lord of st. John's and the said Docowra, were discussed; and yet the said Docowra never made answer in the chancery, nor ever was called into the chancery for that matter. And now of late

he hath received the like injunction, upon pain of 2000*l.* contrary to the course of the common law.—XLIII. Also, whereas in the parl. chamber, and in open parl. communication and devices were had and moved, wherein mention was, by an incident, made of matters touching heresies, and erroneous sects, it was spoken, and reported by one bp. there being present, and confirmed by a good number of the same bps. in presence of all the lords spiritual and temporal, then assembled, that two of the said bps. were minded and desired to repair unto the university of Cambridge, for examination, reformation, and correction of such errors as then seemed, and were reported to reign amongst the students and scholars of the same, as well touching the Lutheran sect and opinions, as otherwise; the lord cardinal, informed of the good minds and intents of the said two bps. in that behalf, expressly inhibited and commanded them in no wise so to do. By means whereof the same errors (as they affirmed) crept more abroad, and took greater place; saying furthermore, that it was not in their defaults that the said heresies were not punished, but in the said lord cardinal; and that it was no reason any blame or lack should be arrected unto them for his offence. Whereby it evidently appeareth that the said lord cardinal, besides all other heinous offences, hath been the impeacher and disturber of due and direct correction of heresies; being highly to the danger and peril of the whole body, and good Christian people of this your realm.—XLIV. Finally, for as much as by the foresaid articles is evidently declared to your most royal maj. that the lord cardinal, by his outrageous pride, hath greatly shadowed a long season your grace's honour, which is most highly to be regarded; and by his insatiable avarice and ravenous appetite to have riches and treasure without measure, hath so grievously oppressed your poor subjects, with so manifold crafts of bribery and extortion, that the commonwealth of this your grace's realm is thereby greatly decayed and impoverished: and also by his cruelty, iniquity, affection, and partiality, hath subverted the due course and order of your grace's laws, to the undoing of a great number of your loving people. Please it your royal maj. therefore, of your excellent goodness towards the weale of this your realm, and subjects of the same, to set such order and direction upon the said lord cardinal, as may be to the terrible example of others to beware so to offend your grace, and your laws hereafter. And that he be so provided for, that he never have any power, jurisdiction, or authority hereafter, to trouble, vex, and impoverish the commonwealth of this your realm, as he hath done heretofore, to the great hurt and damage of every man almost, high and low. Which for your grace so doing, will daily pray, as their duty is, to Almighty God, for the prosperous estate of your most royal maj. long to indure in honour, and good health, to the pleasure of God, and your heart's most desire.

Subscribed the 1st of Dec. the 21st year of the reign of Henry VIII. T. More, T. Norfolk, Chas. Suffolke, Tho. Dorset, H. Exeter, G. Shrewsbury, R. Fitzwalter, Jo. Oxynford, H. Northumberland, T. D'Arcy, T. Rochford, W. Mountjoy, W. Sandys, W. Fitzwilliam, H. Guldeford, Anth. Fitzherbert, John Fitz-James." These last were the two lord chief justices at that time.

It appears by the names of the lords who signed these Articles, that they were drawn up by a committee, appointed for that purpose. And being read and agreed to by the whole house, they were first presented to the king, and then a copy of them was sent down to the lower house, for their perusal and approbation. But, amongst the Commons, the Cardinal's cause was so well defended by his secretary, Cromwell, then a member, that he absolutely cleared his master from any charge of treason, and he was fully acquitted thereof." From this honest beginning," says lord Herbert, "Tho. Cromwell, dated his future reputation." But though the Cardinal escaped this blow, he never was re-instated in the king's favour. And, as his enemies took every opportunity to destroy him, they at length prevailed upon the king to cause him to be arrested, at his castle of Cawood, and brought up to London for another trial. But a superior summons, to a much higher tribunal, took him at Leicester, where he died, Nov. 28, 1530, with these remarkable words in his mouth; "If I had served my God with half the zeal that I have served my king, he would not in my grey hairs have thus forsaken me!"

Luther's doctrine gains ground.] Before the cardinal died, the pope's supremacy in England began to lose ground; and Clement VII. having absolutely denied to confirm the Divorce, Henry in his turn resolved to enquire what authority the pope had in his dominions. And, as it seems to us, the same parl. that made the above stroke at cardinal Wolsey, carried it still farther against the papal authority. Luther's doctrine was now secretly admitted into many places of the kingdom, with much approbation; and gave such impressions, that even the most ignorant began to examine, whether the errors then ordinarily controverted did belong to the doctrine, or to the govt. of the church. And this alone, says lord Herbert, as it was the first step, so was it a great and bold sally towards that Reformation which afterwards followed.

Bills for reforming the Abuses of the Clergy.] Many abuses which the laity received daily from the clergy were loudly complained of; and the king, being now willing that they should be strictly enquired into, referred the redress thereof to the commons in this parl. Complaints also being made in that house against exactions for probats of testimonies and mortuaries; for pluralities, non-residence, and against priests that were farmers of lands, tanners, wool-buyers, &c. the spirituality were much offended at these proceedings; and, when the bills for regulating these exorbitances were brought before the house of lords, John Fisher, bp. of Rochester, made a remarkable speech against them, of which the following is a copy, as it is printed in a small treatise on the life and death of that prelate, by dr. Thos. Bailey.

"My lords, here are certain bills exhibited against the Clergy, wherein there are complaints made against the viciousness, idleness, rapacity, and cruelty of bps. abbots, priests, and their officials. But, my lords, are all vicious, all idle, all ravenous and cruel priests or bishops? And for such as are such, are there not laws provided already against such? Is there any abuse that we do not seek to rectify? Or can there be such a rectification as that there shall be no abuses? Or are not clergymen to rectify the abuses of the clergy? Or shall men find fault with other mens' manners while they forget their own; and punish where they have no authority to correct? If we be not executive in our laws, let each man suffer for his delinquency; or, if we have not power, aid us with your assistance, and we shall give you thanks. But, my lords, I hear there is a motion made, that the small monasteries should be given up into the king's hands, which makes me fear that it is not so much the good as the goods of the church that is looked after. Truly, my lords, how this may sound in your ears I cannot tell, but to me it appears no otherwise, than as if our holy mother the church were to become a bondmaid, and now brought into servility and thralldom; and by little and little to be quite banished out of those dwelling-places, which the piety and liberality of our forefathers, as most bountiful benefactors, have conferred upon her. Otherwise, to what tendeth these portentous and curious petitions from the commons? To no other intent or purpose, but to bring the clergy in contempt with the laity, that they may seize their patrimony. But, my lords, beware of yourselves and your country; beware of your holy mother the Catholic church; the people are subject to novelties, and Lutheranism spreads itself amongst us. Remember Germany and Bohemia, what miseries are befallen them already; and let our neighbours' houses that are now on fire teach us to beware of our own disasters. Wherefore, my lords, I will tell you plainly what I think; that, except ye resist manfully, by your authorities, this violent heap of mischiefs offered by the commons, you shall see all obedience first drawn from the clergy, and secondly from yourselves; and if you search into the true causes of all these mischiefs which reign amongst them, you shall find that they all arise through want of faith."

The same authority tells us, that this speech pleased or displeased several of the house of lords, as they were diversely inclined to forward or flatter the king's designs. But none made a reply to it, but only the duke of Norfolk, who said to the bishop, "my lord of Rochester, many of these words might have been well spared; but I wist it is often seen that the greatest clerks are not always the wisest men." To which the bp. replied, "my lord, I do not remember any fools in my time that ever proved great clerks."

When the commons heard of this speech, they conceived so great indignation against the bp. that they immediately sent their Speaker, Audley, attended with a number of the members, to complain of it to the king; and to let his maj. know, "how grievously they thought themselves injured thereby, for charging them with lack of faith, as if they had been infidels or heretics," &c. To satisfy the commons, the king sent for the bp. of Rochester, and demanded of him why he spoke in such a manner? The prelate answered, "that being in parl. he spake his mind freely in defence of the church, which he saw daily injured and oppressed by the common people, whose office it was, not to judge of her manners, much less to reform them. And therefore he said he thought himself in conscience bound to defend her in all that lay within his power." However, the king advised him, "to use his words more temperately another time."

But the injury the Commons thought they had received, by this reflection, was not so easily digested; for, one of the members making use of the gospel doctrine so far, says lord Herbert, as to take a reasonable liberty to judge of things; and being piqued at the bp. for laying it all on 'want of faith,' stood up in that house and spoke to this effect (a):—

"Mr. Speaker—If none else but the bp. of Rochester or his adherents did hold this language, it would less trouble me. But since so many religious and different sects, now conspicuous in the whole world, do not only vindicate unto themselves the name of the true church, but labour betwixt invitations and threats for nothing more than to make us resign our faith to a simple obedience; I shall crave leave to propose, what I think fit in this case for us laiques and secular persons to do. Not that I will make my opinion any rule to others when any better expedient shall be offered, but that I would be glad we considered hereof, as the greatest affair that doth or may concern us. For if in all human actions it be hard to find that medium or even temper which may keep us from declining into extremes, it will be much more difficult in religious worship; both as the path is supposed narrower, and the precipices more dangerous on every side. And because each man is created by God a free citizen of the world, and obliged to nothing so much as the inquiry of those means by which he may attain his everlasting happiness, it will be fit to examine to whose tuition and conduct he commit himself. For as several teachers, not only differing in language, habit, and ceremony, or at least in some of these, but peremptory and opposite in their doctrines, present themselves, much circumspection must be used. Here then taking his prospect, he shall find these guides directing him to several ways, whereof the 1st yet extends no further than to the laws and religions of each man's native soil or diocese, without passing those bounds. The 2nd, reaching much further, branches itself into that diversity of religions and philosophies, that not only are, but have been extant in former times, until he be able to determine which is best. But in either of these, no little difficulties will occur. For, if each man ought to be secure of all that is taught at home, without enquiring further, how can he answer his conscience? When looking abroad, the terrors of everlasting damnation shall be denounced on him, by the several hierarchies and visible churches of the world, if he believe any doctrine but theirs. And that, amongst these again, such able and understanding persons may be found, as in all other affairs will equal his teachers. Will it be fit that he believe God hath inspired his own church and religion only, and deserted the rest; when yet mankind is so much of one offspring, that it hath not only the same 'Pater communis' in God, but is come all from the same carnal ancestors? Shall each man, without more examination, believe his priests in what religion soever; and when he hath done, call their doctrine his faith? On the other side, if he must argue controversies before he can be satisfied, how much leisure must he obtain? How much wealth and substance must he consume? How many languages must he learn? And how many authors must he read? How many ages must he look into? How many faiths must he examine? How many expositions must he confer, and how many contradictions reconcile? How many countries must he wander into, and how many dangers must he run? Briefly, would not our life on these terms be a perpetual peregrination; while each man posted into the other's country to learn the way to heaven, without yet that he could say at last he had known or tried all? What remains then to be done? Must he take all that each priest, upon pretence of inspiration, would teach him, because it might be so; or, may he leave all because it might be otherwise? Certainly, to embrace all religions, according to their various and repugnant rites, tenets, traditions, and faiths, is impossible, when yet in one age it were not possible, after incredible pains and expences, to learn out and number them. On the other side, to reject all religions indifferently is as impious, there being no nation that in some kind or other doth not worship God; so that there will be a necessity to distinguish. Not yet that any man will be able, upon comparison, to discern which is the perfectest, among the many professed in the whole world; each of them being of that large extent, that no man's understanding will serve to comprehend it in its uttermost latitude and signification. But, at least, that every man might vindicate and sever in his particular religion, the more essential and demonstrative parts from the rest, without being moved so much at the threats and promises of any other religion that would make him obnoxious, as to depart from this way: there being no ordinary method so intelligible, ready, and compendious, for conducting each man to his desired end. Having thus therefore recollected himself, and together implored the assistance of that supreme God whom all nations acknowledge, he must labour in the next place to find out what inward means his Providence hath delivered, to discern the true not only from the false, but even from the likely and possible; each of them requiring a peculiar scrutiny and consideration. Neither shall he fly thus to particular reason, which may soon lead him to heresy; but after a due separation of the more doubtful and controverted parts, shall hold himself to common, authentic, and universal truths, and consequently inform himself, what in the several articles proposed to him is so taught, as it is first written in the heart, and together delivered in all the laws and religions he can hear of in the whole world: this certainly can never deceive him; since therein he shall find out how far the impressions of God's wisdom and goodness are extant in all mankind, and to what degrees his universal Providence hath dilated itself; while thus ascending to God by the same steps he descends to us, he cannot fail to encounter the divine majesty. Neither ought it to trouble him if he find these truths variously complicated with difficulties or errors; since, without insisting on more points than what are clearly agreed on every side, it will be his part to reduce them into method and order; which also is not hard, they being but few, and apt for connection: so that it will concern our several teachers to imitate us in this doctrine, before they come to any particular direction; lest otherwise they do like those who would persuade us to renounce day-light to study only by their candle. It will be worth the labour, assuredly, to enquire how far these universal notions will guide us, before we commit ourselves to any of their abstruse and scholastic mysteries, or supernatural and private revelations. Not yet but that they also may challenge a just place in our belief, when they are delivered upon warrantable testimony; but that they cannot be understood as so indifferent and infallible principles for the instruction of all mankind.—Thus, among many supposed inferior and questionable deities, worshipped in the 4 quarters of the world, we shall find one chief so taught us, as above others to be highly revered.—Among many rites, ceremonies, volumes, &c. delivered us as instruments or parts of his worship, he shall find virtue so eminent, as it alone concludes and sums up the rest. Insomuch as there is no sacrament which is not finally resolved into it; good life, charity, faith in and love of God, being such necessary and essential parts of religion, that all the rest are finally closed and determined in them.—Among the many expiations, lustrations, and propitiations for our sins, taught in the several quarters of the world in sundry times, we shall find that none doth avail without hearty sorrow for our sins, and a true repentance towards God, whom we have offended.—And lastly, amidst the divers places and manners of reward and punishment, which former ages have delivered, we shall find God's justice and mercy not so limited, but that he can extend either of them even beyond death, and consequently recompence or chastise eternally. These, therefore, as universal and undoubted truths, should, in my opinion, be first received; they will at least keep us from impiety and atheism, and together lay a foundation for God's service and the hope of a better life. Besides, it will reduce men's minds from uncertain and controverted points to a solid practice of virtue; or when we fall from it, to an unfeigned repentance and purpose through God's grace to amend our sinful life; without making pardon so easy, cheap, or mercenary, as some of them do. Lastly, it will dispose us to a general concord and peace; for when we are agreed concerning these eternal causes and means of our salvation, why should we so much differ for the rest? Since as these principles exclude nothing of faith or tradition, in what age or manner soever it intervened; each nation may be permitted the belief of any pious miracle that conduceth to God's glory; without that, on this occasion, we need to scandalize or offend each other. The common truths in religion, formerly mentioned, being firmer bonds of unity, than that any thing emergent out of traditions, whether written or unwritten, should dissolve them. Let us therefore establish and fix these catholic or universal notions; they will not hinder us to believe whatsoever else is faithfully taught upon the authority of the church. So that whether the eastern, western, northern, or southern teachers, &c. and particularly whether my lord of Rochester, Luther, Eccius, Zuinglius, Erasmus, Melancthon, &c. be in the right, we laicks may so build upon these catholic and infallible grounds of religion, as whatsoever superstructures of faith be raised, these foundations yet may support them."

Reformation on foot.] This speech was differently taken also by those who were still friends or enemies to the church of Rome. However, the majority being of the latter opinion, a Reformation in Religion was resolved upon, as far as was consistent with the established laws of the kingdom. These things, says Hall, against the power of the Clergy, before this time, durst not be attempted or even talked of, unless a man would run the hazard of being judged an heretic, and lose all that he had. For, as the bps. were always chancellors, and had the sole rule about the king, no man durst presume to attempt any thing contrary to their wills and advantage. But now an act was made to settle the Fees for Probats of Wills, and for Mortuaries. Moreover, spiritual persons were abridged from taking of farms, and from pluralities of livings, unless they were qualified by certain university degrees, or by the nobility, to whom a competent number of chaplains were assigned. Non-residence also then very usual, was forbidden, except in some cases; the rest explained and interpreted.

The King's Debts.] There was another bill passed in this parl. bearing in its preamble the highest flattery of the great things the king had done for the church and nation, in which he had been at vast expences: that divers of his subjects had lent great sums of money, which had been all well employed in the public service; and whereas the lenders had security for the payment, the parl. did offer all these sums, so lent to the king, and discharged him of all the obligations or assignments made for their payment, and of all suits that might arise thereupon.—To qualify this proceeding, the king thought fit to grant a free pardon to his subjects for all offences, some capital ones excepted. And, to keep the Clergy still under the rod, all transgressions against the statute of Præmunire, &c. were excepted, which fell upon them severely afterwards.

Letter from the Parl. to the Pope in favour of Q. Catherine's Divorce.] Bp. Burnet observes, that there had been great industry used in managing elections for this parl.; and they were so successful in returning such members as the king wanted, that he was resolved to continue them, till they had done his work; both in the affair of the Divorce, and the business of the Reformation. Some of the spirituality also ran on with the stream, not knowing then where it would carry them; a plain instance of this is their joining with the temporal lords and commons, in a Letter or Declaration to the Pope, under their hands and seals, concerning abuses in the church. It was the first thing they went upon, at their next meeting in parl. which happened according to prorogation, July 30, 1530. The Letter itself, as taken from the Records, is preserved by lord Herbert, with the pope's Answer to it in the original language. Bishop Kennet, in his edition of that book, has given us the following translation of them:—

"Most blessed father; although the cause concerning the Marriage of the most invincible prince our sovereign lord the king of England and France, does for sundry great and weighty reasons of itself, require and demand your holiness's assistance, that it may be brought to that speedy end and determination, which we with so great and earnest desires have wished; and with so very great, though very vain expectations, have long looked for from your holiness: we could not nevertheless prevail with ourselves to keep silence herein any longer, especially since our kingdom and the affairs thereof suffer so much, and are brought into so great danger through the unseasonable delay of sentence herein: so that since his maj. our head, and by consequence the life of us all, and we in his words, as subject-members, by a just union annexed to the head, have with great earnestness prayed your holiness, but prayed in vain, we are by the greatness of our grief, forced separately and distinctly by these our letters, most humbly to intreat your speedy determination hereof. The justice of the cause itself, approved of by the opinions of the most learned men every where, and determined by the decrees of the most famous universities in the world, and esteemed and judged most righteous by all persons either in England, France or Italy, who are most eminent for their learning, might so far prevail, as that your holiness, though no body intreated it, nay, though some opposed it, should with your own voice and authority, confirm that sentence which has so universally been pronounced just; especially when your determination of this cause is a piece of justice done to that king and kingdom, which upon so many several accounts have deserved well of the apostolical see. Although intreaties to you herein seem not to be necessary, however we make them, as persons overborn with troubles, who indulge their grief, and frequently pour forth repeated and unnecessary prayers: but since your holiness is not to be prevailed upon, either by the justice of the cause, the remembrance of the good services you have always found, or by the earnest and continued requests of the best of princes, to do that which might be expected from your paternal love and affection alone, our grief is by the remembrance of our miseries and calamities increased to that immense degree, that it overspreads the whole body of the realm, and gives a voice of complaint to each member of it, forcing them both by their words, and in their letters, to lay before your holiness this their insupportable grievance. For how great a misfortune is it, that what our own two universities, the university of Paris, as well as many others in France, what almost all men of learning, knowledge and integrity, both at home and abroad have determined and affirmed to be true, and the truth of which they are ready to defend and support both in their discourses and writings; yet cannot a confirmation of this so universally acknowledged truth, be obtained from the holy apostolical see by that prince, by whose support and assistance that see still keeps and preserves its authority, which has been shaken and undermined by so many, and so powerful adversaries; till he withstood and opposed their designs partly by his sword, partly by his pen, at other times by his commands and authority, supporting that power and authority of the church from whence others are enabled to obtain those mighty advantages from which he now finds himself only excluded. What answer can be made hereto we see not; and yet we see that from hence a flood of miseries is flowing in upon the commonwealth, and a sort of deluge of calamities overwhelming us, from the disputes about succession; which will soon overtake us, never to be settled without infinite slaughter and effusion of blood. We now have a king most eminent for his virtues, seated upon the throne of his ancestors, by right undoubted and unquestionable, who would entail lasting peace and uninterrupted tranquillity on his realms, if he leaves a son to succeed him from lawful and true marriage; nor will that be possible, unless your holiness will by your authority, pronounce the same sentence concerning his former marriage, which so many learned men have already delivered. But if your holiness, whom we justly call our father, shall, by refusing to comply herein, esteem us as cast-a-ways, and resolved to leave us orphans, we can make no other construction of it, but that the care of ourselves is committed to our own hands, and that we are left to seek our remedy elsewhere. But that we may never be driven to these extremities, we beg your holiness without delay, or farther loss of time, to assist these his maj.'s most just and reasonable desires; we most earnestly intreat a confirmation of the judgment of these most learned men, humbly imploring, that for the sake of that mutual love, and that paternal affection which your pastoral office requires you to shew us, not to shut up your bowels of pity and compassion against us, your most dutiful, most loving, most obedient sons. The case of his most sacred maj. is the case of us all; since the head cannot suffer, but the members must bear a part; the grief arising herefrom, and the injury suffered hereby, does equally affect us, who bear our proportion of all his maj.'s afflictions; the remedy of which, as it must proceed wholly from your holiness's power, so is it a duty necessarily arising from your paternal authority and affection: which remedy, if your holiness shall refuse or delay to grant, our condition will indeed herein be more miserable, that so long we have fruitlessly and in vain sought redress, but it will not be wholly desperate, since it is possible to find relief some other way. Desperate remedies indeed are not without extremity to be applied; but he that is sick will by any means get rid of his distemper: in the change of our miseries there is some comfort, when if we cannot obtain perfect relief, yet we may change our condition for that which is less afflicting, and more tolerable. That your holiness would be pleased to take these things into your most serious consideration, we do again and again beseech you for our lord Jesus Christ's sake, whose vicar on earth you stile yourself; and that you would now conform your actions to that title, by pronouncing your sentence to the glory and praise of God, and thereby giving your testimony and sanction to that truth, which has been examined, approved, and after much deliberation confirmed by the most learned men of all nations. In the mean time we will beseech God, whom we infallibly know to be truth, that he would vouchsafe so to inform and direct your holiness's deliberations herein; that having by your holiness's authority a confirmation of what is just, righteous and true, we may therein rest satisfied, and be free from the trouble of seeking to attain this end by other means." Signed by

To which Clement returned this Answer.

"To our venerable brethren the abps. and bps. and to our beloved sons the abbts, noblemen, dukes, marquesses, earls, barons, knights and doctors assembled together in parl. in England: Clement VII. pope:

"Venerable brothers and beloved sons, health be to you, and apostolical benediction. There are many expressions in your letter, bearing date July 13, which we received some days ago, which we could not have thought well of, did we not wholly impute them to the great duty and tender affection which you bear to our most dear son in Christ your king. We shall therefore, without taking those things amiss, sedately answer your letter, that you may thereby learn with how little reason you have complained of us, and that your private duty and affection to your king, ought not to extend so far, as to justify your accusing us of two grievous offences, ingratitude to his highness, and denial of justice. We do acknowledge that your king has deserved all that your letter mentions; nay, even much more, that the remembrance of his many meritorious actions towards the apostolical see, will not only live fresh in our memories, but be transmitted down to latest posterity. We cannot but own likewise, that not only with respect to our office and character in the church, but also in our own private person, we owe so much to his highness's affection, as we shall scarce ever be able to recompence. As to what relates to the controversy concerning the marriage between his highness and queen Catherine, we have been so far from disappointing the king's expectation therein by denying him justice, that we have even laid under the censure of the other party, and have been thought partial, and too much inclined to favour his majesty's desires herein. But to give you a more undeniable proof of our constant affection to your king, it will be necessary to mention what has some time since passed: when first, about 3 years since, his maj.'s ambassadors laid this cause before us, we committed it to the determination of our beloved sons Thos. abp. of York our legate in England, cardinal Sanctæ Cæcilie, and Laurence Campejus, cardinal Sanctæ Mariæ trans Tiberim our legate de latere, who were both in your kingdom, and upon the spot to examine into the matter; whereby, as far as we are able, we satisfied his highness' desires. But when the queen began to suspect them as partial judges, and on the account of some grievances she had imposed on her by the said legates, had appealed from them to the apostolical tribunal, and had on her part appointed proctors to prosecute the said appeal at Rome, even then our great inclination to his maj.'s service was sufficiently evidenced. For although we could not in this cause deny the queen a commission of appeal, yet seeking rather that this controversy might be finished by the agreeable methods of peace and concord, than by course of law, we framed several delays in granting our commission of appeal in the said cause, under pretence that this being a cause of the highest nature, must therefore be brought before the consistory. After this we held frequent consultation with our most venerable brethren their eminences the cardinals, whereby this affair was still farther put off; till at length by the unanimous vote of all the cardinals it was concluded, that a commission of appeal in this cause could not be refused. It was therefore appointed to be examined, heard, and in the said consistory by us to be finally determined. Since which no lawful protor has appeared on the king's part, to set forth his maj. pretensions either in writing, or by word of mouth, from whence it is that this cause could not receive its determination. Since it must be decided according to what is alledged, and by witnesses proved; not according to favour and affection. There is therefore no reason why this deferring our sentence of determination, of which you complain, should be ascribed to us; and your complaint herein seems to us the more strange, because his maj. ambassadors in several places, particularly at Bononia, did request and solicit this delay of sentence from us, contrary to the inclination and demand of the queen's proctors herein. Since therefore we have no ways hindered this cause from being determined, after mature examination, and due consideration of all the circumstances of it, we see not on what reasons these your complaints are grounded; unless you will venture to say, that the services which his maj. has shewn us and the apostolical see are such, that the cause should be determined in his favour, without regard had either to right or justice; for that must be the meaning of your words, when you say that sentence ought to be given by us, though nobody intreated it, nay, though some opposed it in this case, which has been adjudged just by all the learned in England, France and Italy, and by the decrees of so many universities: which words to us seem not to proceed from your usual prudence and modesty; since we see not with what reason you can desire, that we should in a cause of the greatest moment give sentence, though none intreated it, nay, though some opposed it; when on the other side is alledged the great scandal and offence that all christians would take, at a sentence of Divorce from a Marriage which has continued so many years, which was contracted by dispensation from the holy see, at the request of his most excellent majesty Henry VII. and the most catholic king Ferdinand; from whence the queen has had so many children born, and still has a daughter living; contrary to the opinion of several doctors (which you urge also on your behalf) and those very learned and grave men, and who confirm their judgment both by the laws of God, and by arguments taken not only from the Latins, but likewise derived from the Jewish law: notwithstanding all which we kept ourselves unbiassed, inclined to favour neither side, but to hear both, looking on this most extraordinary cause, not only to concern the whole christian world, but also to belong to all posterity. As for the opinions of learned men, and the decrees of universities, which you mention, few of them have come to our notice, shewn us not in proper form by your ambassadors, nor in the name of the king exhibited; and those were but bare opinions of those men, alledging no reasons for their determinations, nor supporting them by any authority from scripture, or the canons, which herein ought only to prevail. Wherefore, to demand that we should rashly, and without due consideration, determine any thing herein in his maj.'s favour, is a thing neither righteous in itself, nor agreeable to your wisdom. For although we owe much to his highness, yet in executing judgment we must necessarily much more regard him, by whom kings reign, and princes decree justice; and further, it is the duty of a good father, to take care that by over fondness he do not too much indulge his children: besides, we should not only entangle our own, but also his highness's conscience, by such an hasty and inconsiderate sentence, which, if thus unduly given, would by its dangerous example, greatly damage the whole christian world. As for that deluge of calamities, which you fear is impending over your kingdom, sure it were much more to be feared, if we should rashly hasten that sentence which ought calmly to proceed in the straight way of justice and reason; thereby violating both our own duty, and departing from the rules of justice through too great favour and affection to your king. You cannot with more earnest desire wish his maj. a son, than we do, and that not only his highness, but all christian princes had sons like so great a king, the inheritors not only of their realms, but of such princely virtues; but we are not in the stead of God, that we can give children. As to what you say, that we are unwilling to confirm, by our authority, a truth concerning the former marriage, which by so many learned men in the kingdom is agreed upon; we are truly willing to gratify his highness in all things, wherein we are able by our authority, but then our ability cannot extend to those things which will destroy that authority, as it would if we should judicially give sentence contrary to the due course of law in any thing. As for what you mention in the end of your letter, that unless we grant your request herein, you shall imagine that the care of yourselves is remitted into your own hands, and that you are left at liberty to seek remedy herein elsewhere; this is a resolution neither worthy of your prudence, nor becoming your christianity: and we do therefore of our fatherly love, exhort you to abstain from any such rash attempt: though it would be no fault of the physician, if the patient weary of his distemper, should rashly and unadvisedly venture upon measures destructive to his health: we indeed never denied you such remedies as might with safety be given, and with advantage received; for 'who is weak, and I am not weak; who is offended, and I burn not? I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you.' We cannot imagine that his maj. on whose account you write, can approve your writing in this manner; for we know, and are so fully acquainted with his honour and integrity, that we are assured he would not accept of any thing that is unjust, although it were offered him; and although your intercession is in all cases of great power and prevalence with us, yet is our love and affection to his highness such, as to need neither the intreaty nor solicitation of any persons whatever to influence or quicken it; and as we never remember that his highness has ever yet made his request to us, and received a denial, where it could be granted with safety to our own, and the honour of the apostolical see; so we shall always shew him the same regard and good will. Lastly, As to the present cause, we shall give no hindrance or delay to its decision, so that when it is ready for examination, and all the circumstances of it have been heard, it shall be brought to a speedy determination and final conclusion; being earnestly desirous to free your king and queen, and our ourselves from this most troublesome affair. But this we must desire of his highness, and of your goodness, that you would not require more from us, by reason of his maj.'s great deservings of us, than we can without offending God perform; and then you may assure yourselves of all the good offices which can be expected from us, considering the person and office we bear, and the justice we are indispensably bound to administer. Given at st. Peter's, Rome, under the seal of the fisherman, Sept. 27, 1530, in the 7th year of our Pontificate."

This answer had very little effect on the minds of those who were before resolved to abrogate the pope's supremacy in England, and strip the church of its overgrown possessions. We read of no other business done at this session than the writing and sending the letter to the pope; and it was not till Jan. 1531, that any statutes were made for the general good of the nation.

Debate on the King's Pardon.] On the 6th of which month, being again assembled, the first thing we find was, that a pardon for all spiritual persons, signed by the king's own hand, was sent to the lords, who, in a short time after, passed the bill, and sent it to the commons. When it was read in that house, many froward persons, says Hall, would in no wise consent to vote for the bill, unless that all men might be included in the pardon; arguing, that every man who had any thing to do with the cardinal were in the same case. To this it was answered, by the wiser sort, that they would not compel the king to give them his pardon; and besides, it was uncharitably done in them to seek to hurt the clergy, and do themselves no good. They rather advised the house to consent to the bill, and afterwards to make suit to the king for their pardon. But this was not agreed to; and it was resolved to send the Speaker to the king in the first place, before they would pass the bill. Accordingly, sir Tho. Audley, Speaker of the commons, with a number of members along with him, waited on his maj. and declared to him, "that his faithful commons sore lamented and bewailed their chance, in having occasion to think or imagine themselves out of his favour, because he had granted his most gracious pardon to his spiritual subjects on the præmunire, and not to them. Wherefore they most humbly besought his maj. out of his wonted goodness and clemency, to include them in the same pardon." The king, adds Hall, wisely answered, "that he was their prince and sovereign lord, and that they ought not to restrain him of his liberty, nor to compel him to shew his mercy; for it was at his own pleasure, either to use the extremity of his laws, or to mitigate and pardon the same. Wherefore, since they had denied to consent to the pardon of the spiritual persons, which, he said, he might give without their consent, under his great seal, he would be well advised before he pardoned them; because he would not have it look as if he was compelled to do it." Upon this resolute answer, the commons departed. Some of the members attributed this usage to Thos. Cromwell, who was just then taken into the king's favour, and said, that he had disclosed the secrets of the house. However, the king did not suffer them to continue long in their sorrow; for soon after, of his own motion, a pardon was drawn up, and signed, which his maj. sent to the commons by Christopher Hales, esq. his attorney general, which was soon assented to by that house. The commons returned their most humble thanks; "and much praised his maj.'s judgment, in that he had denied a pardon to them when they had unworthily demanded it, and had granted it when he perceived they were so sorrowful and penitent."

Proceedings on the Divorce.] Hall further tells us, that on the 30th of March, the lord chancellor, and a committee of 12 more spiritual and temporal lords, went to the commons, where the lord chancellor spoke to them to this effect: "You of this worshipful house; I am sure you be not so ignorant but you know well that the kyng our sovereign lorde hath married his brother's wyfe; for she was both wedded and bedded with his brother, prince Arthur, and therefore you may surely say that he hath married his brother's wyfe, if this marriage be good, as so many clerkes do doubt. Wherefore the kyng, like a virtuous prince, willing to be satisfied in his conscience, and also for the suretie of his realme, hath with great deliberation consulted with great clerkes, and hath sent my lord of London, here present, to the cheife universities of all Christendome, to know their opinion and judgment in that behalf. And although the universities of Cambrige and Oxforde had been sufficient to discusse the cause, yet, because they be in his realme, and to avoyde all suspicion of partiality, he hath sent into the realme of France, Italy, the pope's dominions, and Venetians, to know their judgment in that behalf; which have concluded, written, and sealed their determinations, accordyng as you shall heare red."—Then sir Bryan Tuke took out of a box 12 writings sealed, and read them before the house, as they were translated into the English tongue. Next follows, in Hall, the judgment of the foreign universities; which were those of Paris, Orleans, Anjou, Bruges, Bono-mia, and Padua, at length. These are somewhat foreign to our purpose; we shall therefore content ourselves with observing, that the question put to these learned societies was, "whether the pope's dispensation for a brother's marrying a brother's wife, after consummation with her former husband, was valid or not?" Which, as the question was stated, they all gave in the negative. These determinations being all read in the house, there were produced above 100 different books, wrote by foreign civilians and divines, against the lawfulness of the marriage. Then the chancellor again said, "now you of this common house may reporte in your countries what you have seene and heard; and then all men shall openly perceyve that the kyng hath not attempted this matter of wyll or pleasure, as some straungers reporte, but only for the discharge of his conscience, and suretie of the succession of his realme. This is the cause of our repayre hyther to you, and now we wyl departe."—For the titles of the acts passed in this session, see the List at the end of this reign.

The Commons' Remonstrance against the Clergy.] On the 15th of Jan. 1532, the same parl. sat again: and, to shew what effect the pope's answer to their letter had had upon them, the first thing they went upon in this 4th session, was to exhibit a complaint in the commons against the Clergy, in regard to their Ordinaries; for calling men before them, 'ex officio,' and charging them with heresy, without producing their accusers. Which was the more grievous to the public, because the party so cited must either abjure or be burned for an heretic. This and other complaints for exactions done by the Clergy in their ecclesiastical courts, were long debated in the commons; at last it was concluded and resolved, that all these grievances should be put in writing, and presented to the king. And on the 18th of March, the Speaker, accompanied with divers knights of shires and burgesses, went into the king's presence, and there declared to him how the laity was sore laid on by the cruel demeanor of the prelates and their ordinaries, who spared neither their bodies nor goods. Then he delivered to his maj. a schedule of their grievances in writing; and humbly beseeched him to take such order, in that case, as to his most high wisdom seemed most convenient. He further besought the king to consider what fatigue, charge, and cost his humble subjects of the lower house had sustained, since the beginning of this parl.; and that it would please his maj. out of his princely benignity, to dissolve it, that his subjects might retire home to their own countries.

When the king heard their Petition, he paused a while, and then said, "It is not the office of a king, who is a judge, to be too easy of belief; nor have I yet, nor will I use the same; for I will hear the party accused speak before I give sentence. Your schedule contains several articles of great and weighty matters; and, as I perceive, is against the prelates and spiritual persons of our realm. This thing you desire a redress of and reformation; which desire is clean contrary to the last part of your petition; for there you require to have the parl. dissolved and to depart into your own countries; and yet you would have a reformation of your grievances with all diligence. Notwithstanding your fatigue and charge hath been great in tarrying here, I assure you mine hath been no less than your's; and yet all the pains I take for your welfare is to me a pleasure. Therefore, if you expect any benefit in your complaints, you must stay the time or else depart without remedy. I much commend you that you will not contend or stand in strife with the Clergy, who are your christian brethren; but much more you ought not, I think, to contend with me, who am your sovereign lord and king, considering, that I seek peace and quietness of you. I have sent to you a bill concerning wards and premier seisin, in which things I am greatly wronged; in this I have offered you reason, as I think, and as the lords do too, for they have passed the bill and set their hands to it. Therefore I do assure you, if you will not take a reasonable thing when it is offered, I will search out the extremity of the law; and then will I not offer you so much again."

The reason the king mentioned the matter in the conclusion of his speech to them was this; it was then become a custom for men to make feoffments of their lands to their uses; and in their wills to settle their lands with such remainders, that not only the king but all other lords lost their wards, marriages, and reliefs. The king also lost his premier seisin and the profit of the livery, which was to him a great loss. "Wherefore," says Hall, "he like an indifferent prince, not willing to take all nor to lose all, caused a bill to be drawn by his learned council, in which it was devised, that every man might bequeath half his land, so that he let the other half go to the heir by descent. When this bill came before the commons, the ignorant members opposed it mightily, and spoke very disrespectfully of the king's council about it: but the wiser sort, who saw and understood the mischief to come, would gladly have had the bill to pass; or at the least, to have the king assured of a 4th part. Which offer, Hall says, he himself was credibly informed, the king would have taken; but some wilful people would neither agree to the bill, as the lords had done, nor to any reasonable qualification of the same. This they soon after much repented of; for the king called together the judges and the ablest lawyers, and they disputed the matter in chancery, and agreed that land could not be bequeathed by will, by the custom of the common law. Whereupon an act was made, that no man might bequeath his land or any part of it. Which act sore grieved such lords and gentlemen who had many children to provide for; and shewed the simple what mischief

About this time the parl. was prorogued to the 10th of April; and, being once more met, the lord chanc. with the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, the earls of Arundel, Oxford, Northumberland, Wiltshire and Sussex, were sent by the Lords to the Commons; when, being sat down, the lord chanc. declared to them, "That the king had been informed by his council, and especially by the duke of Norfolk, that on the marshes between England and Scotland were very few towns or habitations on the English side, but on the other many; so that the Scots inhabited up to the very borders: for which reason they invaded England several times, and did the king's subjects much hurt and displeasure. That, in order to remedy this, his maj. intended to build villages and houses on this side; and also to renew several piles and stops to hinder these invasions, to the great convenience of all the inhabitants thereabouts. But, as this thing could not be done without much expence, the lords, considering the king's good intent in it, had agreed to allow some reasonable aid towards it, and prayed the commons to consult about the same." Which said, they all withdrew. The commons took this affair into consideration, and unanimously voted the king a 15th, to support the expence; but it was not concluded this session: for, says Hall, a plague suddenly breaking out at Westminster, the parl. was prorogued to the next year.

In April 1533, the same parl. met again, when the affair of the Divorce began now again to be canvassed. The already repudiated queen wanted not those who defended her cause publicly, both in books and sermons; the chief of which were John Fisher, bp. of Rochester, and Tho. Abel, her chaplain. The pope had also made his last attack on Henry's conscience, by a mild expostulating letter, kindly exhorting him to put away Anne Boleyn, and take again Catherine, his lawful wife. But all this had no effect on Henry, who being told that one Temse, a member of the house of commons, had made a motion this session, 'that they should all petition the king to take his queen again;' he sent for sir Tho. Audley, their Speaker, and talked to him to this effect: "That he wondered any amongst them should meddle in businesses, which could not properly be determined in their house. But for this particular it concerned his soul so much, that he many times wished the marriage had been good; yet, since the doctors of the universities had generally declared it unlawful, he could do no less than abstain from her company. He therefore desired them to take this as the true reason, without imputing it to any wanton appetite; since, being in the 41st year of his age, it might justly be presumed such motions were not so strong in him as formerly. That they might the better understand this, he told them he had informed himself from all parts of Christendom concerning strange marriages; and that, except in Spain and Portugal, no man had done so much as marry two sisters, if the first was carnally known. But, for a brother to marry a brother's wife, was a thing so abhorred amongst all nations, that he never heard that any christian ever did so but himself. He wished them therefore to believe, that his conscience was much troubled about it."

Some time after, the king sent for the Speaker again, to give him the answer which the clergy had delivered in, relating to the complaints the commons had exhibited against them in the last session. The king himself seemed not at all pleased with it; and further told them, "he had found that the clergy of his realm were but his half subjects, or scarce so much; every bp. or abbot, at the entering into his dignity, taking an oath to the pope, derogatory to that of their fidelity to the king; which contradiction he desired his parl. to consider on, and take it away." Whereupon, says lord Herbert, these two oaths being read in the house, and considered, they so handled the business then, that it occasioned a final renunciation of the pope's supremacy in England, two years after.

This session lasted from the date aforesaid to May the 15th, at which time the parl. was prorogued again; but no particular time was mentioned. At the end of this session, sir T. More, lord chanc. resigned the seals, and was succeeded by sir Thos. Audley, Speaker of the house of commons, now knighted for that purpose. In the course of lord Herbert's history, we meet with no other session till the beginning of 1533, when, on Feb. the 4th, the same parl. sat again and made several statutes, for the titles of which we refer to the List of Acts.—This parl. did so coincide with the king's inclinations, that the statute to prevent appeals to Rome, was made with an intention to hinder queen Catherine from carrying her cause into that court. And the princess had now no other way left but to rest by the judgment of those, who were too much influenced by the king, or were her own mortal enemies. Accordingly, the queen being cited to appear before Cranmer, then abp. of Canterbury, and other delegates, at Dunstable; and she not obeying the summons, the abp. pronounced her contumacious, and proceeded to give sentence against her; which was an absolute separation, 'a mensa et thoro,' for ever. This affair was pushed the faster for a very good reason, as lord Herbert observes, because the pregnancy of Mrs. Ann Boleyn, whom Henry had privately married, became so apparent, that it was necessary to make an open declaration of it; and Ann was publicly crowned queen of England, with the usual ceremonies." The time of this last session of parl. was from Feb. 4th to April 7th, when it was then again prorogued to the year following. And now the Journals begin also again, so that the substance of what we shall give, relating to the farther proceedings of this parl. is chiefly taken from that authority.

The next session begun on the 15th of Jan. 1534. The business of the first day was taken up in reading appointments of proxies for the absent lords; and an adjournment took place till the 17th. On which day, complaint being made to the house, that several wicked facts had been committed, every way worthy of death, but by the laws then in being, as the judges declared, were not punishable as they ought to be; it was thought proper to ordain, that whatever person, guilty of such wickedness, should endeavour to skreen himself from justice, by betaking himself to some consecrated place or sanctuary, he should lose the benefit of the church's protection: and, that all persons found guilty of sodomitical practices should suffer death for them. Which crimes were remitted by the house to the consideration of the judges, and they were ordered to draw up two bills for that purpose.

An affront, of a very singular kind, was offered by the commons against the bp. of London this session. Complaint being made by them to the lords, that the bp. had a long time imprisoned one Thos. Philips, on suspicion of heresy, the lords dismissed the complaint, as a business too frivolous for that court. But the said bp. of London was again required, by the commons, to answer to the complaint in writing; whereupon he acquainted the Lords, that he might have their opinion; and they all agreed, "That it was not a thing fit for a peer to answer to in such a place."

The King's Marriage declared void.] Many were the acts passed in this session, as will appear by the List of them given at the end of this reign. "Among others," says lord Herbert, "it was enacted, upon the suit of the parl. to the king, for the establishing of the Succession to the Crown, the uncertainty whereof hath caused heretofore much division and bloodshed in this realm, That the king's marriage with the lady Katherine, wife, and carnally known to his brother prince Arthur, as was lawfully proved before Thomas abp. of Canterbury, as contrary to God's law, shall be held void, and she stiled no more queen, but dowager to prince Arthur; and the matrimony with queen Ann shall be taken for firm and good, and the issue thence procreate be accounted lawful; the inheritance of the crown to belong to the same in manner following, viz. first to the eldest son begotten by the king on queen Anne, and to the heirs of the said son lawfully begotten; and for default of such heir, then to the second son, &c. and if queen Ann decease without issue male, then the crown to descend to the son and heir of the king's body lawfully begotten, and the heirs of the said son lawfully begotten; and for a default of such issue, to the second son in like manner, &c. And for default of sons, that then the crown shall belong to the issue female of the king by queen Anne; and first to the first begotten the princess Elizabeth, and to the heirs of her body lawfully begotten; and for default of such issue, then to the second daughter in like sort, &c. and for default of all such issue, to the right heirs of the king's highness. It was ordained, that this act shall be proclaimed before May next throughout the kingdom. And all persons of age shall swear to accept and maintain the same. They who refuse the oath standing guilty of misprision of high treason; and they who speak or write against the marriage or succession here established, to be adjudged traitors. Besides all this, the present statute expressed certain degrees of prohibited marriage; amongst which, that between the brother and brother's wife was one, which being against God's laws could not be dispensed with by man, and therefore no such marriages shall hereafter be made; and those that are made already shall be by the ordinary dissolved, and those that are already so dissolved, shall be esteemed justly and lawfully dissolved, and the issue thence proceeding illegitimate."

Bp. Fisher's Vindication of himself in relation to the Holy Maid of Kent.] Besides the acts mentioned by lord Herbert, to have been passed this session, there was another for attainting bp. Fisher and sir Thos. More intended, for holding some correspondence with the Holy Maid of Kent. But there appearing no malignity in this commerce, the king, on their humble submission, prevented the bill from passing. Fisher's Letter to the house of lords, on this occasion, as given in Collier's History, is so singular as to merit a place in this work.

"My lords—after my most humble commendations unto all your good lordships, that sit in this most high court of parl.; I beseech in like manner to hear and to tender this my suit, which by necessity I am now driven to make unto all your lordships in writing; because I may not by reason of disease and weakness at this time be present myself before you, without peril of destruction of my body, as heretofore I have written to mr. Cromwell; which gave me no comfort to obtain of the king's grace, respite for my absence till I be recovered. If I might have been present myself, I doubt not but the great weakness of my body, with other manifold infirmities, would have moved you much rather to have pity of my cause and matter; whereby I am put under this grievous trouble.—So it is, my good lords, that I am informed of a certain bill that is put into this high court against me and others concerning the matter of the Nun of Canterbury, which thing is to me no little heaviness, and most specially in this piteous condition that I am in.—Nevertheless, I trust in your honours' wisdoms and consciences, that you will not in this high court, suffer any act or condemnation to pass against me, till my cause may be well and duly heard. And therefore in my most humble wise, I beseech all you my lords in the way of charity, and for the love of Christ; and for the mean season, it may please you to consider that I sought not for this woman's coming unto me; nor thought in her any manner of deceit. She was the person that by many probable and likely conjectures, I then reputed to be right honest, religious, and very good and virtuous. I verily supposed, that such feigning and craft, compassing of any guile or fraud, had been far from her: and what default was this in me so to think, when I had so many probable testimonies of her virtue; 1st, the bruit of the country, which generally called her the Holy Maid; 2nd, her entrance into religion upon certain visions which was commonly said that she had; 3rd, for the good religion and learning that was thought to be in her ghostly father, and in other virtuous and well learned priests that then testified of her holiness, as it was commonly reported; finally, my lord of Canterbury, that then was both her Ordinary and a man reputed of high wisdom and learning, told me that she had many great visions. And of him I learned greater things than ever I heard of the nun herself.—Your wisdoms, I doubt not, here see plainly that in me there was no default to believe this woman to be honest, religious, and of good credence.—For sith then I am bounden by the law of God, to believe the best of every person until the contrary be proved, much rather I ought so to believe of this woman that had then so many probable testimonies of her goodness and virtue.—But here it will be said, that she told me such words as was to the peril of the prince, and of the realm. Surely I am right sorry to make any rehearsal of her words, but only that necessity so compels me now to do.—The words that she told me concerning the peril of the king's highness were these: she said that she had her revelation from God, that if the king went forth with the purpose that he intended, he should not be king of England 7 months after; and she told me also, that she had been with the king and shewed unto his grace the same revelation.—Though this was forged by her or any other, what default is mine, that knew nothing of that forgery? If I had given her any counsel to the forging this revelation, or had any knowledge that it was feigned, I had been worthy of great blame and punishment. But whereas I never gave her any counsel to this matter, nor knew of any forging or feigning thereof, I trust in your great wisdoms that you will not think any default in me touching this point.—And as I will answer before the throne of Christ, I knew not of any malice or evil that was intended by her, or by any other earthly creature, unto the king's highness: neither her words did so sound that by any temporal or worldly power such thing was intended, but only by the power of God, of whom, as she then said, she had this revelation to shew unto the king.—But here it will be said, that I should have shewed the words unto the king's highness. Verily if I had not undoubtedly thought that she had shewed the same words unto his grace, my duty had been so to have done. But when she herself, which pretended to have this revelation from God, had shewed the same; I saw no necessity why that I should renew it again to his grace. For her esteemed honesty, qualified as I said before with so many probable testimonies, affirming unto me that she had told the same unto the king, made me right assuredly to think, that she had shewed the same words to his grace.—And not only her own saying thus persuaded me, but her prioress's words confirmed the same, and their servants also reported to my servants that she had been with the king. And yet besides all this, I knew it not long after by some others that so it was indeed. I thought therefore that it was not for me to rehearse the nun's words to the king again, when his grace knew them already, and she herself had told him before. And surely divers other causes dissuaded me so to do, which are not here openly to be rehearsed. Nevertheless when they shall be heard, I doubt not but they will altogether clearly excuse me as concerning this matter.—My suit therefore unto all you, my honourable lords, at this time is, that no act of condemnation concerning this matter be suffered to pass against me in this high court before that I be heard, or else some other for me, how that I can declare myself to be guiltless herein.—And this I most humbly beseech you all, on your charitable goodneces, and also, if that peradventure in the mean time there shall be thought any negligence in me for not revealing this matter unto the king's highness, you, for the punishment thereof which is now past, ordain no new law; but let me stand unto the laws which have been heretofore made, unto the which I must and will obey.—Beseeching always the king's most noble grace, that the same his laws may be ministred unto me with favour and equity, and not with the strictest rigour. I need not here to advise your most high wisdoms to look up to God, and upon your own souls in ordaining such laws for the punishment of negligences, or of other deeds which are already past, nor yet to look upon your own perils which may happen to you in like cases. For there sits not one lord here but the same, or other like, may chance unto himself that now is imputed unto me.—And therefore eftsoons I beseech all your benign charities to tender this my most humble suit as you would be tendered if you were in the same danger yourselves: and this to do for the reverence of Christ, for the discharge of your own souls, and for the honour of this most high court: and, finally, for your own sureties, and others that hereafter shall succeed you. For I verily trust in Almighty God, that by the succour of his grace, and your charitable supportations, I shall so declare myself, that every nobleman that sits here shall have good reason to be therewith satisfied. Thus our Lord have you all, this most honourable court, in his protection. Amen."

spiritual and temporal, in their parliament-robes, together with the members of the house of commons, should appear at the same place, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. At which time, the three estates of the realm being assembled, the king on the throne, the lords by name in the journal being seated according to their ranks and dignities, and the whole house of commons attending, sir Humphrey Wingfield, knt. then Speaker of that house, made an elegant speech to the king, on presenting the bills for the royal assent, which was kindly and graciously accepted, Sir Tho. Audley, knt. lord chanc. of England, by the king's command, returned an answer to it; and gave thanks to all the members of both houses, for their great care and conduct in making so many excellent laws for the public good. Which bills being all read and assented to, the chancellor prorogued the parl. to the 3rd day of Feb. next ensuing; on which day he said, it was the king's absolute command that they should all, without further notice, attend.—The chancellor likewise took notice of one particular act made this session, concerning the Settlement of the Crown on the king's issue by Ann, his present queen, as the principal and most useful of them all. In this it was enacted, amongst other matters, That all and singular person or persons should take an oath to do and fulfil every ordinance comprehended in the said act. On the due observation of which, he added, the good and happiness of this kingdom chiefly depended. To which end the king, by his letters patents, had constituted and appointed the said lord high chancellor of England, the abp. of Canterbury, Tho. duke of Norfolk, lord treasurer, and Charles duke of Suffolk, who first took the Oath annexed to the letters patent, in the king's presence, to swear all the rest of the lords spiritual and temporal, with the members of the house of commons, in the same manner, as appears by a transcript of the said act, to which all the jurors subscribed their names. After this, the king and all the rest retired.

Henry and his parl. agreed so well together in every thing, that it now plainly appears, by these frequent and annual prorogations, that he had no mind to part with them, till the great work of Reformation, which he had taken in hand, was accomplished. Much had been already done towards it, but much more remained behind to do. However, the next session of this parl. gave the king several convincing proofs of their great zeal for his service; and, as lord Herbert observes, the statutes then enacted were so important, as evidently to shew the great respect and awe borne by the nation to their king. The Journal Books of the sessions of parl. in the 26th and 27th of this king, being lost from the office, we must depend upon the printed statutes and histories for the further proceedings of this parl. to its dissolution.

Act of Supremacy.] According to the last prorogation, they met again on Feb. 3rd, 1535,

by the statute books; but Hall and lord Herbert say Nov. 3rd. At which time the following act was made: "that albeit the king was the Supreme Head of the Church in England, and so recognised by the clergy of this realm in their convocations, yet for more corroboration thereof, as also for extirpating all errors, heresies, and abuses of the same; it was enacted, that the king, his heirs and successors, kings of England, should be accepted and reputed the supreme head on earth of the church of England, called Ecclesia Anglicana. And have and enjoy, united and annexed to the imperial crown of this realm, as well the title and style thereof, as all honours, dignities, pre-eminences, jurisdictions, privileges, authorities, immunities, profits, and commodities to the said dignity of supreme head of the same church belonging or appertaining. And that our said sovereign lord, his heirs and successors, kings of this realm, shall have full power and authority, from time to time, to visit and repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain, and amend all such errors, heresies, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities, whatsoever they be, which, by any manner of spiritual authority or jurisdiction, ought or may lawfully be repressed, reformed, ordered, redressed, corrected, restrained, or amended most to the pleasure of Almighty God, the increase of virtue in Christ's religion, and for the conservation of the peace, unity, and tranquillity of this realm, any usage, custom, foreign laws, foreign authority, prescription, or any thing or things to the contrary hereof notwithstanding."—For the other statutes passed in this session we refer the reader to the list at the end of this reign.

If we may credit the preamble to the printed Statutes, this session of parl. continued sitting from the date above to the 18th of Dec. following. But this is scarcely probable; for we find that they met once more by prorogation on the 4th of Feb. in the beginning of the next year; which is hardly time enough for some of the more distant members to go home and return again.

A Subsidy.] Bp. Burnet, from the Parl. Rolls, mentions an act for a Subsidy of a 10th and a 15th, to be paid in 3 years, that was passed also this session; no grant of that kind having been made for 12 years before. The preamble to which act sets out the king's high wisdom and policy in most glaring colours. It tells us, "that he governed his kingdom, for 24 years, in great wealth and quietness; of the great charges he had been at in the last war with Scotland, in fortifying Calais, and in the war with Ireland. That he intended to bring that wilful, wild, unreasonable, and savage people to order and obedience. That he intended to build forts on the marches of Scotland, for the security of this nation; to amend the haven at Calais, and to make a new one at Dover. By all which, they did perceive the entire love and zeal which the king bore to his people; and that he sought not their wealth and quietness, only for his own time, being a mortal man, but did provide for it in all time to come. Therefore they thought, that of very equity, reason, and good conscience, they were bound to shew a like correspondence of zeal, gratitude, and kindness." In return for this, a general pardon was granted, with some exceptions; particularly mentioning bp. Fisher and Sir Tho. More.

The lesser Monasteries suppressed.] After a prorogation of 14 months, according to bp. Burnet, from the Records, the same parl. met once more on the 4th of Feb. 1536. A great many laws relating to civil concerns were now made, as will be seen by our list of them. But the principal act, and for which this session was chiefly called, was that for the Suppression of the lesser Monasteries. How this bill went through the two houses we cannot learn from the Journals, for they are lost. But all the historians of these times tell us, that the report of these monasteries made to the king was read in parl. which represented the manners of these houses so odiously, that the act was easily carried. The preamble to this statute runs thus: "That small religious houses, under the number of 12 persons, had been long and notoriously given to vicious and abominable practices, and did much consume and waste the churches lands, and other things belonging to them. That for about 200 years, there had been many visitations for reforming these abuses, but with no success; their vicious living daily increasing; so that unless small houses were dissolved, and the religious put into greater monasteries, there could be no Reformation expected in that matter. Whereupon the king having received a full information of these abuses, both by his visitors and other credible ways, and considering that there were divers great monasteries, in which religion was well kept and observed, which had not the full number that they might and ought to receive, had made a full declaration of the premises in parl. Whereupon it was enacted, that all such houses which might spend yearly 200l. or within it, should be suppressed, their revenues converted to better uses, and they compelled to reform their lives."

Bp. Burnet, to whom we are obliged for the above extract, goes on and tells us, "That the reasons pretended for dissolving these houses, were, that as there were but a small number of persons in them, they entered into confederacies together, and their poverty set them on to use many ill arts to grow rich. They were, also, often absent, and kept no manner of discipline in their houses, but their estates were generally much richer than they seemed to be; for the abbots, raising great fines out of them, held the leases still low, and by that means they were not obliged to entertain a greater number in their house; and so enriched themselves and their brethren by the fines. For many houses, then rented at 200l., were worth some thousands." These were part of the reasons urged, in parl. for passing this bill, and we are farther told that Stokesley, bp. of London, said, in the house of lords, "That these lesser houses were, as thorns, soon plucked up, but the great abbies were like putrified old oaks; yet, they must needs follow, as others would do in Christendom, before many years were passed."

By another act, all these Religious Houses, their churches, lands, and all their goods were given to the king, his heirs and successors; together with all other houses, which, within a year before the making of the act, had been dissolved and suppressed. For the collecting the revenues that belonged to them, a new court was erected, called the Court of the Augmentations of the King's Revenue, which was to consist of a chancellor, a treasurer, an attorney, and solicitor; with 10 auditors, 17 receivers, a clerk, an usher, and a messenger. This court was to bring in the revenues of such houses as were now dissolved, excepting only such as the king, by his letters patent, continued in their former state: appointing a seal for this court, with full power and authority to dispose of these lands, so as might be most for the king's service.—Thus fell the Lesser Abbies to the number of 376, the yearly income of which yielded to the king about 30 or 32,000*l.*; besides their goods and chattels, which at low rates, were valued at 100,000*l.*; and the number of monks and nuns, turned out of them, amounted to about 10,000*l.*—On the 4th of April, this parl. which had now subsisted above 6 years, and, as bp. Burnet observes, had done the king such eminent service, was finally dissolved.

Ann Boleyn executed.] Henry had now, almost, an unlimited sway, both in church and state, and seemed, in his domestic affairs, to be very peaceable and content. His new queen was fruitful, and likely to produce fair issue from the old stock. When, all of a sudden, she was accused of incest, adultery, and what not, with her own brother and others; who were all tried, condemned and executed, in the Tower, on May 19, 1536.

A new Parl. called.] This affair quite unhinged all the acts of settlement made in the last parl.; and Henry, soon after the dissolution of the last, found himself obliged to call another parl. to meet at Westminster, on the 8th of June, 1537. We shall not mention the names of all the peers summoned to this parl. but the manner and rank the barons sat in the house, is preserved by Dugdale, and deserves a place in our history.

The Journal Book now begins again, and is very particular in the transactions of this parl.; which being met, on the 8th of June, as afore-said, the king on the throne, and all the lords and commons attending, sir Tho. Audley, knt. then ld. chanc. of England, opened the cause of the summons in a speech to this effect: "First, he told them, that at the dissolution of the last parl. it did not enter into the king's mind that he should so soon have occasion to call another; but, that for two especial causes very necessary, both for easing the king's scruples and conducive to the good of the whole kingdom, he had issued fresh summons for calling this parl. The one was concerning the heirs and successors of the king's maj. who knowing himself obnoxious to infirmities and even death itself, a thing very rare for kings to think of; and besides, considering the state of the whole kingdom, depending, as it were, upon his single life; but willing, above all things, to leave it free from all dangers to posterity, he had called this parl. to appoint an heir apparent to the crown, who, when the present king had resigned to fate without children lawfully begotten, might by their own consent happily reign over them.—The 2nd cause for which this present parl. was summoned was, for repealing a certain act made in the last, by the tenor and force of which this whole realm is bound to be obedient to the lady Ann Boleyn, the king's late wife, and her heirs, between them, lawfully begotten. Also by the force of the said act, whoever should say or do any ill against her or her issue should be condemned for high treason.—But now, he said, that they may more rightly understand the reasons of this summons, his counsel was, according to these three proverbs of Solomon, (to whom our most excellent prince here may be most justly and worthily compared,) "operabimini quibus admonemur, præterita in memoria habere, præsentia intueri, et obventura provideri." And, as to the 1st, they very well remembered what great anxieties and perturbations of mind their most invincible sovereign suffered, on account of his first unlawful marriage; which was not only judged so in all the universities in Christendom, but declared unlawful by the general consent of this kingdom in a late act of parl. So also they ought to bear in mind the great perils and dangers their prince was under, when he contracted his 2nd marriage, in regard to the 2nd of Solomon's proverbs, by considering in what a situation this realm was in by reason of the oath then made and taken for the support of the said Ann and her issue. Which said lady Ann and her accomplices had been since justly found guilty of high treason, and had received their due reward for it. What man of middle condition would not this deter from marrying a third time? When he remembers that the first was a vast expence and great trouble of mind to him; and the second ran him into great and imminent dangers, which hung over him during the whole time of it. Yet this our most excellent prince, on the humble petition of the nobility, and not out of any carnal lust or affection, again condescends to contract matrimony; and hath at this time taken unto himself another wife, whose age and fine form denotes her most fit and likely to bring forth children. And therefore according to the 3rd proverb of Solomon, 'Obventura provideamus,' we are now met, by the king's command, with unanimous consent, to appoint an heir apparent to the crown. That, if this our prince, which God avert, should leave this mortal life without children lawfully begotten, the heir so appointed may lawfully rule and govern this kingdom after him. Lastly, let us humbly pray to God, that he would bless this our most excellent prince with some offspring; at the same time giving him thanks that he has hitherto preserved him from so many and such imminent dangers. Because it is his whole study and endeavour to rule us all, in perfect peace and charity during his life; and to transmit the same happiness to posterity."

After the chancellor had ended his harangue, he in the king's name ordered the commons to withdraw and chuse a Speaker; and present him to the king the day following. The receivers and triers of petitions being appointed, the next day, being Saturday, the chancellor acquainted the king and lords that the commons begged a longer time for electing a Speaker. Hereupon the king commanded that the house of lords should be adjourned to Monday. And on that day the commons presented to the king Rd. Rich, esq. for their Speaker; who immediately addressed himself to the throne, in words to this effect:

"First, in the name of the commons, he told his maj. that they well understood the chancellor's reasons, which he gave on the first day of the meeting for calling this present parl. and repeated the heads of the chancellor's discourse. He then took occasion to praise the king for his wonderful gifts of grace and nature; and compared him for justice and prudence to Solomon; for strength and fortitude to Sampson; and for beauty and comeliness to Absalom. He then said, that according to the chancellor's commands, the commons had retired to their own house, in order to chuse a Speaker; and had actually chosen him, the most unworthy of them all, for that honour. He therefore besought his maj. that he would command the commons to withdraw again to their own house, and elect another Speaker; for he had neither learning, experience, nor boldness, fit for that office; and therefore he was the least capable of any to undertake such an honourable employment."

To this the chancellor, by the king's command, replied, "that his maj. had well heard his speech; and was glad to understand by the first part of it, that the members of the house of commons had been so attentive to the chancellor's declaration, as they appeared to be. That as to the praises and virtues ascribed to himself, his maj. thought proper to disavow them; since, if he really had such virtues, they were the gifts of Almighty God only. Lastly, adds he, as to your excuses, Richard, which the king hath heard, that you have neither learning, experience, nor boldness, fit for such an office; to this his maj. hath commanded me to reply, that, if he did not know that you had all those qualifications, he would not, amongst so many urgent matters as are now depending, admit you into the office; and therefore he does not look upon your excuses as just." After which the said Rd. Rich, esq. made the usual protestation for liberty of speech, &c. which was allowed of.

New Act of Succession.] "The principal act," says lord Herbert, "made this parl. was touching the Succession of the crown; in which, after a rehearsal of the statute, 25 Hen. VIII. touching the king's marriage, and limitation of succession to the crown; and another of 26 Henry VIII. It is declared, that whereas a marriage was heretofore solemnized betwixt the king's highness and the lady Ann Boleyn; that since that time, certain just, true, and lawful impediments of marriage, unknown at the making of the said acts, were confessed by the said lady Ann before Tho. lord abp. of Canterbury; by which it plainly appeareth, that the said marriage betwixt his highness and the said lady Ann was never good nor consonant to the laws: and therefore his highness was lawfully divorced from the said lady Ann. Moreover, that she and her accomplices before-mentioned were convicted by due course of law, and have suffered according to their merits. And whereas it hath pleased his highness, notwithstanding the great perils suffered by occasion of his first unlawful marriage betwixt the lady Katharine, and this unlawful marriage betwixt the lady Ann, at the most humble petition of his nobles in this realm, and for conservation of the same, to enter into marriage again with the lady Jane (Seymour) according to the laws of the church; and that there is hope she may conceive by his highness; that it is the most humble petition of his nobles and commons, that, for extinguishment of all ambiguities and doubts, it may be enacted in manner and form as followeth. And 1st, that the marriage betwixt the king and queen Katharine should be void and of no effect; as being grounded on a dispensation, in a case not dispensable by human authority; and so determined by the whole clergy, and both universities of this realm; as also by the universities of Bononia, Padoua, Paris, Orleans, Tholouse, Anjou, and divers others; in regard, she being wife to his elder brother, prince Arthur, was carnally known by him, as was sufficiently proved before Tho. abp. of Canterbury; and therefore, that any dispensation to the contrary hereof should be to all intents void and of no effect; and the issue procreated under the same unlawful marriage, betwixt his highness and the said lady Katharine, to be illegitimate, and barred from claiming any inheritance from his highness by lineal descent: also, that the marriage betwixt his highness and queen Ann is of no value nor effect; and that the divorce made between his highness and her is good and effectual, and the issue illegitimate, and not inheritable to his highness by a lineal descent, any former act to the contrary notwithstanding.—And furthermore, since many inconveniences have fallen by marrying within degrees prohibited by God's law, (which marriages yet have been often dispensed with by some usurped power, when yet no man hath power to dispense with God's law.) Therefore it was enacted, that if any were married within the said degrees, or took to wife the sister or daughter, &c. of her whom he had before carnally known, he might and should be separated by the definitive sentence of the abps. and other ministers of the church of England: and their said sentence to be good and effectual, without suing any appeal to or from the court of Rome.—Further, it was enacted, that the issue betwixt his highness and queen Jane should be his lawful children and heirs, and inherit, according to the course of inheritance of the laws of this realm, the imperial crown of the same; with all dignities, honours, pre-eminences, prerogatives, authorities, and jurisdictions to the same annexed or belonging.—But if it should happen that queen Jane should decease without issue male of the body of his highness to be begotten, then the same imperial crown, and all other the premises, to be to his maj. and to his heirs male by any other lawful wife, and to the heirs of the body of the same son and heir male lawfully begotten; and so from son and heir male to son and heir male, and to the heirs of every such son and heir male lawfully begotten according to the course of inheritance, as is abovesaid. And for default of such issue male, then the said imperial crown and premises should be to the issue female, betwixt his maj. and queen Jane begotten, and so again to the issue female by any other wife in like manner; that is to say, to the eldest issue of the issue female, and to the heirs of her body lawfully begotten; and so from issue female to issue female, and to their heirs of their bodies, one after another, by course of inheritance, according to their ages, as the crown of England hath been accustomed and ought to succeed and go, in case when there is heir female inheritable to the same. And forasmuch as it stands in the only will and pleasure of Almighty God, whether his highness shall have heirs, and that if they fall, and no provision be made in his life who should govern this realm, than then this realm, after his transitory life should be destitute of a lawful governor, or incumbered with such a person that would covet to aspire to the same; that in that case, his highness might limit the crown to any person or persons in possession and remainder by his letters patents under the great seal; or else by his last will, signed with his hand, after such manner as should be expressed in his said letters patents; and that such person and persons should have and enjoy the same after his decease, in as large and ample manner as the lawful heirs of his body should have done. After which, order was taken to prevent usurpation of the crown; and the penalty of high treason imposed on usurpers, as on those also who believed either the marriage of his highness with the lady Katharine or the lady Ann to be good; and did call the lady Mary, or the lady Elizabeth, legitimate; and who used certain words and actions tending to this purpose.—Furthermore, it was enacted, that if his maj. should decease before any heir male of his body, inheritable to the crown of this realm, should be of the age of 18 years, or any heir female which should be inheritable as aforesaid, should be married, or be of the age of 16 years, that then they, or any of them, shall be and remain until they came unto the said several ages, at and in the governance of their natural mother, and such other his counsellors and nobles of his realm as his highness should name and appoint by his last will in writing, and signed with his hand, as is aforesaid; and that an oath should be administered for performance of this act, and the penalty of high treason inflicted on those that shall refuse it.—Furthermore, it was enacted, that the king should have power, by his letters patents, or last will as aforesaid, to advance any person or persons of his most royal blood to any title, stile, or name, of any estate, dignity, or honour, and to give to them, or any of them, any castles, honours, lands, &c. in fee-simple, fee-tail, or for term of lives, or the life of any of them, saving the rights and estates of all others, in and to the same.—Finally, it was enacted, that every clause, article, and sentence therein should be taken and accepted according to the plain words thereof. How yet this act was altered, 35 Hen. VIII. 1. shall be declared by me, God willing, in this history, referring the reader to 1 Mary I. when it was repealed."

Act for abolishing the Papal Power.] At this time a new proposal came from Rome, for a reconciliation between Henry and holy church. The interval seemed very favourable to it, for queen Catherine and Anne being both dead, who were the occasion of the rupture, the court of Rome judged this a proper opportunity to effect it. Accordingly, the pope sent a message to the king, to let him know, "That he had ever favoured his cause in his predecessor's time; and though he was forced to give out a sentence against him, yet he had never any intention to proceed upon it to further extremities." How this message was received, may be fully known by two acts which the king procured to be immediately passed upon it, in this parl.: by which all hopes of a reconciliation were entirely cut off between them. For a bill was brought into the lords, for utterly abolishing the usurped authority of the bp. of Rome, on the 4th of July, which soon after passed both houses. The preamble to which act contains these severe reflections:—"The bp. of Rome, whom some call the pope, who had long darkened God's word, that it might serve his pomp, glory, avarice, ambition, and tyranny, both upon the souls, bodies and goods of all Christians; excluding Christ out of the rule of men's souls, and princes out of their dominions; and had exacted in England great sums by dreams, vanities, and other superstitious ways. Upon these reasons his usurpation had been by law put down in this nation; yet many of his emissaries had been practising up and down the kingdom, and persuading people to acknowledge his pretended authority. Therefore, every person so offending after the last day of July, next to come, was to incur the pains of a præmunire; and all officers, both civil and ecclesiastical, were commanded to make enquiry about such offences, under severe penalties."

The other blow made at the pope, was by another act, passed, that, "Whereas the popes had, during their usurpation, granted many immunities, to several bodies and societies in England, which upon such grants had been now long in use: therefore, all those bulls, breves, and every thing depending on, or flowing from them were declared void and of no force. Yet all marriages celebrated by virtue of them, that were not otherwise contrary to the law of God, were declared good in law; and all consecrations of bps, by virtue of them, were confirmed. And, for the future, all who enjoyed any privileges by bulls, were to bring them into chancery, or to such persons as the king should appoint for that end. Moreover, the abp. of Canterbury was empowered to grant anew the effects contained in them, which grant was to pass under the great seal, and to be of full force in law."

Resident Clergy.] By the 13th act of this parl. an abuse was corrected which had crept in, to evade the force of a statute made in the 21st of this king, about priests residing on their livings. One qualification that did excuse them from residence was, their staying at the university for completing their studies. Now it was found, that many dissolute clergymen went and lived at the universities, not for study, but to be excused from serving their cures. Therefore, it was enacted that none above the age of 40, who were not either heads of houses, or public readers, should have any exemption of residence, by virtue of that clause in the former act. And, all those under that age should not have the benefit of it, except they were present at lectures, and performed their exercises in the schools.

This parl. having dispatched a great deal of business in a very little time, on July the 18th the king came to the house, in order to pass the bills that were ready for the royal assent. And the speaker of the house of commons made another oration to him, as full of flattery as the last. Only, as in the former, he compared the king to Solomon, Sampson and Absalom, for wisdom, strength and personage, he now likened him to the sun. "For, as the sun, said he, exhales all the noxious vapours which would otherways be hurtful to us, and by its heat cherishes and brings forth those seeds, plants, and fruits necessary for the support of human life; so this our most excellent prince takes away, by his prudence, all those enormities which may hereafter be any ways hurtful to us and our posterity. And takes care to enact such laws as will be a defence to the good, and a great terror to evil doers." The chancellor replied to his harangue much in the same words as to the former; and then, by the king's command, he dissolved the parl.: exhorting the members that they would all take care to observe the laws then made, and see them observed by others. Bp. Burnet remarks on the proceedings of this parl. that it plainly appears that the king was absolute master both of the affections and fears of his subjects. When, in a new parl. called on a sudden, and in a session of 6 weeks, acts of so great importance were passed, without any protest or public opposition.

Suppression of the larger abbies, &c.] But the great work of a thorough reformation was not yet compleated; that is, the larger monasteries were not dissolved, whose revenues the lay-courtiers were greedily gaping for. Henry had now got a fit instrument for that purpose, in the person of Thos. Cromwel, a blacksmith's son of Putney; but, who, by his great learning and abilities, was first made master of the jewel-house, then baron of Oakeham, afterwards earl of Essex, lord great chamberlain, and vicar-general over the spiritualities. This man being now prime minister, in his old master cardinal Wolsey's place, persuaded the king, who was ready enough to comply, to pull down the larger abbies and monasteries; the smaller under the value of 200l. a year, having been suppressed before. And, though some remonstrances were made to the contrary, that a few might be spared, as well for the virtue of the persons in them, as that the country received great benefit from them; the poor receiving thence relief, and the richer sort education for their children; yet, says lord Herbert, Cromwel, by the king's permission, invaded all; and, betwixt threats, gifts, persuasions, promises, and whatever else might make men waver, he obtained of the abbots, priors, abbesses, &c. that their houses might be given up.

A new Parl. called] But, an absolute right to these possessions was not warranted, yet, by law; and therefore Henry called a parl. to establish it. They were summoned by writ to meet at Westminster, on the 28th day of April, 1540. The first writ of summons is directed to Thomas lord Cromwell, our vicar-general in spiritualities. The following list of the whole house of peers at this time is deserving a place in this work, since it is the last we meet with, where the spiritual and temporal lords, abbots included, sat together in an English parl.

The ld. chancellor's speech, at the opening of this parl. is wholly omitted in the journals; and there are only the names of the receivers and triers of petitions to it. Nor is there any mention of the name of a Speaker to the house of commons; but, by what will appear in the sequel, from the same authority, we find that sir Nicholas Hare, knt. was chosen for that office.

A Committee for Religion appointed.] May 5th, the lord chanc. informed the house of lords, "that it was his maj.'s desire, above all things, that the diversities of opinions concerning the Christian religion in this kingdom, should be with all possible expedition plucked up and extirpated. And therefore, since this affair was of so extraordinary a nature, that it could not well be determined in a short time, considering their various sentiments, by the whole house; the king thought it necessary, if it seemed good to them, that they should chuse a Committee of themselves, to examine into these different opinions; and whatever they decreed concerning them might be with all convenient speed communicated to the whole parl." This was aproved of by all; and with unanimous consent a committee was chosen to examine these opinions, the names and titles of whom were as follows: Thomas lord Cromwell, vicar general; abp. of Canterbury; the bps. of Bath and Wells, Ely, Bangor, Worcester; abp. of York; bps. of Durham and Carlisle. And it was ordered, that this committee should have leave to absent themselves from the service of the house, whilst they had these affairs under consideration. The same day a bill was brought into the house by the lord chanc. for the appointment of seats or places in that assembly, for the king's chief officers; viz. the king's vicar-general in spiritualities, the lord chanc. lord treasurer, and others; that from henceforth there might be no more dispute about them. Also another bill was brought in, by which religious persons, whose monasteries were dissolved, might be enabled to inherit any lands and tenements which they were heirs to.

May 10th, the vicar-general aforesaid brought another bill into the house, which was to attain certain traitors, lately found guilty and condemned for high treason. These were the late marq. of Exeter, the late lord Montague, Edw. Nevile, and others. It was read twice that day, and then delivered to the clerk of parl. to be engrossed on parchment. On the 12th the aforesaid bill being read a third time, the Vicar-General stood up in the house, and shewed openly a certain habit, made of white silk, which was found by the lord admiral, in the linen wardrobe belonging to the countess of Salisbury; on the fore part of which garment was embroidered the arms alone of England, viz. three lions, surrounded with a border of two different flowers, called paunces and marigolds. On the back part of it was the device which the northern rebels lately used in their insurrection.

Total Suppression of Monasteries, Abbies, &c.] May 13th, the fatal bill for the fall of Monasteries, Abbies, &c. was brought into the house of peers, by the lord chanc. Audley. The title of the bill was, "concerning the establishment to the king's maj. his heirs and successors, of all manner of abbies, priories, monasteries, &c. which had come into the king's hands, by reason of the suppression, reduction, and final dissolution of them, on the 4th of Feb. an. reg. 27." This bill was ordered to be read a 1st time in the house; and then, because that the next day the clergy were to attend the convocation, and the day following was Ascension-day, the chancellor adjourned the parl. to Friday, at 8 o'clock in the morning, the usual time fixed for their meetings in those days. This is the title which the Journal Book gives; but the act itself is more explicit, and expresses, "that leases of manors, belonging to monasteries, dissolved or to be dissolved, and assured to the king, shall take effect. That the king shall hold, possess, and enjoy to him, his heirs and successors for ever, all monasteries, and abbacies, priories, nunneries, colleges, hospitals, houses of friars, or other religious and ecclesiastical houses and places, which since the 4th of February, 27 Henry VIII. have been dissolved, suppressed, renounced, forfeited, or given up, or by any other means come to his highness; or which shall be dissolved, &c. As also all manors, lordships, lands, tenements, rights, liberties, &c. belonging to them. All which, except such as came by attainder of treason, shall be under the survey and government of the king's court of Augmentation of the revenues of the crown. Other mens' titles yet saved." Thus fell the monastical priesthood in England. The number of monasteries dissolved, according to Speed, Stow, and Camden, amounted to 645; amongst which, 27 had votes, and sat in the house of lords, as mitred abbots. Of colleges, were demolished, in divers shires, 90. Of chantries and free chapels, some time after, 2374. And of hospitals, 110. The yearly income of all amounting to 163,000l. being above a third part of all the spiritual revenues in the kingdom. This, added to the almost immense sums the king must have made of all their present stock of cattle and corn, timber, lead, bells, &c. but chiefly of their plate, jewels, and church-ornaments, of which are still extant divers rich inventories, must be incredible. "This rapine upon the church, with the miserable ruin of themselves and houses, was divulged abroad in such terms," says lord Herbert, "as astonished the whole Christian world. For though the excessive number of them excused the king in some part for the first suppression, this latter had no such specious pretext. So that, notwithstanding the king's necessities, no little occasion of slander and obloquy was given by these violent proceedings."

A Report from the Committee of Religion.] May 16th the duke of Norfolk reported from the committee appointed to examine into the different opinions in Religion, which were then started up in that kingdom; that they had made no progress therein, because they were not in one mind themselves; which some of the lords had objected to when they were first named. Therefore he thought it was best, that the 6 following Articles should be put to the examination of the whole parl. and each man to give his opinion freely about them. By which means, an union in these matters might be come at, and finally determined. And that, for the better observance of the aforesaid determination some penal statute ought to be enacted against those that any ways infringe or violate them in any particular. The 6 Articles to be examined into are these: I. Whether the sacrament be the real body of our Lord, without transubstantiation? II. Whether the sacrament may be given to the laity in both kinds? III. Whether vows of chastity, made by men or women, ought to be observed, 'jure divino?' IV. Whether private masses ought to be kept by the same law? V. Whether priests ought to marry on the same authority? VI. Whether auricular confession be necessary, 'jure divino?'—These knotty points of divinity being laid before the whole house to be debated on, it took some time before they could come to a determination of them. For,

May 30, after a short prorogation, we are told in the Journals, that the lord chanc. declared before the lords, "that not only the bps. and other spiritual peers, but even the king's maj. had taken great pains and laboured incessantly to bring about an union in the foregoing articles, and had, at last, compleated it. It was therefore his maj.'s pleasure, that some penal statute should be enacted, to compel all his subjects, who were any ways dissenters or contradictors of these articles, to obey them. But the form of a statute for punishing such offenders he left to their determination." It was therefore agreed on by the whole house, that two committees should be appointed for that purpose. The abp. of Canterbury, the bps. of Ely and st. Asaph, with dr. Petre, were ordered to dictate and compose one form of an act for punishing such offenders; and the abp. of York, the bps. of Durham and Winchester, with dr. Tregonnel, to draw up another. Which two forms, so composed, were to be presented to the king on the Sunday following; which was only two days notice.

Six Articles established, &c.] June 7th "this bloody bill," as the protestant writers justly term it, was brought into the house by the lord chanc. and read the first time. The title is, 'A bill concerning the Punishment of those Persons, who either violate or infringe the Articles aforesaid.' The bill was read a 2nd and 3rd time, on the two days following; and then delivered to the king's attorney and solicitor-general, to be carried down to the commons, where an amendment was made to the bill by them. This was again read and approved of by the lords, so that the bill passed both houses on the 16th of June; and, amongst others, had the royal assent on the last day of this session.

The 6 articles, contained in this statute, and which were founded on the 6 foregoing questions, proposed by the lord treasurer, are these:—I. If any person by word, writing, printing, cyphering, or any otherwise do preach, teach, dispute, or hold opinion, that in the blessed sacrament of the altar, under form of bread and wine, (after the consecration thereof) there is not present really the natural body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, conceived by the Virgin Mary; or that after the said consecration there remaineth any substance of bread and wine, or any other substance but the substance of Christ, God and man; or that in the flesh under form of bread, is not the very blood of Christ; or that with the blood, under the form of wine, is not the very flesh of Christ as well apart, as though they were both together; or affirm the said sacrament to be of other substance than is aforesaid, or deprave the said blessed sacrament: then he shall be adjudged an heretic, and suffer death by burning, and shall forfeit to the king all his lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods and chattels, as in case of high treason.—II. And if any person preach in any sermon, or collation openly made, or teach in any common school or congregation, or obstinately affirm or defend, that the communion of the blessed sacrament in both kinds is necessary for the health of man's soul, or ought or should be ministred in both kinds: or that it is necessary to be received by any person, other than priests, being at mass, and consecrating the same.—III. Or that any man, after the order of priesthood received, may marry, or contract matrimony.—IV. Or that any man or woman which advisedly hath vowed or professed, or should vow or profess chastity or widowhood, may marry or contract marriage.—V. Or that private masses be not lawful, or not laudable, or should not be used, or be not agreeable to the laws of God.—VI. Or that auricular confession is not expedient and necessary to be used in the church of God, he shall be adjudged to suffer death, and forfeit land and goods as a felon.—If any priest, or other man or woman which advisedly hath vowed chastity or widowhood, do actually marry or contract matrimony with another; or any man which is, or hath been a priest, do carnally use any woman to whom he is or hath been married, or with whom he hath contracted matrimony; or openly be conversant or familiar with any such woman, both the man and the woman shall be adjudged felons. Commissions also shall be awarded to the bishop of the diocese, his chancellor, commissary, and others, to enquire of the heresies, felonies, and offences aforesaid. And also justices of peace in their sessions, and every steward, under-steward, and deputy-steward in their leet or law-day, by the oaths of 12 men, have authority to enquire of all the heresies, felonies, and offences aforesaid."

Strype says, "that great striving and struggling was in the house about passing this bill. Beside the abp. of Canterbury, other divines and lawyers argued well against it; it appearing, as they urged, to be not only against truth, but against common justice. And that had not the king come himself in person into the parl. house, it would not have passed." Lord Herbert informs us, "that Cranmer, abp. of Canterbury, boldly opposed these articles passing into a law, for 3 days together;" we suppose on the 3 times reading the bill in the house of lords. And Foxe says, "that when it came to be passed, the king desired Cranmer to be out of the house that day, since he could not give his consent to it; but that he humbly excused himself, for he thought he was obliged to stay and vote against it. What arguments he used are not known; but the king was not displeased with the prelate's plainness, as knowing all he said was out of a sincere intention. Though some thought he had a particular interest in his opposition to the 3rd Article, by reason of his wife, whom he had married about 7 years before in Germany; and for fear of this statute had sent or was about to send her back to her friends in that country. In the Journals of June 24th, we find a Memorandum of an order made that day, for enlarging the time allowed for priests putting away their wives, which, according to the statute, was to take place on the feast of st. John the Baptist, which was that very day, but it was now prolonged to the 12th of July following. And the dates in the bill were ordered to be altered accordingly.

Acts passed.] Amongst the rest of the statutes enacted in this parl. these are also remarkable.—I. That religious persons, who were put out of monasteries, &c. might purchase lands, sue or be sued, but not claim any inheritance as descending to them. And that if they made a vow of chastity after 21, they should not marry.—II. That the king, by the advice of his council, or the major part of them, might put forth proclamations, under such pains and penalties as to him or them may seem necessary; which shall be observed as if they had been made by act of parl. But that this should not be prejudicial to the inheritance of any persons, their offices, liberties, goods, chattels, or life.—III. That the king might nominate and appoint what number of bps. sees for bps. cathedral churches, as he pleased, and also endow them with possessions. On the strength of this act the king erected 6 new bishoprics, viz. at Westminster, Oxford, Peterborough, Bristol, Chester, and Gloucester, and endowed them with the revenues taken from dissolved monasteries.—IV. For settling the places of the peers in parl; a thing which had been much controverted in former reigns. By which Cromwell, the king's vicar-general, though a lock or blacksmith's son, had the precedence of all persons, except the royal family.—V. That it should be felony to take in the king's manors, any egg or bird of any falcon, goshawk or laner, out of the nest; or to find or take up any falcon, jerfalcon, jerkin, sacer, or sacerite, goshawke, laner, or lanerite of the king's, having on the king's arms and verviles, and do not bring them to the king's falconer within 12 days, &c."

June 28th, the king came to the house in order to pass the bills, and to put an end to this session. At which time sir Nich. Hare, Speaker of the commons, addressed his maj. in an elegant and learned speech; and, finally, humbly besought him, that he would give the royal assent to the bills that were ready for that purpose. Which, being all read and assented to, the lord chanc. sir Thos. Audley prorogued the parl. to Nov. 3rd following.

The parl. met again at the time appointed by the prorogation; by a commission under the broad seal, directed to Thos. lord Audley, of Walden, lord high chanc. of England, Thos. duke of Norfolk, lord treasurer; Charles duke of Suffolk, lord president of the council, and to his faithful counsellor Thomas lord Cromwell, lord keeper of the privy seal; also to John earl of Oxford, great chamberlain, and Wm. earl of Southampton, lord high admiral of England; they were empowered to prorogue the present parl. from the aforesaid 3d of Nov. in the 31st year of this king, to the 14th of Jan. 1541. On which day it was again prorogued to the 12th day of April next ensuing.

At which time, being once more assembled in the place called the Parliament Chamber, in the old palace at Westminster, the spiritual and temporal lords all present, except the abbots, Cromwell being the first in the list under these titles: Thomas Dominus Cromwell, eques sacri ordinis garteri, custos privati sigilli domini regis, ac sue majestatis vicegerens, [vicar general,] et officialis principalis ad causas ecclesiasticas.

The Lord Chancellor opened the session with a speech to this effect:—"By command of the king's maj. this parl. was first summoned, begun and prorogued; as well for the piety and reverence which he bears to the glory of Almighty God, as for the zeal and paternal affection he has to the lords his assistants in govt. and the whole body of the English nation, his most dear, faithful, and true subjects; that at length, by these parliamentary councils, that thing may be effected, which is most conducive to the glory of God, the security of the kingdom, and the greatest benefit to the commonwealth. Therefore, his maj. now, as before, admonishes, exhorts, demands, and, by his royal authority, commands the lords, both spiritual and temporal, that they would freely, openly, and ingenuously declare their minds, on those things which may seem to tend thereto; and, by their free suffrages, give a sanction to them. And, on the contrary, that they would take care to abrogate and take away all pernicious and adverse errors, that concord, harmony, and prosperity may flourish, and that a perfect union may be established. Conjuring them, that they would not be negligent in these matters, by the duty and reverence they owed to Almighty God, respect to their king, and piety to their country and the commonwealth."—After the chancellor had ended his harangue, with the praises and approbation, as the Journal expresses it, of all the peers,

Thomas lord Cromwell, knight of the garter, stood up, and spoke to this purpose:—"He first took notice of the concord which the chanc. had particularly advised amongst them; than which, nothing could be a greater bond for the safety of the king's maj. and the commonwealth. Since nothing could be more wished for, than that a perfect harmony and mutual consent should always subsist between the head and members of this national body. That his maj. loved concord as much as he hated the contrary vice; but he knew very well that there were not wanting many tares which grew up in his field amongst the corn; which, by the boldness and bitterness of some, the inveterate and corrupt superstitious tenacity of opinions in others, excited many contentions and quarrels amongst those, which would otherwise be pious Christians. Some call the others Papists, whilst those again term them Heretics; both wicked in their kinds, and not to be endured; and the less so, by reason of the holy word of God, which his most serene highness, out of his benignity, had suffered to be published in books for the safety and comfort of his people; that they might read, in their native language, how much that most holy gift of God had been miserably abused and perverted. Thus, while some follow heresies and others superstitions, I call it, adds he, a confusion of things, which proceeds from wicked minds. Our most illustrious monarch, who, as much as in him lies, neither favours one nor the other side, but professes himself a most sincere Christian, as a most Christian prince ought to be, neither wavers to the right nor left; but prescribing himself a direct line, guides and directs his steps and judgment by the pure word of God and an evangelistical sincerity.—That therefore all errors may be rooted out to make room for the true religion, his maj. makes it all his serious care and endeavour; and, in this principally, that all well-polished set forms of the holy gospel's true doctrine may be established. Secondly, that all pious ceremonies and customs may be separated from the wicked; their real uses taught and inculcated, and their abuses rectified. And that things may at length go well, all the inhabitants of this island, especially Englishmen, should be admonished against books which treat of impious and irreverent subjects, by a wicked perversion and audacious interpretation of sacred writ. Heavy pains and penalties should be laid upon those, who offend in these things, out of malice; that others may take example from thence, and not run headlong to their own destruction; and be punished by laws worthy of the lawgivers.—And, that Christ, the word of Christ and truth, may conquer all errors, in the true exposition and setting forth of the gospel, his majesty hath chosen certain bishops and doctors that will sincerely inform us what belongs to the institution of a Christian man. These, the orator, reckoned up by name; viz. the abps. of Canterbury and York, the bishops of London, Durham, Winchester, Rochester, Hereford, and St. David's; the dcs. Thurlby, Robinson, Cox, Wilson, Dey almoner to the queen, Oglethorp, Redman, Edgeworth, Crayford, Symonds, Robins, and dr. Fresham, who were all to treat of the true doctrine of Christ. Other bishops the king had chosen to expound the difference and reasonableness of ceremonies; viz. the bps. of Bath, Ely, Salisbury, Chichester, Worcester, and Llandaff, and to these, said he, the business of examining into rites and ceremonies was committed. Nor would there be wanting, to the assistance of both these committees, his maj.'s own suffrage, sincere and exact judgment to crown the whole. Lastly, that his maj.'s authority might not be despised or made a jest on, all the king's judges and commissaries, who had offended against the known laws of the land, were to be punished, at the discretion of these delegates, by the statutes in force."

The Journals inform us, that great praises and commendations were also bestowed on the king's vicar general, by the lords, for his eloquent speech, and the handsome manner he delivered his maj.'s mind to them. And that they might, as far as in them laid, promote this holy and pious study and design, it was unanimously agreed to set aside every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, from all other business, to attend to it. And every afternoon of the week should be for the same use; praying to God that he would prosper a work, so well begun, as this seemed to be.

A Subsidy granted.] May 8th, a bill for a subsidy of one 15th and a 10th, was brought into the house of lords. There were also the usual taxations, on denizens and aliens, added to it. The clergy also gave 4s. in the pound; which exorbitant demand, says lord Herbert, "was solely laid upon Cromwell, as the occasion, which gained him an universal hatred amongst the people, and was one reason of his sudden fall after it."

Order of St. John of Jerusalem suppressed.] The same day a bill was returned from the commons, with one provision by them annexed, for putting into the king's hands all the lands and possessions belonging to the knights of st. John of Jerusalem, which was read and passed. Lord Herbert says, that these reasons were assigned for bringing in this bill: "because the knights of Rhodes, or st. John, otherwise called the friars of the religion of st. John, drew yearly great sums of money out of the kingdom; that they maintained the usurped power of the church of Rome; that they defamed and slandered the king and his subjects; that the isle of Rhodes, whence the said religion took its name, was then surprised by the Turks; and, lastly, that the revenues might be better employed for the defence of the realm." Thus, adds our authority, fell that ancient and pious order; not without much scandal abroad, both to the king and government. The grand prior, who had a principal place in the house of lords, with some others of the order, who were conformable to this reduction, had pensions allowed them for life.

May 11th, after the reading of 6 private bills from the commons, and the lords still sitting, sir Nich. Hare, the Speaker of that house, with the members, came up; to whom the chancellor declared the king's mind to this effect: "that since the feast of Pentecost was now approaching, and it was not possible to put an end to this parl. before that time; and though the king understood that the greatest part of the business which concerned his maj. had been expedited, particularly the Subsidy, for which he returned them thanks; yet his maj. reflecting that this parl. was first called for the establishment of the public good of this kingdom, and a true concord in the Christian religion; and since that great work cannot be so soon perfected, which not only concerns this kingdom of England, but also other nations, and the whole Christian church, who have their eyes and minds set upon their proceedings: therefore his maj. judges it highly necessary that these matters should be more maturely treated and discussed by himself, the bps. and clergy; for which, and several other causes, the king thought fit, by his letters patent, to prorogue this parl. to the 25th of May following; exhorting all the members of both houses to give their attendance at the time aforesaid." Next follows a copy of the king's letters patents for this prorogation.

May 25, the parl. being again assembled, the first thing that was read in the house of peers was a bill to assign a jointure on the king's marriage with the lady Ann of Cleve, now called queen of England. This lady has been mentioned before; the king, during the last prorogation, having forced himself to marry her; but in a very short time we shall find, that this very parl. which now settled a jointure, was equally concerned in a divorce.

Cromwell attainted and executed.] June 10, Tho. lord Cromwell, earl of Essex, and the king's vicar-general, was attached of high treason in the council-chamber at Westminster; and by the lord chanc. and other lords there present, committed to the Tower. And on the 17th, a bill of attainder was brought into the house, and read against him; which passed both houses, on the 29th, 'nem. con.' Thus this man, who had, from a low beginning, mounted to the summit of glory, was on a sudden cast down; and is another terrible instance, along with cardinal Wolsey, how slippery the footing is of those who depend on the smiles of princes. He was condemned unheard, and executed on Tower-Hill, the 23th of July, four days after the dissolution of this parliament.

Validity of the King's Marriage.] July 6th, after the rest of the business was done in the house, the lord chanc. the abp. of Canterbury, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, the earl of Southampton, and the bp. of Durham, partly by the mouth of the chancellor, and partly by their own, spoke to the rest of the peers to this effect: "that they very well knew what bloody and cruel slaughter had formerly been acted in this kingdom, by reason of various contentions, occasioned by dubious titles to the succession of this crown. And since, by the grace of God, all these controversies were ceased, and all those titles were united, by the divine benevolence, in the single person of his most serene maj.; so that no occasion of discord could arise, unless this should happen, That their only hope, the noble prince Edward, undoubted heir to his father's kingdoms, should be taken from them by some sinister accident. In that case, which God avert, it is necessary for the general safety, that some other future heir, by the divine goodness, may be born to them in true and lawful wedlock. And since this is very doubtful by the late-contracted marriage of his maj. and the most noble lady Ann of Cleve, because of some impediments, which, upon enquiry, may arise, to make the validity of that marriage dubious. Also for the quietness and concord of the whole commonwealth in succeeding times, that nothing of this kind should spring up to disturb it, it was their serious advice to their lordships, to take it into the consideration of the whole house: and that a matter of such high concern to every degree of men in the kingdom might be properly considered, it was necessary that the house of commons should be also consulted about it. That afterwards, a committee of both houses should be appointed to wait upon his maj. humbly opening to him, as far as decency would admit of, their doubts and scruples in this matter, and humbly intreating that he would please to acquaint them whether the aforesaid marriage was valid or not; and that his maj. would permit the judgment and decision of this question to be laid before the abps. bps. deans, archdeacons, and the whole clergy of England, now assembled in convocation." The whole house of lords came to an unanimous resolution, on the chancellor's motion, to send some of their members to the commons, to acquaint them with the particulars of it; and to desire that, after due deliberation had thereon, they would send back 6 of their body to inform their lordships of the result of their consultation. The commons sent sir Tho. Cheney, knt. treasurer of the king's household, and sir Wm. Kingston, comptroller, with others, to the number of 20, as a committee of their house, to go along with the lords, without delay, to wait upon his maj. with the aforesaid humble supplication. All the temporal lords, and this committee, accordingly waited on the king, when the chancellor opened the cause of their coming, by first returning his maj. their hearty thanks for all his kindnesses and indulgences to them, particularly for the late act of grace; and then told him, that they had a matter of great moment to communicate, if his maj. would give them leave, and pardon their presumption. The king answered, "that he could never expect that any thing would come from them that was either evil, dishonest, or unreasonable, and therefore bad them speak their minds freely to him." And after the chancellor had delivered the aforesaid address, his maj. again replied, "that indeed their message was of such a nature, that he could neither deny nor grant their request; but that, however, he would refer the disquisition of this important question to the judgment and determination of the clergy, in the convocation of both provinces. In which order, he believed, there were as many grave, learned, honest, and pious men, as could any where be found, who would not say a thing which was not just and right; and to these he would commit the affair for their examinations;" and ordered his letters patents to be made out accordingly. This business was very soon concluded; for we are told by the Journals, that on the 10th of June, the two abps. and the rest of the bps. declared to the house of lords, that they had examined into the affair of the marriage, by virtue of the king's commission directed to them; and that, both by divine and human law, they had found it invalid. Which sentence they produced under the hands and seals of them all; and which, being publicly read and approved on, two of that rev. body were assigned to carry it down to the house of commons for their approbation. And in consequence thereof, a bill was brought in the very next day, concerning the invalidity of the marriage between his maj. and lady Ann of Cleve, which passed the lords the day after; and in a few days more was expedited through the commons. And Henry, who had always another wife ready on the death or divorce of a former, was publicly married to the lady Katharine Howard, niece to the duke of Norfolk.

July 24th, the king came to the house of lords, with the usual ceremony, in order to pass the bills, and to put an end to the parl; sir Nich. Hare, Speaker of the Commons, addressed himself to the king on his throne, to this purport: "The great world contains these several divisions, the divine world, the celestial and the terrestrial worlds. By the similitude of which, man is said to be a microcosm, that is, a little world, and hath also 3 parts, viz. a head, a breast and inferior members. And in likeness of these he asserted that the whole English Govt. was constituted; in which the king was the head, the peers the body, and the commons the rest of the machine. In all which, as there ought to be a strict concord betwixt the head and the other parts of a human body, so should there be the same uniformity between the king; the peers and the people. The king is by name acknowledged to be the head of all; and such a head as most happily directs and governs the whole English constitution; by graciously giving up much of his own right for the sake of the inferior members. Instances of which are the present act of grace and pardon; the statute for freely devising two thirds of each man's estate, &c. which all openly testified that both court and country must flourish and be happy under such a ruler; and for which they ought all there present to render him their most hearty thanks." At which words every man stood up and bowed themselves to the throne, and the king returned the compliment by a gracious nod from it. After this the Speaker went on, and said, "that the whole people of England, in order to shew some gratitude to his maj. to whom they thought themselves so much obliged, that they could never pay him according to his merit; had, lest they should seem unmindful of such benefits, joined in granting a Subsidy, by the consent of both houses, which they freely offered to him. And lastly begged his maj. would condescend to give the royal assent to the rest of the bills made ready for that purpose."—The ld. chanc. then dissolved the parl. For the titles of the acts passed in it, we refer the reader to our List at the end of this reign.

A Rebellion in Yorkshire.] Soon after the dissolution of this parl. a rebellion broke out in Yorkshire, under the conduct of sir John Nevile. The king however took care to have it suppressed betimes; and the leader of it was executed at York. This gave occasion for the execution, also, of the old countess of Salisbury, who had then been a prisoner two years, in the manner before recited. A jealousy that this insurrection was set on foot by her own, or her son cardinal Pool's instigation, occasioned it. Not long after which, Henry resolved to make a progress, in person, into Yorkshire; not so much, says lord Herbert, "to extinguish the relics of the last commotion, as those of superstition, miracles and pilgrimages. For though the king continued his rigour against those that disputed either his authority or the six Articles, and sacrificed many on that score; insomuch that, (as both the reformers, and those that were maintainers of the pope's supremacy, suffered equally) his enemies said, that, while he admitted neither side, he seemed to be of no religion at all. Yet this was but calumny, for he stood firmly to his great work of reformation; as the above-mentioned design, in the northern progress, is a particular instance." Henry met with some vexation in the midst of this expedition. His nephew James, king of Scots, had promised to meet him at York; but when every thing was ready for the royal interview, James sent him word he could not come. This slight was highly resented; but he met with a much greater trouble on his return to London. For, he was no sooner arrived, than he was credibly informed that his new queen Catherine, who had been with him all his progress, had been guilty of incontinency before he married her. The proof against this unhappy lady was somewhat stronger than against any of his former wives, as may be seen in lord Herbert; who seems to suppress a good deal, in regard to the noble family from whence she sprung. But, notwithstanding this, Henry was somewhat puzzled how to get rid of her; and was obliged to have recourse to his old method of referring his difficulties to a parliament.

A Parl. called.] Accordingly, a new one was called to meet at Westminster, on the 16th of Jan. 1542. Where being all assembled, Thos. lord Audley, still ld. chanc. opened the cause of the summons in a grave and eloquent speech, say the Journals, but of so uncommon and immoderate a length, that the clerks, being busy on different affairs, could not attend to take, even, the heads of the whole speech; which, they add, would take three hours to write down, and one to read. What they could collect, under the title of Compendium Orationis, is to this effect:—"First, the chanc. declared in what manner David began his reign over the people of God, the Israelites; he did not pray that honours and riches might be heaped upon him, but only that his understanding and wisdom might be enlarged. 'Give me understanding, that I may search thy law,' as it is in the psalms. This understanding he asked for, that he might the better learn the things equally necessary for both prince and people. Such was the case, also, in our sovereign lord the king; who, when his most sacred maj. first came to the crown, wished for nothing more ardently, or fervently, than that God would bestow on him wisdom and understanding. The Almighty anointed him with the oil of sapience above his fellows; above the rest of the kings in the earth, and above all his progenitors. This, he added, very plainly appears in three more shining qualities than others. In the perfect knowledge of the word of God, the chiefest glory in a king; in the exact understanding of the art military, which is the 2d virtue in a prince, and in politic knowledge, which holds the 3d place; as bringing the greatest good to the commonwealth. For the 1st, he commended to them all to think, along with himself, how his maj. had overthrown and vanquished that Roman Goliath, with a sling and a stone. The staff of the sling, said he, was the king; the stone was the word of God; and the sling was made of thread, twisted by preachers; which threads, or arguments, were no longer, more sure, or more substantial than they ought to be.—To the 2d, he desired the Lords and Commons to call to mind the king's great victories, both in France and Scotland. Which were made more glorious, in that they were gained, at one and the same time, in different kingdoms.—To the 3d, he, again, commended to them all to reflect, along with himself, on the peace which had now continued entire and inviolate for 30 years together. When, in that time, almost the whole universal world was distracted with fatal wars; and princes sought to destroy each other by fire and sword.—Next he laid before their eyes, what castles on the sea coasts had been new-built, what others repaired, which for future ages would terrify our enemies, and defend the kingdom from invasions. Lastly, he desired them to consider, that a very few years last past, many civil dissensions had been composed without bloodshed, by the king's conduct. And at length, that the Irish nation, a people barbarous and savage, had been reduced to obedience; insomuch, that a nation, hitherto untractable, now desired to submit to his laws.—These, and an innumerable number of benefits, conferred upon them by their most illustrious prince, he desired them to remember. From whence it plainly appeared that he, like David, from the beginning, had prayed to God for understanding to expound the laws. And also to pray so effectually, that no king commemorated in history, could be compared to him.—At which words, all the peers, as well as the commons, stood up and bowed to the throne, with that reverence, as plainly shewed, says the Journal, with what willing minds they owned his empire over them; and what they owed to God, who had committed the govt. of the kingdom to the care of such a prince. Then the chancellor turned his discourse to inform the assembly, why they were called to meet at the present time. He told them, "That his maj. had summoned his great council, consisting of 3 distinct bodies, the clergy, lords, and commons, as the representatives of the people. That these 3 orders or states should meet as the whole body of the English commonwealth. That from thence they might learn each man's particular inclinations and qualities; and if by chance any defect or excess be found in the govt. by their common advice and his maj.'s authority, it might be amended, and the law made more vigorous by taking away superfluities. But, adds the orator, there yet remains 3 principal causes for calling this assembly. The 1st concerned the honour, praise, and glory of God, by an unity in faith and concord in religion; sifting of different opinions, if by chance any new one had sprung up, or there was yet any old one left to abrogate. And here he mentioned some particular royal laws, or proclamations; as, for the true preaching of the gospel; for hospitality amongst the clergy; and forbidding pluralities, &c. Secondly, what chiefly appertained to their own govt. viz. that it ought to be strictly looked into, whether the king's laws were every where obeyed by the king's subjects; and, if despised, why they were made? For many laws to the no small hurt of the commonweal, remain perfectly unknown. This concerned the oppression of the poor; the power of evil doers, who would observe and keep some laws, whilst they violated others; yet so, as they themselves would explain their meaning.—Also, the great number of engrossers; the dearness of victuals in a time of such abundance, and against sturdy beggars. The 3rd cause for the summons was, that they might search into and examine whether any new vices had broke out in the commonwealth, against which there were no laws yet made. That if they came in use, then new laws should be enacted; in the same manner, as for new and unheard of diseases, new drugs and medicines are sought after and tried. He then told them, that in the framing such laws, the circumstances of the crimes and the qualities of the persons ought chiefly to be considered. For example, an injury received from a friend or a familiar, is heavier than one from an open enemy, or an unknown person; and for this reason the crime of high treason ought to be more heavily punished."

Here the Journal breaks off abruptly, just when the orator was coming to the real point, or cause, for which this parl. was called. Whether this was done by negligence or design, in the clerks, is uncertain; perhaps, the latter; that the queen's disgrace might not appear so openly on record, in which the king's honour, to which was then paid the highest veneration, was but too much concerned. On the 20th day of Jan. the commons presented to the king, in parl. Thos. Moyle, esq. as their Speaker. Whose excuse for disabilities, &c. being not allowed, he made the usual protestation for liberty of speech, and was confirmed.

Proceedings on the attainder of Queen Catherine, &c.] Jan. 21, a bill was brought into the house, and read a first time for the attainder, on the charge of high treason, of Catherine Howard, late queen of England, Jane lady Rochford, with others. And in the same bill was contained the attainders, on misprision of treason, of Agnes Howard duchess of Norfolk, Wm. Howard, &c. On the 28th, the ld. chanc. declared to the rest of the peers, "How much it concerned all their honours, not to proceed to give too hasty a judgment on the bill for the attainder of the queen and others, which had yet been only once read amongst them. For that they were to remember that a queen was no mean or private person, but an illustrious and public one. Therefore, her cause was to be judged with that sincerity, that there should be neither room for suspicion of some latent quarrel, or that she should not have liberty to clear herself, if perchance, by reason or council she was able to do it, from the crime laid to her charge. For this purpose he thought it but reasonable, that some principal persons, as well of the lords as commons, should be deputed to go to the queen, partly to tell her the cause of their coming, and partly in order to help her womanish fears, by advising and admonishing her to have presence of mind enough to say any thing to make her cause better. He knew for certain, that it was but just that a princess should be judged by equal laws with themselves; and he could assure them, that the clearing herself in this manner would be highly acceptable to her most loving husband. But that some answer ought to be had from her, and to report the truth of it to his maj. his advice was, that they should choose the abp. of Canterbury; Charles duke of Suffolk, grand master of the household; Wm. earl of Southampton, lord privy seal; with the bp. of Westminster; if the king's council approved of this, day after day, to repair to the queen, to treat of this matter, according as their own prudence might think it necessary." And in the mean time, the sentence concerning the bill against her majesty was ordered to be suspended.

Jan. 30, the chanc. declared to the lords openly, that the privy council, on mature deliberation, disliked the message that was to be sent to the queen; nevertheless, in the mean time, they had thought of another way, less faulty, to be put to the king, or rather to be altogether demanded of him: "1st. that his maj. would condescend, according to his usual wisdom in council, to weigh by an equal balance, the mutability of all human affairs; that nature is weak and corrupt; none made free from accidents; and that no man can be happy in every thing. That the whole state of the kingdom depends on his maj.'s resolution to divert his mind from all trouble and solicitude. Next, that the attainder of Tho. Colepepper and F. Dereham, with the king's assent, should be confirmed by authority of parl. Also the attainder on misprision against lord Wm. Howard. And that the parl. might have leave to proceed to give judgment, and to finish the queen's cause; that the event of that business may be no longer in doubt. 3rd, that when all these things are completed in a just parliamentary method, without any loss of time, that then his maj. would condescend to give his royal assent to them; not by being present and speaking openly, as the custom hath been in other parliaments, but absent, by his letters patents, under the great seal of England, and signed by his own hand. That the remembrance of this late and sorrowful story and wicked facts, if repeated before him, may not renew his grief and endanger his maj.'s health. Lastly, they were to beseech his maj. that if by chance, by speaking freely on the queen, they should offend against the statutes then in being, out of his great clemency, he would pardon all and every of them for it. And to propound all these matters to his maj. the abp. of Canterbury, Charles duke of Suffolk, with the earl of Southampton, were deputed for that purpose."

Jan. 31, the lord chanc. declared to the house, "that their message and request of yesterday had been delivered to his maj. by the lords commissioners; and that the king had denied no part of their petition, but had orderly granted every part of it. That he had returned them thanks for their loving admonition in regard to his health; which he said he took care of, not so much for the sake of his own body, as that of the whole republic. Nay, his maj. declared further to them than they durst ask of him, as in the case of desiring liberty of speech, &c. For he told them he granted yet more, in giving leave for each man to speak his mind freely, and not incur the penalty which the laws had fixed on those who took the liberty to talk on the incontinency of queens; especially when the said person did not do it out of malice or ill will, but out of zeal for his service."—After this the chancellor declared to the lords, "that as soon as the lords commissioners were dismissed from his maj. a deputation of some principal members from the Commons were admitted to his presence. But what was done or said by them, the chancellor did not well know; only he supposed, that they came to deliver much the same message or petition with their lordships. Adding, that when the commons were dismissed, he commanded that both the Lords and Commons should again be brought before him together. At which time his maj. gravely admonished them, that they should take great care in the framing of good laws, and the due observation of them. That no man should think he was doing his own business singly in parl. or that he was called thither for the sake of his own advantage; but to do the work tending to the good of the public: and that every single peer should reflect how much he owed to the absent multitude. For which reason it behoved both peers and commoners to be unanimous; to have frequent meetings, and talk together of the present business, of the proposed statutes or bills as they are called, which are before them. For his maj. had heard, and with sorrow too, that the present practice of the members of these houses was quite the reverse; bills being rejected as disadvantageous to the commonwealth, only because they could not be understood by the opposers; nor would those that introduced them take the trouble to make them more intelligible, by explaining their proper sense: so that many good bills have lost the force of law, while each party was too obstinate to acquaint the other with their meaning."

Feb. the 11th, the lord chanc. produced two statutes, which had passed both lords and commons; one concerning the attainder of the queen, and the other about the method of proceeding against lunatics, who before their insanity had confessed themselves guilty of high treason. Each statute signed with the king's own hand, and together with his maj.'s assent to them, under the broad seal, and signed also, which was annexed to the said statutes. This the chanc. held forth in both hands, that both lords and commons, who were called for that purpose, might apparently see it, and that the statutes might from thence have the full force and authority of a law. Which, when done, the duke of Suffolk, grand master of the king's household, delivered himself, in a very serious discourse, to this effect: he told the houses, "that he and his fellow-deputies, appointed to wait upon the queen, had been with her; and that she had openly confessed and acknowledged to them the great crime she had been guilty of against the most high God and a kind prince, and lastly against the whole English nation. That she begged them all to implore his maj. not to impute her crime alone to her whole kindred and family. But that his maj. howsoever unworthy she might be and undeserving, would yet extend his unbounded mercy and his singular beneficence to all her brothers, that they might not suffer for her faults. Lastly, to beseech his maj. that it would please him to bestow some of her cloaths on those maid-servants who had been with her from the time of her marriage, since she had now nothing else left to recompence them as they deserved." The earl of Southampton, lord privy seal, next stood up in the house, and, in near the same words, confirmed what the duke had said: adding - - - Here the Journal Book again breaks off abruptly, and we are only told that the chancellor prorogued the parl. to the Tuesday following. This last 'hiatus in manuscripto,' along with the former, makes it seem evident, that they were not done by neglect of the clerks, but by design; and that it was a trick of state, to prevent posterity from being acquainted with some matters, not consistent with the respect they then paid to their grand monarch. The parl. was prorogued from the 11th to the 14th of Feb. and on the 13th the queen and lady Rochford were beheaded on Tower-Hill. April 1, the king came to the house of lords, when we are only told by the Journal that the parl. was prorogued to the 3rd of Nov. following.

Privilege of Parliament.—Proceedings on the arrest of a Member.] We shall only mention one thing more, which happened during this session, related by lord Herbert, as a wrong done to the antient Privilege of Parliaments. It seems, that a member of the Commons was arrested, in an action of debt, whilst the house was sitting. The king was no sooner informed of this, than he not only permitted the Commons to release him, but he punished the offenders. The two sheriffs of London were committed prisoners to the tower; one of the bailiffs to a place called little-ease, and the rest to Newgate. "By which means," adds he, "the king, whose masterpiece it was to make use of his parliaments, not only let foreign princes see the good intelligence between him and his subjects, but kept them all at his devotion." This is all the noble historian says of this matter; but Hollingshead is much more circumstantial about it: "Because," says he, "as the case hath been diversely reported, and is commonly alledged as a Precedent for the Privilege of Parl. he had endeavoured to learn the truth thereof; and to set forth all the circumstances, at large, from those, who, by their instructions, ought best to know and remember it."—The member's name was Geo. Ferrers, esq. a servant of the king's, and elected a burges for the town of Plymouth. One day as he was going to the parl. house he was arrested by a process out of the king's bench, at the suit of one White, for the sum of 200 marks, for which he stood engaged, as a surety, for one Weldon, of Salisbury, and carried to the counter in Broad-street. Sir Tho. Moyle, knt. the Speaker, being informed of this, acquainted the house with it, who forthwith ordered the serjeant at arms to repair to the said prison and demand the prisoner.—The serjeant went immediately to the counter, but the clerks and officers there were so far from delivering the prisoner, that they forcibly resisted him; broke the serjeant's mace, and knocked down his servant. During this squabble, the two sheriffs of London, Rowland Hill and Hen. Suchcliff, came thither, to whom the serjeant complained of this abuse, and of them required the delivery of the imprisoned member; but, they, not only denied to deliver him, but treated the serjeant very contemptuously; and he was forced to return without him to the house.—Finding the members still sitting, the serjeant declared to the Speaker all the circumstances of his ill usage; upon hearing of which, the whole house, among whom were several of the king's privy council and chamber, would sit no longer without their brother member, but rose up and went in a body to the lords, where their Speaker informed the chanc. what a great indignity was put upon them. The lords and judges there assembled took the contempt to be of a very high nature, and referred the punishment of it to an order of their own house. The commons returning, after some debate on the case, soon came to a resolution to send their serjeant to the sheriff's house, and require the delivery of the prisoner without any other warrant. For though the lord chanc. had offered his writ to them, they refused it, as judging that their commands were to be executed by their own serjeant, with his mace, without any other authority.—But before the serjeant at arms came with this second message, the sheriffs had been told how heinously the matter was taken; and therefore they now delivered the prisoner to him without any hesitation. But the serjeant's orders went further; he charged the sheriffs to appear personally before the house at 8 o'clock the next morning, and bring with them the clerks of the counter, and such other officers as were concerned in the affray.—The next day the sheriffs, &c. appeared at the bar of the house, when the Speaker charged them with the contempt and misdemeanour, and commanded them to answer, immediately, without allowing them any counsel; though sir Roger Cholmley, recorder of London, and others of the city counsel, offered to speak in the cause. In the end, the sheriffs, and White, the prosecutor, were committed to the tower, and the rest to Newgate as aforesaid. There they remained 2 days, and then, on their own petition, and at the humble request of the lord mayor of London, and other friends, they were discharged.—But, there still remained another difficulty to settle. The said Ferrers, being condemned in the debt, and lying in execution for it, but released by the privilege of parl. could not, by law, be again put under execution for the same debt; and so the party was left without remedy for his debt, as well against him as his principal debtor. This knotty point in law was debated in the house for 9 or 10 days together. At last it was resolved to make a particular act, to revive the execution of the said debt against Weldon, the principal, and to discharge Ferrers of it. This occasioned a division in the house, and it was only carried for Ferrers by 14 voices.”

The same authority informs us, that the king, being advertised of these proceedings, called before him the lord chanc. and his judges, with the Speaker of the commons, and several of the chief members of that house; to whom he declared his opinion to this effect:—“He first commended their wisdoms in maintaining the Privileges of their House; which he would not have infringed in any point. He alledged that he being the head of the parl. and attending in his own person on the business thereof, ought, in reason, to have privilege for himself and all his servants, in attendance on him. So that if Ferrers had been no burgess, but only his servant, in respect of that he ought to have privilege as well as any other. For I understand, says he, that you enjoy the same privilege, not only for yourselves, but even for your cooks and horse-keepers. My lord chanc. here present hath informed me, that when he was Speaker of the lower house, the cook of the temple was arrested in London, on an execution upon the statute of Staple. And, because the said cook served the Speaker in that office, he was taken out of execution by the privilege of parl. Likewise the judges have informed us, that we at no time stand so high in our estate royal as in the time of parl.; when we as head, and you as members, are conjoined and knit together into one body politic; so that whatsoever injury is done or offered during that time, against the meanest member of the house, is judged as done against our own person, and whole court of parl. The prerogative of which court is so great, that, as our learned in the laws inform us, all acts and processes, coming out of any other inferior courts, must for that time cease and give place to the highest.—And, as touching the plaintiff in this cause, it was a great presumption in him, knowing our servant to be one of this house, and being warned of it before, still to prosecute this matter, out of time; and therefore was well worthy to lose his debt, which I do not wish; and most commend your equity, that having lost it by law, you have restored the same against him that was his debtor. And, if it be well considered what an expence it hath been to ourself and you all, as well as loss of time, which should have been employed in affairs of our realm, to sit here near a fortnight, about this one private case, he may think himself better used than his desert. This I hope will be a good example to others, to learn better manners; and not to attempt any thing against the privileges of this high court of parl. but to stay for a proper opportunity. This is my opinion, and if I err, I must refer myself to the judgment of our lord justices, here present, and the other learned of the laws.”—Upon which, sir Edw. Montacute, lord chief justice, very gravely gave his opinion, confirming, by divers reasons, all that the king had said; which was assented to by all the rest, no one speaking to the contrary.”

War with Scotland and France.] In Oct. 1542 war was proclaimed against Scotland; and when the parl. met on the 3rd of Nov. according to prorogation, they were again adjourned to the 22nd of Jan. following. In this short interval, a war with France was also resolved on; and, in order to raise money to support the expence of both, the parl. was summoned to meet, at the time appointed, in order to sit to do business. In the Journals is no opening of this 2nd session by the ld. chanc.'s declaration, as usual. And, though the houses continued sitting from the time aforesaid, to the 12th of May, 1543, yet there are no particular speeches, or declarations, made by any of the great officers of the crown, to be found in those records. On which last mentioned day, the king came to the lords, and again prorogued this parl. to the 3rd of Nov. following.

Acts passed.] The principal act that passed both houses, had the grant of another subsidy from the laity included in it. It was ordered to be paid to the king, in 3 years, after this manner:—“they who were in goods worth 20s. and upwards to 5l. paid 4d. of every pound; from 5l. to 10l. 8d.; from 10l. to 20l. 1/4; from 20l. and upwards, 2s. All strangers, as well denizens as others inhabiting here, double the sum; strangers not inhabitants, that were 16 years old and upwards, paid 4d. for every head or pole. As for lands, fees and annuities, every native paid 8d. in the pound from 20s. to 5l.; from 5l. to 10l. 1/4; from 10l. to 20l. 2s.; from 20l. and upwards, 3s.; strangers still after all these rates doubling the sum. As for the clergy, they granted a subsidy of 6s. in the pound, to be paid off their benefices in perpetuity, in 3 years following; and every priest having no perpetuity, but an annual stipend, paid yearly, during the said 3 years, 6/8. Besides which, by occasion of a dearth of victuals, a sumptuary law was made, whereby the mayor and sheriffs of London, as also the serjeants and yeomen of their houses, were limited to a certain number of dishes: they were also forbidden to buy certain kinds of fowl. Nevertheless, in regard of the great confluence of people in this parl. time, and the scarcity of fish, the king, by proclamation, dispensed with eating of white-meats in lent, forbidding yet the eating of flesh so strictly, that Henry earl of Surrey, with divers lords, knights and gentlemen, were imprisoned for offending herein." The preamble to the above grants sets forth "the expence the king had been at in his war with Scotland, and for his other great and urgent occasions." By which was meant the war with France, which broke out, in earnest, the next summer.

Act for reformation of Religion.] Cranmer, and the other reformers, took this opportunity to push on the great affair of reformation; and, though it was much opposed in parl. yet Burnet informs us that his resolution carried it through, though not in so clear a method as he proposed it; for the bill was clogged with many provisos, which rendered it very much short of what he designed. The title of this bill is, "an act for the advancement of true religion, and abolishment of the contrary." The preamble sets forth "that many seditious and ignorant people had abused the liberty granted them for reading the Bible; and great diversity of opinions, animosities, tumults, and schisms, have been occasioned by perverting the sense of the scripture. To retrieve the mischiefs arising from thence, it is enacted, that a certain form of orthodox doctrine, consonant to the inspired writings, and the doctrine of the catholic and apostolic church, shall be set forth as a standard of belief; That Tindal's false translation of the Old and New Testament, and all other books touching religion in the English tongue, contrary to the Articles of Faith, or that Summary of Doctrine published by the king in 1540, or any time after during his maj.'s reign, shall be suppressed, and forbidden to be read in the king's dominions.—All printers and booksellers are prohibited printing or vending any of the said books. The exposing the doctrine of the religion established, in plays and ballads, is likewise prohibited under deep forfeitures and imprisonment. All books likewise impugning the Holy Sacrament of the Altar, or maintaining the damnable opinions of the Anabaptists, are prohibited under forfeitures and fines. The reading the Bible is likewise prohibited, to all under the degrees of gentlemen and gentlewomen." After this follows a proviso of some liberty: "that it shall be lawful for all persons whatsoever, to read or teach all such doctrine, as is or shall be set forth by his maj. since the year of our Lord 1540. And also the Psalter, Primer, Pater-Noster, Ave, and Creed in English. And if any spiritual person shall preach or maintain any thing contrary to the doctrines above-mentioned, he shall recant for his 1st offence, abjure for his 2nd, and bear a faggot; and for a farther relapse shall be adjudged an heretic, suffer the pains of burning, and forfeit all his goods and chattles.

In 1543, Henry married the lady Catherine Parr, widow to the lord Latimer, who was esteemed a lady of great worth. Soon after, Wm. lord Parr, her brother, was made earl of Essex, and others of her relations preferred. "In short," says lord Herbert, "the king lived apparently well with her for the most part; but all this seemed nothing to him, unless he parted always in good terms with his parliaments; for he accounted a parl. his most loyal spouse; and not without reason, for he never desired any thing of them which they did not perform." Some more instances of which we meet with in the next session, which began Jan. 14, 1544.

Henry assumes the title of King of Ireland.] We meet with nothing remarkable in this session, but the bill brought into the lords for altering the king's stile or title. Henry had thought fit, some time before this, to assume to himself the title of "King of Ireland;" and had prevailed upon the parl. there to recognize him as such. And, now being laid before the house of lords, in England, they also passed it, and sent it down to the commons. But, on the 4th of Feb. a committee was sent from the lower house, to desire a conference with the lords about it. The lords readily agreed to this, and appointed 12 of their house, who were to meet on the morrow, at 8 o'clock in the morning, with a committee of the same number from the commons, in the parl. chamber, to consult together about this business. We are not told by the Journal what was done or said at this conference; but that the next day, the bill for altering the king's stile was sent from the commons; and the clerk takes notice, that it must be a new bill, probably agreed upon by the commissioners, since it was read again, and passed in the lords as such. It was ordained by this act, that the king's stile of "king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith; and of the church of England, and also of Ireland, in earth, the supreme head," shall be united and annexed for ever unto the imperial crown of this realm of England. By this act also it was declared, where and before whom treasons committed out of the realm should be tried.

Act for settling the Succession.] Feb. 7th, another act, of still more public concern than the former, was brought into the lords, and read a 1st time. This was to settle the succession to the crown, after the demise of the king; whereby the princess Mary, daughter to Katharine, his first queen, was declared legitimate, and put under a possibility of succeeding to the throne. And the whole business was settled among his children in such a manner, as far as by our laws a king is warranted, that all cause of competition was taken away by it. The act passed both houses on the 16th, without opposition; and since bp. Burnet hath abridged it, we think it worthy of a place in these enquiries. The act contains, "that the king being now to pass the seas, to make war upon his ancient enemy the French king, and being desirous to settle the succession to the crown; it is enacted, that in default of heirs of prince Edward's body, or of heirs by the king's present marriage, the crown shall go to the lady Mary, the king's eldest daughter; and in default of heirs of her body, or if she do not observe such limitations or conditions as shall be declared by the king's letters patents under his great seal, or by his last will under his hand, it shall next fall to the lady Elizabeth, and her heirs; or if she have none, or shall not keep the conditions declared by the king, it shall fall to any other that shall be declared by the king's letters patents, or his last will signed with his hand. There was also an oath devised, instead of those formerly sworn, both against the pope's supremacy, and for maintaining the succession in all points according to this act: which, whosoever refused to take, was to be adjudged a traitor; and whosoever should, either in words or by writing, say any thing contrary to this act, or to the peril and slander of the king's heirs, limited in the act, was to be adjudged a traitor."

March 29th, when the whole business of this session was expedited, the Lords, in their parliament-robcs, and the whole house of commons, with their Speaker, all waiting the king's coming to put an end to it, the duke of Norfolk, lord treasurer, in the absence of the lord chanc. who was then on his death-bed, acquainted the house, "that the king was prevented from coming to them by some urgent business that required dispatch; but that his maj. considering how long this session had lasted, and that none had absented from it, with the expence that must attend such a stay; likewise the great labour and pains they had taken in framing a set of new laws, which his maj. had carefully perused. Therefore he had first commanded him to acquaint them, in his maj.'s name, that he sincerely thought them no less good subjects to him than useful ones to the republic. That his maj. had also commanded him to praise their studious and honest intentions; not doubting, but that their practice and his love to them for it would ever continue. Lastly, the duke said, he, an humble subject, was commanded to tell them, in his maj.'s name, that to all the bills which they had got ready, he would give his royal assent. Adding, that his most serene highness had not done this only by his mouth, but had also sent his letters patents to confirm it." After which follows a copy, in English, of the letters patents, wherein is recited the titles of all the bills that were to be by the royal assent passed into statutes. Which being read by the clerk of parl. the whole assembly, says the Journal, burst out into loud praises and encomiums on their good king, who thought his subjects worthy of such good laws. Then the duke of Norfolk proceeded to tell them, "that now they were all sensible in what good part his maj. had taken their labours, by condescending to give his royal assent to all and singular their bills, none but one, relating to the reserving of tenures, excepted; which was then ordered to be cancelled." The duke, lastly, told them, "that his maj. thought this a fit, if not a necessary opportunity, that every one of them should return to their own homes. The wars now breaking out on every side, and his maj. intending this summer, by God's grace, to assert his just right to his patrimony in France, their longer stay might be a hinderance to his preparation; he had therefore granted his letters patents, to commission certain lords to dissolve this parl.; which, after reading of the said commission, was dissolved accordingly." In the Journals are the titles of 25 public and private acts; in the Statute-Books only 18: for the titles of the public acts see our list at the end of this reign.

Money raised by a Benevolence.] Levies and preparations were now made to carry on the war, both against France and Scotland; and over the latter kingdom Henry's army gained great advantages, by the taking and burning of Edinburgh, and other towns in that neighbourhood. Nor was he less solicitous about France, having transported an army of 30,000 men to Calais, and actually went over to conduct the war in person. Lord Herbert, and the larger English historians, may be consulted for a particular account of these wars. Whatever the success was, it may well seem not to be worth the expence, when the king's necessities drove him to very mean ways to raise money for carrying it on. For though he had much enriched himself with the revenues of the suppressed abbies, and besides had great subsidies and loans from his subjects; yet fortifications, shipping, and other provisions had exhausted his treasure. Add to this, he found out that his crafty neighbours had well nigh drained his kingdom of the current money, whilst they made great advantage of it in their own. To remedy which evil, the king both enhanced our gold from 45s. to 48s. an ounce, and silver from 3/9 to 4s. He likewise caused some new-coined base money to be made current, though not without much murmuring. He had borrowed also divers sums of money of different people, giving them privy seals for their security. But all not supplying the vast expence of the war, Henry set on foot the old practice of raising money by a Benevolence; and, in 1544, he appointed commissioners to collect it, beginning at London with the lord-mayor and aldermen. It is remarkable, that amongst those magistrates there was one, called Read, that refused to pay his share. On which he was seized, and sent to serve in the war against the Scots; where, in the battle at Ancram, the next spring, he was slain. Many excused themselves also by their penury; in regard the king had taken up so much corn from them this year for his use, and not as yet paying for it; so that, in effect, this Benevolence raised not so much money as Henry expected, and what was collected came with much grudging.

A Parl. called.] All these ways and means not answering Henry's purpose, writs were sent out for a parl. to meet at Westminster, on the 23rd of Nov. 1546. The clerks have again neglected to insert the initiating speeches and ceremonies at the opening of this parl. in the Journal; and we meet with nothing more than the names of the peers and the receivers and triers of petitions. Nov. 27, a bill was brought into the lords for the abolishing of heresies, and of some books tainted with false opinions. It was read a 1st time, and committed to the abp. of Canterbury, the lord Pawlet, the earls of Hertford and Shrewsbury, the bps. of Ely, Sarum, and Worcester, the lords De la Ware, Morley, and Ferrers for examination.

Dec. 14th a bill was brought up to the lords from the commons, by sir Tho. Cheney, treasurer of the household, and others, for granting a Subsidy to his maj. And the next day, another bill was read a 1st time, for the dissolution of all colleges, chantries, hospitals, free chapels, &c. Which bills passed both houses, without any opposition. The subsidy was 2/8 in the pound on goods, and 4s. in the pound on land, to be all paid within two years. The clergy also granted 6s. in the pound, which was afterwards confirmed, as the custom then begun, by the whole parl. But the bill for the Dissolution of Colleges, &c. made much more noise in the world; and, as lord Herbert well observes, "nothing could be pleaded in excuse for it but the king's necessities, which every man must think violent, when, adds he, they retrenched upon the reverend foundations of colleges, free chapels, chantries, hospitals, fraternities, brotherhoods, guilds, and stipendary priests, which had continuance in perpetuity. Together with all their manors, lands, and hereditaments, which were now committed to the king's disposal; and that they should be in the order and survey of the court of Augmentations; the right to others yet saved, and several provisions yet made. The motive for bringing in this bill was alledged to be the king's great charges in his wars with France and Scotland, as also the abuses of the rulers and governors of the said colleges, &c. Upon which, and the king's solemn promise to the parl. that 'all should be done to the glory of God, and common profit of the realm,' the bill was passed." There are no less than 32 titles of acts passed in this parl. in the Journals; the Statute Books give us only 25.

The King's Speech at proroguing the Parl.] The parl. continued to sit till Christmas Eve, when the king came to the house, passed bills, and prorogued it to the 4th day of Nov. in the next year. This is all that is entered in the Journals; but historians are not so silent; for we are told, that after the Speaker of the Commons had made an elegant oration, on presenting the bills to the king, his maj. in person made the following answer:*

"Although my chancellor for the time being, hath before this time used very eloquently and substantially to make answer to such orations, as hath been set forth in this high court of parl.; yet is he not so able to open and set forth my mind and meaning, and the secrets of my heart in so plain and ample a manner, as I myself am, and can do. Wherefore, I, taking upon me to answer your eloquent oration, Mr. Speaker, say that where you, in the name of our beloved commons, have both praised and extolled me, for the notable quality that you have conceived to be in me, I most heartily thank you all, that you have put me in remembrance of my duty; which is, to endeavour myself to obtain, and get such excellent qualities and necessary virtues, as a prince or governor should, and ought to have; of which gifts I recognize myself both bare and barren; but of such small qualities as God hath endowed me withal, I render to his goodness my most humble thanks, intending with all my wit and diligence, to get and acquire to me such notable virtues, and princely qualities, as you have alledged to be incorporated in my person. These thanks for your loving admonition and good counsel first remembered, I eftsoons thank you again, because that you considering our great charge, not for our pleasure, but for our defence; not for our gain, but to our great cost, which we have lately sustained; as well in defence of your and our enemies, as for the conquest of that fortress, which was to this realm most displeasing and noisome, and shall be, by God's grace, hereafter to our nation most profitable and pleasant; have freely of your own minds granted to us a certain subsidy here in an act specified, which, verily, we take in good part, regarding more your kindness, than the profit thereof; as he that setteth more by your loving hearts than by your substance. Besides this hearty kindness, I cannot a little rejoice, when I consider the perfect trust and confidence which you have put in me, as men having undoubted hope, and unfeigned belief in my good doings, and just proceedings for you; who without my desire or request, have committed to mine order and disposition, all chantries, colleges, hospitals, and other places specified in a certain act, firmly trusting that I will order them to the glory of God, and the profit of the commonwealth. Surely, if I, contrary to your expectation, should suffer the ministers of the church to decay; or learning, which is so great a jewel, to be diminished; or poor and miserable to be unrelieved; you might say, that I being put in so special a trust, as I am in this very probably heard it; for he says, it is as near taken as he is able to report it. Bp. Burnet says, that he cannot sufficiently wonder that no entry is made in the Journals of this speech; yet it is not to be doubted but Henry made it, since it was published by Hall soon after.

case, were no trusty friend to you, nor charitable to mine, nor even a christian, neither a lover of the public wealth, nor yet one that feared God, to whom account must be rendered of all our doings. Doubt not, I pray you, but your expectation shall be served more godly and goodly, than you will wish or desire, as hereafter you shall plainly perceive. Now, since I find such kindness on your part towards me, I cannot chuse but love and favour you; affirming, that no prince in the world more favoureth his subjects than I do you, nor no subjects or commons more loved and obeyed their sovereign lord, than I perceive you do me; for whose defence my treasure shall not be hidden, nor if necessity require, my person shall not be unadventured. Yet, although I wish you, and you wish me to be in this perfect love and concord; this friendly unity cannot continue, except both you my lords temporal and my lords spiritual, and you my loving subjects, study and take pains to amend one thing, which surely is amiss, and far out of order, to which I most heartily require you, which is, that charity and concord is not among you, but disorder and dissention beareth rule in every place. St. Paul saith to the Corinthians, in the 13th chap. 'Charity is gentle, charity is not envious, charity is not proud,' and so forth, in the said chapter. Behold then, what love and charity is among you, when the one calleth another heretic and anabaptist, and he calleth him again papist, hypocrite, and pharisee; be these tokens of charity amongst you, are these signs of fraternal love between you? No, no, I assure you that this lack of charity amongst yourselves, will be the hinderance and asswaging of the fervent love between us, as I said before, except this wound be salved, and clearly made whole. I must needs judge the fault, and occasion of this discord, to be partly by negligence of you, the fathers and preachers of the spirituality: for if I know a man which liveth in adultery, I must judge him a lecherous, and a carnal person: if I see a man boast and brag himself, I cannot but deem him a proud man. I see here, daily, that you of the clergy preach one against another, teach one contrary to another, envy one against another, without charity or discretion; some be too stiff in their old mumpsimus, others be too busy and curious in their new sumpsimus. Thus all men, almost, be in variety and discord, and few or no preaching truly and sincerely the word of God, according as they ought to do. Shall I judge you charitable persons doing this? No, no, I cannot do so: alas! how can the poor souls live in concord, when you, preachers, sow amongst them, in your sermons, debate and discord? Of you they look for light, and you bring them to darkness. Amend these crimes, I exhort you, and set out God's word, both by true preaching, and good example-giving; or else, I, whom God hath appointed his vicar and high minister here, will see these divisions extinct, and these enormities corrected, according to my very duty, or else I am an unprofitable servant and an untrue officer. Although I say, the spiritual men be in some fault, that charity is not kept amongst you, yet, you of the temporality, be not clear and unspotted of malice and envy; for you rail at bishops, speak scandalously of priests, and rebuke and taunt preachers, both contrary to good order, and christian fraternity: if you know, surely, that a bp. or preacher erreth, or teacheth perverse doctrine, come and declare it to some of our council, or to us, to whom is committed, by God, the high authority, to reform and order such causes and behaviours; and be not judges, yourselves, of your fantastic opinions, and vain expositions; for in such high causes, you may lightly err. And, although you be permitted to read holy scripture, and to have the word of God in your mother-tongue, you must understand, it is licensed you so to do, only to inform your own consciences, and instruct your children and family; and not to dispute and make scripture a railing and taunting stock against priests and preachers, as many light persons do. I am very sorry to know, and hear, how unreverently that most precious jewel, the word of God, is disputed, rhimed, sung, and jangled, in every ale-house and tavern, contrary to the true meaning and doctrine of the same; and yet I am even as much sorry, that the readers of the same, follow it, in doing it so faintly, and coldly; for of this I am sure, that charity was never so faint amongst you, and virtuous and godly living was never less used, nor God himself, amongst christians, was never less revered, honoured or served. Therefore, as I said before, be in charity one with another; like brother and brother love; dread and fear God; to the which I, as your supreme head, and sovereign lord, exhort and require you; and then I doubt not but that love and league, that I spake of in the beginning, shall never be discouraged, or broken between us. To the making of laws which we have now made and concluded, I exhort you, the makers, to be as diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in making and furthering of the same; or else your labour shall be in vain, and your commonwealth nothing relieved. Now to your petition concerning our royal assent to be given to such acts, as have passed both the houses, they shall be read openly, that we may hear them."

The D. of Norfolk and his Son attainted.] The Journal furnishes us with another session of this parl. which, as was said before, was prorogued to the 4th of Nov. but was again adjourned to the 14th of Jan. 1547, when they met to do business. On the 18th a bill was brought into the house for the Attaindure of Tho. duke of Norfolk, and Henry earl of Surrey; his son. It was read a first time, and committed to the king's solicitor-general for examination. The bill passed the lords on the 20th, and was returned, passed by the commons on the 24th. On the 27th, the ld. chanc. now the ld. Wriothesley, ordered all the peers to put on their parl. robes, and that the Commons, with their Speaker, should be called before him. Which done, the said chanc. declared to both the houses, that it was his maj.'s desire, for certain reasons, that they should expedite the bill for the Attaindure of Thos. duke of Norfolk, and Henry earl of Surrey, as fast as possible. And for this cause chiefly, that the king might be enabled to bestow the office of earl Marshal, we suppose, borne by the said duke, on some other, who by just right might execute it at the ceremony of the creation of prince Edw. then approaching. Which bill all the lords and commons had already passed; and therefore, because the king was hindered by sickness from coming to the house, to give his royal assent to the same, his maj. had directed a commission to him and other lords, there sitting, in his name to give the royal assent to the said bill. Which commission, dated Jan. 27, in the 38th of his reign, signed with the king's hand and under the broad seal, being read, the lord chancellor commanded the clerk of parl. to pronounce the usual words, 'Soit fait come il est desire.' And thus the bill passed into a statute. The earl of Surrey was beheaded on Tower-hill; and it is thought the duke of Norfolk, notwithstanding his submission and long services, would not have escaped, had not the king's death reserved him to more merciful times.

The King's Death.] Jan. 31, the ld. chanc. declared to both houses the king's death, and that he expired early in the morning, on Friday the 28th of this month. The mournful news of which, says the Journal, was so affecting to the chancellor and all present, that they could not refrain from tears. But, turning their thoughts on his successor, prince Edw. by divine appointment; and the greatest part of the testament of their said deceased sovereign being read by sir Wm. Paget, principal secretary of state, concerning the succession and well governing of the kingdom, during the minority of the said prince Edward; with the cause for payment of debts and performing of promises; the ld. chanc. declared, that by the king's death the parl. was dissolved; and that every man was at liberty to depart home. Nevertheless, he advised the peers to wait for the coronation of prince Edward, which was shortly expected.

In the 1st year of this king's reign, he had a supply, by parl. of two 10ths and two 15ths.—In his 2nd, two 10ths and two 15ths, with tunnage and poundage, for carrying on a war against France.—In his 4th, a grant of two more 10ths and 15ths, besides a Poll-Tax, on account of an invasion from the Scots.—In his 6th, tunnage and poundage was granted, and a subsidy; but the value of the latter is uncertain.—During an interval of parliaments, from the 7th to the 14th year of his reign, divers arbitrary means were made use of for raising money. And, in the 14th, he had also a Subsidy.—In his 17th year, commissioners were sent into every county, for levying the 6th part of every layman's goods, and the 4th of the clergy; but no parl. was called till the 20th; in which year an act passed to discharge him of certain debts; which the clergy, by another act, were required to pay.—In his 23d year, he had a 15th for the defence of the northern borders; and, in his 26th, a Subsidy of a 10th and 15th, besides a grant of the First Fruits and Tenths of all spiritual dignities, benefices, &c.—In his 32nd year, he had a Subsidy of one 15th and a 10th, and 4s. in the pound from the clergy.—In his 34th year a very large Subsidy, for a war with Scotland and France; and, in the next, he issued a commission to raise money by Benevolence.—In his 37th year, he had a Subsidy of 2/3 in the pound on goods, 4s. on land, and 6s. from the clergy; besides the immense sums that came into his hands by the suppression of monasteries, abbeys, hospitals, &c.

In 1510, oats sold at 2s. per quarter, and hay at 9s. per load.—In 1511, oats 2s. and beans 3/4 per qr.; hay 5s. per load.—In 1513, oats 2/4, and beans 4s.—In 1514, the price of wages of workmen, and servants by the year, day, &c. in husbandry: a chief hind, carter, and shepherd, each 1l. per ann. cloathing, with diet, 5s; common servant of husbandry 16/3, cloathing 4s; women servants yearly wages 40s, cloathing 4s.—The wages, by the day, of a workman, from Easter to Michaelmas: a free mason, at diet, 4d. without 6d.; a master carpenter, a rough mason, a tiler, a plumber, a bricklayer, a glazier, a carver, and a joiner, the same. From Michaelmas to Easter, with diet, 3d. without, 5d.—A shipwright's wages, from Candlemas to Michaelmas: a master carpenter, with diet, 5d. without, 7d.; a hewer, with, 4d. without, 6d.; an able clincher, with, 3d. without, 5d.; an holder, with, 2d. without, 4d.; a master calker, with, 4d. without, 6d.; a mean calker, with, 3d. without, 5d.; a calker, labouring by the tide, with, 4d. without, 6d. From Michaelmas to Candlemas, the masters wages diminished 1d. and so in proportion the rest. From Easter to Michaelmas, other labourers had per diem (except in harvest) with diet, 2d. without, 4d. From Michaelmas to Easter, ditto, with diet, 1½d. without, 3d. In harvest, a mower, with diet, 4d. without, 6d.; a reaper and a carter, with, 3d. without, 5d.; a woman labourer, and other labourers, with, 2½d. without, 4½d.—In 1518 and 1519, the conquest of Mexico was made by Hernando Cortes, a Spaniard, and the foundation of the kingdom of New Spain was laid. A great quantity of gold and silver being imported into Europe from thence, money became more plentiful, and trade diffusing itself every where, there soon appeared more numerous armies, greater magnificence in princes courts, the dowries of princesses much enlarged, and the price of provisions enhanced. Spain was the first nation that aggrandized itself by it; and it was this vast treasure that occasioned Ch. V. and Philip II. to aspire to universal monarchy.—In 1521 was a dearth; wheat sold for 11. per qr.—In 1526, oats 3s, and beans 4/2.—In 1530, oats 4s, beans 5/4.—And in 1532, oats 3/10; beans 5/4.—In 1533, it was enacted by parl. that beef and pork should be sold for 1/2d. a pound, and veal or mutton for 3/4d.—In 1537, oats 3/4 per qr.; beans 6s. The price of Gascoigne, Guyenne, or French wines were settled by parl. at 3d. the gallon; Malmseys, Romneys, Sack, and other sweet wines, at 12d. by retail.—In 1543, oats 3/4; beans 6/8.

EDWARD VI.

Edward was only nine years of age when he succeeded to the throne. Soon after his coronation, lord Edw. Seymour, then earl of Hertford, was created duke of Somerset, and made governor to the king and protector of the realm. This nobleman was own uncle to the king by the mother's side; and had, by that affinity, and his places, an absolute sway over all. The first year of this reign began with a war with Scotland; some overtures of a marriage having been again made by the English council, between their king and the princess Mary, sole daughter and heir to James V. king of Scots, which being refused by the latter, a bloody war ensued. The English army was commanded by the duke of Somerset, who marched northward as far as the river Eske; on the banks of which an obstinate battle was fought, in which the English were conquerors, with the destruction of above 10,000 of their enemies. This reign also began with a farther reformation in religion, the Lord Protector being zealous for carrying it on; certain injunctions were published by authority for removing images out of churches, and for abolishing or altering some other ancient observations, as sir John Hayward terms them, in the church.

A Parl. called.] Some bps. opposing these innovations, and others saying that it was well to stay these changes in religious matters, till the king was of years fit to govern by himself, a parl. was called to meet at Westminster, on the 4th of Nov. 1547, in the 1st year of his reign. The following is a

We are now come to a period from which the Journals of the House of Commons are extant. The first volume, which begins with this reign, contains little more than a diurnal succinct account of proceedings in reading bills, &c. but yet will be of some use in ascertaining dates in chronology. The Journals of the Lords are more explicit in the reign before us than those of the commons; the ensuing parl. being introduced by that authority in the following manner: "Mem. the 4th of Nov. in the 1st year of king Edw. VI. the king's maj. sitting in the Parl. Chamber at Westm. with all the lords, on both sides, and the commons standing beneath the bar; commanded the clerk of the parl. openly to read his highness's commission, being sealed with the great seal of England, the tenor whereof hereafter ensueth:

"Edward VI. by the grace of God, king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and of the church of England, and also of Ireland, in earth, the supreme head; to all whom these presents shall come, greeting. Forasmuch as our most dear uncle, Edw. duke of Somerset, whom, by the advice of the lords, and the rest of our council, with the consent and good agreement of the noblemen of our realms, we have named, ordained, and commanded to be Governor of our Person, and Protector of our Realms, dominions, and subjects, during our minority, hath no such place appropriate or appointed unto him in our high court of parl. as is convenient and necessary, as well in respect of his proximity of blood unto us, being our uncle and eldest brother unto our mother of most noble memory deceased, queen Jane; as also for his better managing and conducting our affairs, to our honour, dignity, and surety, and the wealth and benefit of our realms, dominions, and subjects: we have therefore, as well by the consent of our said uncle, and by the advice of other the lords of our privy council, willed, ordained, and appointed, and do by these presents will, ordain, and appoint, that our said uncle shall and do sit alone, and be placed at all times, as well in our presence, in our said court of parl. as in our absence, upon the midst of the bench or stool standing next on the right hand of our seat royal, in our Parl. Chamber, and that he further shall have, and do enjoy, in our said court of parl. in all sessions, all such other privileges, pre-eminences, prerogatives, and liberties, in all things and to all effects, as by law or statutes heretofore made, or otherwise, any the uncles, by father or mother side, to any of our most noble progenitors, or any protector of their realms and dominions, being in the minority of years as we be, have had, used, or enjoyed in their courts of parl. the statute concerning the placing of the lords in the Parl. Chamber, and other assemblies and conferences of council, made in the 31st of the reign of our most dear father, of famous memory, king Henry VIII. or any other statute, act, ordinance, or provision heretofore had or made, to the contrary notwithstanding; and for the express mention of any other grants or gifts, made to our said uncle by us, or any of our progenitors, heretofore had or made, in these presents not mentioned, or any other thing, matter, or cause, whatsoever it be, notwithstanding. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patents: witness ourself at Westminster the 3rd of Nov. in the 1st year of our reign.

Southwell," (master of the Rolls.)

When the aforesaid commission was openly read, and heard of all the house, and the lord protector placed accordingly, the lord Rich, being lord chanc. began his oration, to the effect as follows:— — —

We have chosen to give the following memorandum and letters patent at length, as they are entered in the Journals, being the first step of power and pre-eminence this haughty duke took upon him. But whether by the negligence of the clerks or otherwise, the lord chancellor's oration is wholly omitted, and only a blank page left for it. Neither is the Speaker of the commons mentioned, as usual; but this we supply from the Journals. Sir John Baker was chosen to that office.

The first affair that the Lords went upon, was to frame a bill for the better protection of the Northern Borders; but we do not find that it passed into a law; it being thought more advisable to send a great army thither, under the Lord Protector, who gained a complete victory over the Scots, near Muscleborough. This war broke out on occasion of the Scots again refusing their princess Mary to be joined in wedlock with king Edward. She was afterwards married to the dauphin of France.

Statute of Prerogative repealed.] Nov. 10th, a bill for the repeal of certain statutes, as it is there called, came into the house; but was in effect to be an act to repeal the statute of the 28th Hen. VIII. which gave authority to the king, after the age of 24, to repeal, by his letters patents, all former statutes made during his minority, &c. A stretch of absolute power, left as a legacy by the late king to his son and successors; and if it had stood, parliaments would have soon become useless to this nation. But by this act it was thus altered, "that the king, when he came to the aforesaid age, might, by his letters patent, annul any act of parl. for the future; but could not so void it from the beginning, as to annul all things done upon it, between the making and annulling of any law, which were still to be lawful deeds." This bill was afterwards tacked to another for the repeal of treasons, felonies, &c. which will come in the sequel.

Act relating to the Sacrament.] Nov. 12th, a bill was brought into the commons, relating to the Sacrament of the Altar, which passed that house on the 17th. This bill was occasioned by an irreverent treatment that sacred mystery met with at that time, from the then growing sect of the Puritans and others. The preamble to the act declares, "That some had disputed and reasoned unreverently and ungodly of that most holy mystery, and called it by such vile and unseemly words that christian ears did abhor." The act forbears to mention them; but some of the terms were Round Robin, Jack in a Box, Sacrament of the Halter, &c. because the wafer was round, and usually kept in a pix, or box. The same act, in the last paragraph of it, did enjoin the said Holy Sacrament to be delivered and ministred to the people in both kinds, of bread and wine; "being more conformable, as the act expresses, to the common use and practice of the apostles and primitive church, by the space of 500 years and more after Christ's ascension."

Nov. 15, a bill for the admission of bishops by the king's majesty only, was brought into the house; that is, that bps. should be placed in their sees by collation of the king under his letters patents, without any precedent election or ensuing confirmation. By this act it was set forth, "that the way of chusing bps. by congé d'elire was tedious and expensive, that there was only a shadow of election in it, and that therefore bps. should thereafter be made by the king's letters patent, upon which they were to be consecrated: and whereas the bps. did exercise their authority, and carry on processes, in their own names, as they were wont to do in the time of popery; and since all jurisdiction both spiritual and temporal was derived from the king, that therefore their courts and all processes should be from henceforth carried on in the king's name, and be sealed by the king's seal, as it was in the other courts of common law, after the 1st of July next; excepting only the abp. of Canterbury's courts, and all collations, presentations, or letters of orders, which were to pass under the bishop's proper seals as formerly." Upon this act, says Burnet, great advantages were taken to disparage the reformation, as subjecting the bps. wholly to the pleasure of the court.—On the same day another bill for reading the Scripture was introduced.

A Subsidy.] Nov. 21, a bill for a Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage, on merchandize, called customs, was brought in; which afterwards passed both houses, with a proviso for the merchants of the stilyard. It was granted for the king's life, and then was rated, the tonnage, at 3s. on every tun of wine; for sweet wines 6s.; 12d. for every aulme of rhenish. The poundage was 12d. in the pound, in value, of all goods, imported or exported; and 2s. of aliens for tin and pewter exported.

Nov. 29th, a bill against Vagabonds was brought in; by which it was enacted, "that all that should any way loiter without work, or without offering themselves to work, 3 days together; or that should run away from work, and resolve to live idly, should be seized on; and whosoever should present them to a justice of peace, was to have them adjudged to be his slaves for two years; and they were to be marked with the letter V, imprinted with a hot iron on their breast."

Act for dissolving Chauntries, &c.] Dec. 12th, a bill was read a 2nd time by the Lords, for suppressing chauntries and colleges. On the 15th it was read a 3rd time, and passed that house by the consent of all the peers, except the abp. of Canterbury, and the bps. of London, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Hereford, Worcester, and Chichester, who dissented from it. There are two instances, in this day's proceedings and the day before, of two or three lay lords dissenting from bills passing the house, which are the first we have yet met with in the Journals; but no Protests are entered against them. This bill was afterwards new-modelled by the Commons, and it passed both houses Dec. 24th, the bps. of London, Durham, Ely, Hereford, and Chichester, then only dissenting. The purport of it was, that by this act divers colleges, chauntries, free chapels, fraternities, guilds, &c. with all their lands and goods, were put into the actual possession of the king. Part of these goods and lands being sold at a low value, enriched many and enobled some; and thereby, as sir John Hayward observes, made them firm in maintaining the change.

Dec. 16th, another bill was introduced for repealing of certain statutes for Treason and Felony. This bill being a matter of great concern to every subject, a committee was appointed, consisting of the abp. of Canterbury, the lord. chanc. the lord chamberlain, the marq. of Dorset, the earls of Shrewsbury and Southampton, the bps. of Ely, Lincoln, and Worcester, the lords Cobham, Clinton, and Wentworth, with certain of the king's learned council; all which noblemen, &c. were appointed to meet a committee of the commons at 2 o'clock, after dinner, in order to treat and commune on the purport of the said bill.—The Commons had formed another bill for repealing these statutes, which upon some conferences they were willing to drop; only some provisos were added to the other, from which the bps. of London, Durham, Ely, Hereford, and Chichester, again dissented.—The repeal of all these statutes opened the door wide for liberty of conscience all over England; and dr. Heylin observes, "all men were now set at liberty to read the Scriptures, and expound them as they pleased; of entertaining what opinion in religion best agreed with their fancies, and promulgating those opinions which they entertained." But this is a mistake, for still the law for burning of heretics subsisted; of which kind of executions there were several instances in this reign.

Dec. 24, all the bills concluded at this session being ready for the royal assent, they were passed; after which the ld. chanc. prorogued the parl. to the 20th of April next ensuing. In the table at the end of the proceedings of this session, in the Lord's Journals, are the Titles of 21 statutes then enacted; in the Statute Books are 15. But the supernumerary acts are only on private affairs.

April 20, 1548, this parl. met again; when the ld. chanc. declared to them, that for certain causes, particularly the war which then raged betwixt England and Scotland, by which several members could not without great danger attend, it was the king's pleasure that this parl. should be again prorogued from that day to the 15th of Oct.; and the king's letters patents, appointing such a prorogation were read accordingly. And, on the said 15th of Oct. other letters patents were read, importing, that by reason of the Plague, then reigning in the cities of London, Westminster, and the suburbs thereof, the parl. was further prorogued to the 24th of Nov. At which time, they being again assembled, proceeded to business; but nothing of any consequence was transacted till the 21st of Dec. on which day the ld. chanc. adjourned the house to Jan. the 2d, 1549, when it again met.

Jan. 14, in the Commons the privilege of the house was granted to John Keysar; servant to sir Ralph Vane.

Act for Uniformity in Religion.] Jan. 15, the bill for an Uniformity of Service and Administration of Sacraments to be had throughout the realm, was passed in the Lords. The preamble of the act sets forth, "That there had been several forms of service, and that of late there had been great difference in the administration of the sacraments, and other parts of divine worship: and that the most effectual endeavours could not stop the inclinations of many to depart from the former customs; which the king had not punished, believing they flowed from a good zeal. But that there might be an uniform way over all the kingdom, the king, by the advice of the lord protector and his council, had appointed the abp. of Canterbury, with other learned and discreet bps. and divines, to draw up an order of divine worship, having respect to the pure religion of Christ taught in the scripture, and to the practise of the primitive church, which they, by the aid of the holy ghost, had with one uniform agreement concluded on; wherefore the parl. having considered the book, and the things that were altered or retained in it, they gave their most humble thanks to the king for his care about it; and did pray that all who had formerly offended in these matters, except such as were in the tower of London, or the prison of the Fleet, should be pardoned: and did enact, that from the feast of Whit-Sunday next, all divine offices should be performed according to it; and that such of the clergy as should refuse to do it, or continue to officiate in any other manner, should upon the 1st conviction be imprisoned 6 months, and forfeit a year's profit of their benefice: for the 2d offence forfeit all their church preferments, and suffer a year's imprisonment: and for the 3d offence should be imprisoned during life. And all that should write, or put out things in print against it, or threaten any clergymen for using it, were to be fined 10l. for the 1st offence; 20l. for the 2d; and to forfeit all their goods, and be imprisoned for life, upon a 3d offence. Only at the universities they might use it in Latin and Greek, excepting the office of the communion. It was also lawful to use other psalms or prayers taken out of the bible, so these in the book were not omitted." This act was variously censured by those who disliked it. Some thought it too much that it was said the book was drawn 'by the aid of the holy ghost.' But others said this was not to be so understood, as if they had been inspired by extraordinary assistance, for then there had been no room for any correction of what was now done; and therefore it was only to be understood in that sense, as all good motions and consultations are directed or assisted by the secret influences of God's holy spirit; which do oft help good men, even in their imperfect actions, where the good that is done is justly ascribed to the grace of God. Others censured it, because it was said to be done by uniform agreement, though 4 of the bps. were employed in the drawing of it, protested against it, viz. the bps. of Norwich, Hereford, Chichester and Westminster; but these had agreed in the main parts of the work, though in some few particulars they were not satisfied, which made them dissent from the whole.

One thing must not be omitted; that whilst this bill was debating in the commons, one Storey, a member, spoke so sharply against it, and was so free of his reflections on the king and the protector, that he was put into the serjeant's hands, and sent to the tower. The words he spoke from were these, 'Woe unto thee, Oh England! when thy king is a child.' An impeachment was actually drawn up against him for it; but, upon his humble submission, the house ordered the privy counselors to acquaint the protector, that it was their resolution he should be discharged, and they desired the king would forgive his offence against him and the council.

Act for allowing Priests to marry.] Feb. 19th, a bill for the Marriage of Priests passed both houses. The preamble of this act declares, "That it were better for priests and the ministers of the church to live chaste and without marriage, whereby they might better attend to the ministry of the gospel, and be less distracted with secular cares; so that it were much to be wished, that they would of themselves abstain. But great filthiness of living, with other inconveniencies, had followed on the laws that compelled chastity, and prohibited marriage; so that it was better they should be suffered to marry than be so restrained: therefore all laws and canons that had been made against it, being only made by human authority, are repealed. So that all spiritual persons, of what degree soever, might lawfully marry, provided they married according to the order of the church. But a proviso was added, that because many divorces of priests had been made after the six articles were enacted, and that the women might have thereupon married again, all these divorces, with every thing that had followed on them, should be confirmed." Bp. Burnet observes, that there was no law that passed in this reign more contradicted and censured than this.

An Act for better supporting the Parochial Clergy.] Two other acts passed this session, which dr. Heylin says were exceeding necessary for the preservation of the church's patrimony, then near dissipated. "The first (says he) was made for the encouragement and support of the Parochial Clergy, in the true payment of their tithes, lately invaded by their patrons, and otherwise in danger to be lost for ever, by the avariciousness of the parishioners, as before was said." For remedy whereof, it was enacted, "That no person or persons should from thenceforth take or carry away any tithe or tithes, which had been received or paid within 40 years next before the date thereof, or of right ought to have been paid, in the place or places tithable in the same, before he hath justly divided or set forth the tithe thereof, the 10th part of the same, or otherwise agree for the same tithes, with the parson, vicar, or other owner, proprietor, or farmer of the same, under the pain or forfeiture of the treble value of the tithes so taken or carried away." To which a clause was also added, enabling the said parsons, vicars, &c. to enter upon any man's land for the due setting of his tithes, and carrying away the same without molestation; with other clauses no less beneficial to the injured clergy. And because the revenue of the clergy had been much diminished by the loss of such offerings and oblations, as had been accustomedly made at the shrines of certain images now either defaced or removed, it was thought meet to make them some amends in another way: and thereupon it was enacted, "that every person exercising merchandises, bargaining, and selling, cloathing, handicraft, and other art and faculty, being such kind of persons, and in such places as heretofore, within the space of 40 years then before passed, have accustomedly used to pay such personal tithes, or of right ought to pay, (other than such as the common day-labourers) shall yearly, at or before the feast of Easter, pay for his personal tithes the 10th of his clear gains; his charges and expences, according to his estate and condition or degree, to be there allowed, abated, and deducted; with a proviso for some remedy to be had therein before the ordinary, in the case of tergiversation or refusal." But the power of the bps. and other ordinaries, growing less and less, and little or no execution following in that behalf, this last clause proved of little benefit to those whom it most concerned; who, living for the most part in market towns, and having no predial tithes to trust to, are thereby in a far worse condition than the rural clergy."

Attainder of Tho. lord Seymour.] Feb. 25th a bill was brought in to the lords for the Attainder of sir Tho. Seymour, knt. lord Seymour of Sudley, lord high admiral of England, own uncle to the king, and brother to the Lord Protector. It was read a 2nd and 3rd time, on the next day, and the day following: but, before it passed the Lords, "it was thought good," says the Journal, "to send down certain ministers of the upper house, to declare unto the members of the nether house, the manner after which the lords had proceeded in this matter; and to declare unto them also, that if they minded to proceed in like sort, certain noblemen, who had given evidence against the said admiral, should be sent unto them, to declare, by mouth and presence, such matter as by their writing should in the mean time appear before them." After which follows this mem. "that it appears by the Journal Book, as well this day, as at every several reading of the bill for the Attainder of the lord Tho. Seymour, lord admiral, that the Lord Protector, his brother, was present."

March 2nd, another article is entered on the Journal, relating to the aforesaid bill, in these words: "this day were sent down the master of the rolls, sir Jas. Hales, and serj. Mollineux, with like commission, in effect, as was sent down the Wednesday before. Answer was made, that they would consult together, and thereupon they would with speed send up their resolution; but no haste having been made therein by them of the nether house, and the lords having sat so long, as they thought the time very far spent, they concluded to depart; desiring the Lord Protector that it would please him to receive such answer as should be sent, touching this matter, from the nether house, and to make report thereof at the next assembly, which should be on Monday next." But though we find that the protector was present on that day, yet no message from the commons is entered; and we are only told, that on March 5th, the bill for the Attainder of the Lord Admiral was sent up, amongst others, as passed by that house.

But by the Journals of the Commons it appears, that this bill was read there the last day of Feb. for the 1st time; again on March 1st; and that March 2nd, the master of the rolls, serj. Mollineux, serj. Hales, and the king's solicitor, were sent from the lords, to know the pleasure of the house, if it should be resolved there to pass upon the Attainder of the Admiral in such order as was passed in the higher house. Hereupon it was ordered, that advertisement thereof should be sent to the Lords by some of that house. Then it was resolved, that the evidence should be heard orderly, as it was before the Lords. And also to require, that the Lords who affirmed that evidence might come hither and declare it 'viva voce.' And this to be delivered to the Lord Protector, by Mr. Speaker, and other the king's privy council, in that house.

March 4th, the master of the rolls, &c. declared the king's pleasure to be, that the admiral's presence was not necessary in this court, and therefore he need not be there: and further declared, that if the house required to have the Lords to come, and to satisfy them for the evidence against the admiral, the Lords would come. Then it was ordered, that Mr. Comptroller, and others of the king's privy council, should hear the Lords, and require, that if it were judged necessary to have the Lords come, that upon any further suit they might come down to their house. The same day the bill for the attainder of sir Tho. Seymour, lord Seymour, was read a 3rd time and passed.

It appears by the Journals, that the duke of Somerset, as Protector, sat in the house of Lords every day, whilst the bill of attainder against his own brother was depending; and no doubt voted in this case of blood. From whence we may infer, that the prosecution was but too pleasing to him: since he might have been well excused from such an attendance on the fate of so near a relation, as well as signing a warrant for his execution. On the 20th of March the Admiral was beheaded; but it was amply returned upon the Protector in a short space after; and, as Grafton observes, "the fall of one brother proved the overthrow of the other."

A Subsidy.] March 12th, a bill was passed for granting a Subsidy from the Temporality to the king's maj. This, as the act expresses it, was a relief out of sheep, cloths, goods, and debts, &c. to be paid in 3 years. The Clergy granted 6d. in the pound, to be paid also in 3 years. In the preamble to their bill they acknowledged the great quietness they enjoyed under the king, having no let nor impediment in the service of God. But the laity set out their Subsidy with a much fuller preamble "of the great happiness they had by the true religion of Christ; declaring that they were ready to forsake all things rather than Christ; as also to assist the king in the conquest of Scotland, which they call a part of his dominion; therefore they gave 1s. in the pound on all mens' personal estates, to be paid in 3 years."

March 14th, the king being present in the house, all the great officers of state, 2 marquisses, 8 earls, 17 bps. and 17 barons, the bills all obtained the royal assent. After which, his maj. in person, prorogued this parl. again to the 4th of Nov. next ensuing. There are the titles of no less than 60 acts passed this session in the Lords' Journals; in the printed book of Statutes only 39. For the titles of the public acts passed in this session, we refer the reader to the list at the end of this reign.

Act against eating Flesh in Lent, &c.] We must not omit making mention of an act which was passed this session, against eating Flesh in Lent. In the preamble of which it is said, "that though it is clear, by the word of God, that there is no day, nor kind of meat, purer than another, but that all are in themselves alike; yet many, out of sensuality, had contemned such abstinence, as had been formerly used; and since abstinence was a means to virtue, and to subdue men's bodies to their soul and spirit, and was also necessary to encourage the trade of fishing, and for saving of flesh; therefore all former laws about fasting and abstinence were to be, after the 1st of May, repealed; and it was enacted, that from the 1st of May, none should eat flesh on Fridays, Saturdays, ember days, in Lent, or any other days that should be declared fish-days, under several penalties. A proviso was added, for excepting such as should obtain the king's licence, or were sick and weak; and that none should be indicted but within 3 months after the offence."

And lastly, we shall conclude our account of the proceedings of this session, in the words of another ecclesiastical writer (a), though it is on a quite different affair, but perhaps more conducive to the public good than any of the former.

Bills for Relief of the Poor.] "There was one thing," says Strype, "debated in this parl. which may deserve to be here related. For the pacifying of the people, and making the condition of the Poor easier against grasiers and gentlemen, who enclosed commons, and neglected tillage, John Hales, (that had been lately in a commission to enquire into inclosures, and then saw and pitied the oppression of the poor country-people) devised 3 bills to be put into parl.; unto which he first made many wise men privy. The one was for the re-edifying of houses decayed, and for the maintenance of tillage and husbandry. The other, against regrating of victuals and other things, wherein one principal point was, that neither grasiers, nor none else, should buy any cattle, and sell the same again within a certain time. For as the said Hales had learned, and knew of certainty, divers grasiers and sheepmasters brought both cattle and money to the market, and if they could not sell their own as dear as they listed, they carried them home again, and bought all the rest. These 2 bills were first put to the lords. The first being read was not liked. The 2nd they allowed and augmented, and sent down to the Lower House; where it was so debated and tossed up and down, and at last committed to such men, and there so much deferred, that men's affections might there have been notably discovered. And perhaps, (said Hales, relating this matter in a writing of his) he that had seen all this would have said, "That the lamb had been committed to the wolfe's custody." The 3rd bill was set forth first in the lower house, and tended to this end, That every man that kept, in several pastures, sheep or beasts, should keep, for every 100 sheep that he had above six score, two kine; and for every of these two kine, should rear one calf. And for every two kine that he kept beside, more than ten, he should rear one calf. By this means he thought and believed, that the nation should not only have plenty of beasts, whereof there was wonderful great decay, but also thereby the markets should be replenished with milk, butter and cheese, the common and principal sustenance of the poor. The said Hales had such an opinion of this bill, that he durst have laid his life on it, that if it had proceeded, there would have been, within 5 years after the execution thereof, such plenty of victuals, and so good and cheap, as never was in England; and besides, a great many good things ensue, very necessary and profitable for the commonwealth of the country. Which neither by the execution of the late commission, nor yet by any positive law, then in being, could be holden. But, says Hales, Demetrius and his fellows soon spied whereunto this thing tended. There was then "hold with me, and I will hold with thee." Some alledged the opinion of their fathers in time past (but these had been great sheep-masters) who when the like bill had been propounded, would never consent unto it, but said that when any scarcity of cattle was, a proclamation was made that no calves should be killed for a time. Some alledged, that men then eat more flesh than they did in time past; and that in Lent and other fasting days heretofore, the people eat neither butter, milk, nor cheese, and would have them do so again for policy sake. And thus these rich inclosers got the better of these good bills intended for the benefit of the poor."

Act relating to Riots, &c.] Nov. 4th, the parl. met again. The first thing we find that the Lords went upon, was to bring in a bill against the spreading of false and vain Prophecies against the king or his council; since by such means the people were disposed to sedition. For the first offence, it was to be punished by a year's imprisonment, and 10l. fine; for the next, it was imprisonment during life, with the forfeiture of goods and chattels. Also another against the Rising of the common People into unlawful assemblies; by which much mischief had been done lately in the kingdom. By this it was enacted, that if any to the number of 12 should meet together unlawfully, for any matter of state, and continue for the space of an hour, and, being required by any lawful magistrate, should not disperse themselves, it should be treason. It was made felony also to gather the people together without warrant, by ringing of bells, sound of drum or trumpet, or firing of beacons. And if any broke hedges, or violently pulled up pales, about inclosures, without lawful authority, it should be felony. All these laws were made on account of the tumults during the last year, which spread into almost every county of England.

Bill for enforcing the Ecclesiastical Laws, &c.] Nov. 14th, all the bishops joined in a complaint to the lords, "that they were much despised by the common people; that vice and disorder much abounded; and that they durst not punish any sin, by reason that some late proclamations had almost totally deprived them of any jurisdiction; so that they could not oblige any person to appear before them, or observe the orders of the church." This complaint was heard, not without much concern by the rest of the lords; and that they might put a speedy stop to this evil, the prelates were desired to draw some form of a statute for that purpose.—On the 18th, a bill was brought into the house, and read once, but rejected; because by it the bps. seemed to arrogate too much power to themselves; therefore it was thought advisable to appoint some prudent persons, of each order, after mature deliberation on the point, to draw up a 2nd bill. And the abp. of Canterbury, the marq. of Dorset, the bps. of Durham, Ely, Litchfield and Coventry; the lords Wharton and Stafford, to whom were joined the lord Monteagle, lord chief justice of the common-pleas, the lord chief baron, the king's attorney and solicitor-general were appointed a committee for that purpose. But, to make short of this business, though the lords passed a second bill for the due Execution of Ecclesiastical Laws, one clause of which was, That no person should be employed in them who had not been a student for some years in an university; yet it was laid aside by the Commons, after a 2nd reading in that house. "They thought it better," says bp. Burnet, "to renew the design that was in the former reign, of 32 persons being authorised to compile a body of Ecclesiastical Laws; and these, being nothing contrary to the common and statute laws of the land, should be published by the king's warrant, under the great seal, and have the force of laws in the ecclesiastical courts." The effect which this ordinance had, will appear in the sequel.

Proceedings against the D. of Somerset.] This parl. sat every day during the Christmas holidays, except on the Great Festival; from which thing, we may imagine some matter of moment was in agitation. Accordingly, on the 2d of Jan. 1550, the Journal informs us, that the grand affair of the duke of Somerset came before them; introduced in this manner: "That as the said duke, for divers great crimes, committed against the king and kingdom, had, on the 14th of Oct. last, been thrown into prison; this day a bill was read in the house, in which were contained 29 Articles against him; all and singular of which the said duke had signed with his own hand; and had humbly cast himself upon his maj.'s judgment and will. Which voluntary confession, confirmed by his subscribing it, they all made no doubt of; nevertheless, considering how easily precipitate judgments may be drawn into precedents, they thought proper, from their body, to send 2 earls, 2 barons, and 4 bps. to learn from his own mouth, whether the said duke signed the said Articles voluntarily, or by compulsion. And the earls of Westmorland and Bath, the bps. of Litchfield, Hereford, Worcester and Westminster, the barons Cobham and Morley, were named for that purpose." On the next day, the said lords commissioners informed the whole house, that they had been with the said duke, and that he had acknowledged to them the signing of the said Articles, and confessed all the crimes and errors contained in them. And, besides, he returned his most hearty thanks to the house, for their great humanity in sending such an honourable embassy to him. Bp. Burnet writes, from the Council-Book, that the duke had made his confession, on his knees, before the king and council, and signed it on the 13th of Dec. last. He protested that his offence had flowed from rashness and indiscretion, rather than malice, and that he had no reasonable design against the king or his realms. So he was fined, by act of parl. in 2000l. a year in land; and the forfeit of all his goods and offices, which were earl marshal, lord treasurer, and lord protector. But his carriage after this appeared so meek and humble, that the king was prevailed upon to pardon him for that time. And, some time after, to make him, again, one of his privy council.

Sons of Peers.] We must not omit one circumstance relating to the rules of the house of commons, mentioned in their Journal. It seems that before this time the eldest sons of peers were not allowed to be members of that house; and that sir Francis Russel, being, by the death of his elder brother, heir apparent to the lord Russel, it was, upon the 21st of Jan. carried upon a debate, "That he should still abide in the house as he was before."

Feb. 1, the king came to the house, and, after giving the royal assent to the bills, prorogued the parl. to the 21st of April next following. The Journals of the Lords give us the titles of 31 Acts that were passed this session; the Statute-Books only 24.

Act for defacing Images.] An act was passed in this session, by which it was declared, That all books used in churches, such as Antiphonales, Missals, Grayles, Processionals, Manuals, Legends, Pies, Portuasses, Journals, Couchers and Ordinals, after the use of Sarum, Lincoln, York, or any other private use, should be destroyed: and all those who had any image, that did belong to any church or chapel, were required to deface it before the last day of June. And, in all primers, in Latin or English, set out by the late king, the prayers to the saints were to be obliterated. By virtue of this act, visitors were appointed to visit the churches in London; and all the Images, at st. Paul's and the other churches in the city, were taken down and broke in pieces; which example was afterwards followed through all the other churches in England. By which a great many beautiful out-side fronts, in our cathedrals, &c. were much deformed; the pedestals and niches ever since left bare and naked, the images being almost all destroyed at this time. But there was a proviso, in this act, That Images upon the tombs of any king, prince, nobleman, or other dead person, not reputed a saint, might still remain.

From the 21st of April, this parl. was again prorogued, to the 10th of Oct. next ensuing. And from that day another prorogation took place to the 20th of Jan. 1551; from which time it suffered one more prorogation to the 2d of March, but did not meet to transact business, till the 23d of Jan. 1552.

A new Book of Common Prayer authorized by Parl.] Jan. 23, a bill was brought into the Lords for the appointing of an Order to come to Divine Service; which was agreed to on the 26th, and sent down to the commons. Here it laid a long time, for it was not till the 6th of April that we hear of it again; when we find it tacked to another bill by the commons, called, 'An act for the uniformity of service and administration of sacraments throughout the realm.' Which was to authorise a new Common Prayer-book, according to some rules agreed on last year. This the Commons joined to the former, and so put both into one act: by this it was first set forth, "That an Order of Divine Service being published, many did wilfully abstain from it, and refused to come to their parish churches; therefore all are required, after the feast of Allhallows next, to come every Sunday and holiday to common-prayers under pain of the church's censure. And the king, the lords temporal, and the commons, did, in God's name, require all abps. bps. and their ordinaries, to endeavour the due execution of that act, as they would answer before God for such evils and plagues, with which he might justly punish them, for neglecting this good and wholesome law; and they were fully authorised to execute the censures of the church on all that should offend against this act." To which is added, "That there had been divers doubts about the manner of the ministration of the service, rather by the curiosity of the ministers and mistakers, than of any other cause; and that for the better explanation of it, and for the greater perfection of the service, in some places where it was fit to make the prayer and fashion of service more quick and earnest, to stir up christian people to the true honouring of Almighty God; therefore it had been by command of the king and parl. perused, explained, and made more perfect." There was also, annexed to it, the form of making bps. priests and deacons; and so this new book of service was appointed to be every where received, after the feast of All Saints next, under the same penalties that had been enacted 3 years before, when the former book was issued.

Bill for the Marriage of the Clergy.] Feb. 6, a bill for the Marriage of the Clergy was brought in to the lords, and passed on the 10th. By it was set forth, "That many took occasion, from the words in the act formerly made about this matter, to say, that it was only permitted, as usury and other unlawful things were, for the avoiding greater evils; who thereupon spoke slanderously of such Marriages, and accounted the children, begotten of them, to be bastards; to the high dishonour of the king and parl. and the learned clergy of the realm; who had determined, that the laws against priests Marriages were most unlawful by the law of God; to which they had not only given their assent, in convocation, but signed it with their own hands. These slanders did also occasion that the word of God was not heard with due reverence; whereupon it was enacted, That such Marriages, made according to the rules prescribed in the book of service, should be esteemed good and valid; and that the children, begot in them, should be inheritable according to law."

Act relating to High Treason.] Feb. 16, an act for the punishment of divers kinds of Treasons was brought into the lords, and passed on the 20th. But, when it was sent down to the commons, it occasioned a long debate, and many sharp things was said of those who now bore the sway. It was urged, that at the beginning of this reign the ministry then put in a bill for lessening the number of such offences; but now they saw, by the change of councils, more severe laws were proposed. At last the commons rejected the bill, but drew up a new one, which passed into a law. By it was enacted, "That if any should call the king, or any of his heirs, named in the statute of the 35th of the last reign, heretic, schismatic, tyrant, infidel, or usurper of the crown; for the 1st offence, they should forfeit their goods and chattles, and be imprisoned during pleasure; for the 2nd, should be in a præmunire; for the 3rd should be attainted of treason. But, if any should unadvisedly set it out in writing, printing, painting, carving, or graving, he was, for the 1st offence, to be held as a traitor. Likewise, that those who should keep any of the king's castles, artillery, or ships, 6 days after they were lawfully required, to give them up, should be guilty of Treason. That men might be proceeded against for Treasons committed out of the kingdom as well as in it. They also added a proviso, that none should be attainted of Treason on this act, unless two witnesses should come, and to their face aver the fact, for which they were to be tried; except such as, without any violence, should confess it; and that none should be questioned for any thing, said or written, but within three months after it was done."

Feb. 22. In the Commons it was ordered, That if any burgess require Privilege for him or his servant, he shall, upon declaration, have a warrant, signed by Mr. Speaker, to obtain the Writ.—And, for that, Wm. Ward, burgess of Lancaster, obtained a writ of Privilege out of the chancery, without a warrant from this house; it is committed to Mr. Mason, and others, to examine the matter and certify.

Act for Observance of Holy Days.] March 3rd, a bill was brought into the Lords for the Observation of Holy Days and Fasting Days. It was sent down to the commons on the 15th, by whom it was passed. In the preamble to this bill it was set forth, "That men are not at all times so set on the performance of religious duties as they ought to be; which made it necessary that there should be set times, in which labour was to cease, that men might on these days wholly serve God. Which days were not to be accounted holy of their own nature, but were so called because of the holy duties then to be set about; so that the sanctification of them, was not any magical virtue in that time, but consisted in the dedicating them to God's service. That no day was dedicated to any saint, but only to God in remembrance of such saints. That the scripture had not determined the number of holy days, but that these were left to the liberty of the church. Therefore it was enacted, that all Sundays, with the days marked in the Calendar and Liturgy, should be kept as holy days; and the bishops were to proceed by the censures of the church against the disobedient." A proviso was added, for the observation of St. George's feast by the knights of the garter; and another, that labourers and fishermen might, if need so required, work on those days either in or out of harvest. The eves before holy days were to be kept as fasts; and in Lent, and on Fridays and Saturdays, abstinence from flesh was enacted. But, if a holy day was to fall on a Monday, the eve for it was to be kept on Saturday, since Sunday was never to be a fast.

Act for Relief of the Poor.] March 5th, a bill was read in the Lords, for the 1st time, for Taxes and Assessments for relief of poor and impotent persons, and committed. The bill bears this title in the Lords' Journal, and it passed the house in that form. But this gave occasion to some members in the commons, when the bill came before them, to take notice, that it was designed to lay a tax on the subject; which was a jealousy not easy to get over in those days. So that when the act passed it had only this title, "an act for the Provision and Relief of the Poor;" by which the churchwardens were empowered to gather charitable contributions for the poor; and if any did refuse to contribute, or did dissuade others from it, the bishop of the diocese was to proceed against them.

Act relating to Usury.] Another bill was brought in against usury, which passed both houses, and was made a statute. By it, an act passed in the 37th of the late king, "that none might take above 20 per cent. on money lent," was repealed; which they said was not intended for the allowing of Usury, but for preventing farther inconveniences. And since Usury was by the word of God forbidden, and set out in divers places of scripture as a most odious and detestable vice, which yet many continue to practise, for the filthy gain they make by it; therefore, from the 1st of May, all usury or gain from money lent was to cease; and whosoever continued to practise to the contrary, was to forfeit both principal and interest, to suffer imprisonment, and to be fined at the king's pleasure." This severe act has been since repealed.

Privilege of Parl.] March 18th it was ordered, "that Hugh Fludde, servant to sir A. Wyngfylde, shall have privilege." On the 26th a supplication was exhibited, by John Gurdon, Frenchman, to undo the Privilege granted to Hugh Fludde. On the 28th it was ordered, "that a procedendo shall be directed to set Hugh Fludde without the privilege of this house, as he was before, and the serjeant to deliver him prisoner to the sheriffs of London." On the next day, "where the serjeant delivered H. Fludde to a serjeant of London, he made an assault upon that serjeant, and escaped out of his ward; whereof, by credible report made to this house, it is ordered, that the serjeant shall require mr. comptroller to send to this house to-morrow, by 8 o'clock, H. Fludde and — Creketoste, to know the further pleasure of the house. On the 30th mr. comptroller did send Fludde and Creketoste to the house; whereupon was declared by the sheriff's serjeant, the misdemeanor and escape of Fludde, by the means of Creketoste; whereupon it is ordered, that Fludde and Creketoste shall be sent prisoners to the gatehouse till to-morrow. On the morrow, the 31st, it was ordered that H. Fludde shall be remitted to the counter of London, in such case as he was before the privilege granted by this house unto him; and if Fludde shall agree with Gurdon, that notwithstanding to abide the order of this house if it be fitting; and if not, then to abide the order of the king's council, for the punishment of this misdemeanor, when it shall be ordered. For Creketoste, it is ordered, that he should remain in ward, where he was, and to bring him hither to-morrow, at 10 o'clock; and it is ordered, that two members shall make report to mr. comptroller of the misdemeanor of Fludde and Creketoste. On the next day it is ordered, that Creketoste shall be sent prisoner to the Tower, by the serjeant of this house. April 5th, he is ordered to be discharged of the imprisonment, paying his fees. April 15th, the day of the dissolution of the parl. it is ordered, that H. Fludde, prisoner in the counter, shall so remain, until he have satisfied or agreed with Gurdon; and that then the said Fludde shall be delivered to the serjeant of this house, and discharged of his imprisonment there, notwithstanding any other action being brought against him in London, sithence his first arrest for this matter.

Duke of Somerset attainted and beheaded.] April 12th, the Journal informs us, a bill was read in the lords a 3rd time, "for the limitation of the late duke of Somerset's lands; and also one other bill, confirming the attainder of the said duke, sir Tho. Arundele, sir Michael Stanhope, sir Ralph Fane, and sir Miles Partridge. Which being 3 times read, and agreed unto by the Lords, were sent down to the lower house by serj. Brooke and the king's solicitor, with request that it might be annexed to the aforesaid act against the duke."—The duke of Somerset had again fallen into a trap, which his enemies had laid for him; but he did not escape so well in this, for it proved fatal to him. He was tried by his peers, on an indictment of high treason and felony; acquitted of the first, but found guilty of the felony; for which he was beheaded on Tower-hill. The statute on which this nobleman was condemned is mentioned before; but the main reason which made him a prey to the earl of Warwick, and the rest of his implacable enemies, was the loss of his brother: his own strength and capacity not being sufficient to stem the violence of the stream which then run against him. Bp. Burnet writes, "that the duke of Somerset's estate had been entailed, by act of parl. on his son, in the 23rd of the late reign; and that the bill for the repeal of the said act was sent down to the commons, March 3rd, and signed with the king's own hand. Whether the king was so alienated from his uncle, that this extraordinary thing was done by him for the utter ruin of his family or not, he cannot determine; but he rather thinks it was done in hatred to the duchess of Somerset and her issue. For the estate was entailed on them by that act of parl. in prejudice of the issue of the former marriage, of whom are descended the Seymours of Devonshire, who were disinherited and excluded from the duke of Somerset's honours by his patents, and from his estate by act of parl. partly upon some jealousies he had of his former wife, but chiefly by the power his second wife had over him." However, this bill of Repeal was much opposed in the commons, though sent to them in so unusual a way by the king himself. And though there was, on the 8th of March, a message sent from the lords, that they should make haste towards an end of the parl. yet still they stuck long upon it; looking upon the breaking of entails, made by act of parl. as a thing of such consequence, that it dissolved the greatest security which the law of England can give to property. It was long argued in the commons, and was 15 several days brought in. At last a new bill was devised, and that was much altered too; and it was not quite ended till the day before the parl. was dissolved. But near the end of the session, a proviso was sent by the Lords to be added to the bill, confirming the attainder of the duke and his accomplices. It seems his enemies would not try this at first, till they had by other means measured their strength in that house; and finding their interest grow there, they adventured on it; but they mistook their measures, for the commons would not agree to it; though, in conclusion, the bill of repeal was agreed to. But, whereas there had been some writings for a marriage between the earl of Oxford's daughter and the duke of Somerset's son, and a bill was put in for casting them; it was carried in the negative, on a division of the house, 69 against 68." The prelate here remarks, "that 137 members was a very thin house at that time; but this, he adds, was a natural effect of a long parl.; many of those who were first chosen being infirm, and others not willing to put themselves to the charge of so constant and long attendance." We have chose to copy bp. Burnet, in his account of these particulars; but either he or the Journals of the Lords must err in some of them. It appears evidently, by that authority, that there was no mention made of either of these bills against the duke, till the 11th of April, when the Limitation-Bill was sent up from the lower house; it was read a 1st and 2nd time that day, and a proviso added to it; and the day following it passed the Lords, and had there the bill of Attainder tacked to it, in the manner above recited.

The bill of Attainder not passing in the Lower House against the duke of Somerset; the proviso in the Treason-Act, mentioned before; and that house refusing to pass the bill against the bp. of Durham, unless he was confronted by witnesses before them, shewed plainly what sense the commons had of this duke's condemnation. It also gave the duke of Northumberland a perfect knowledge how little kindness they had for him; for this parl. being called by Somerset, his friends had been generally chosen to be in it; and it is no wonder, if upon this fall, they were not over complaisant to those who had destroyed him. In short, the minister made no motion for a supply this session, though the king's debts were then very great; and to gain one he found it necessary to call a new parl. Accordingly, on the 15th of April, the old one was dissolved, after sitting almost 5 years; and the minister made it his business, all that summer, to gain friends all over England, in order to have another parl. the next year more fit for his purpose.

A new Parl. called.] Towards the close of the year 1552, the king called a new parl. and great care was taken by the court to have it answer their expectations. Strype tells us, that "the king, as his years came on, began to set himself about business; and, as he intended to have this parl. composed of men endowed with good and great abilities, to consult with him on the pressing affairs and difficulties of his kingdom, he caused letters to be written to every sheriff in the realm, directing them whom to choose for that purpose." It is very probable, that the duke minister put this specious gloss upon it, in order to impose upon the king's natural goodness; but this way of proceeding, by influencing elections, is by no means justifiable by the ancient custom and usage of the realm. The letter itself, which the aforesaid author has given us, is a sufficient testimony of this. It is as follows:

"Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Forasmuch as we have, for diverse good considerations, caused a summonition for a parl. to be made, as we doubt not but yee understand the same by our writs sent in that behalf unto you; we have thought it meet for the furtherance of such causes, as are to be propounded to the said parl. for the common weal of our realm, that in the election of such persons as shall be sent to the parl. either from our counties, as knights thereof, or from our cities and boroughs, there be good regard had, that the choice be made of men of gravity and knowledge in their own countries and towns, fit for their understandings and qualities, to be of such a great council. And therefore, since some part of the proceeding herein shall rest in you, by virtue of your office, we do, for the great desire we have that this our parl. may be assembled with personages out of every country, of wisdom and experience, at this present, will and command you that ye shall give notice, as well to the freeholders of your county, as to the citizens and burgesses of any city or borough, which shall have any of our writs by your direction, for the election of citizens and burgesses, that our pleasure and commandment is, that they shall chuse and appoint, (as nigh as they possibly may) men of knowledge and experience, within the counties, cities and boroughs; so, as by the assembly of such, we may by God's goodness provide (thorough the advice and knowledge of the said parl.) for the redress of the lacks in our commonweal, more effectually than heretofore hath been. And yet, nevertheless, our pleasure is, that where our Privy Council or any of them within their jurisdictions, in our behalf, shall recommend men of learning and wisdom; in such case their directions be regarded and followed, as tending to the same which we desire, that is, to have this assembly to be of the most chiefest men in our realm, for advice and good council."

After this followed several letters, from the king himself, recommending particular persons to the high sheriffs to be elected knights. The writs for calling this parl. and these letters were sent out in Jan. 1553, and it was ordered to meet the 1st of March following. John Stowe gives us the ceremonials at the opening, in this manner. "The 1st of March began a parl. at Westminster; and all the lords spiritual and temporal, assembled that daie in the Whitehall, in their robes, where a sermon was preached in the king's chapel, by dr. Ridley bp. of London, and his maj. with diverse lords received the communion. Which being done, the king, with the lords in order, went into the king's great chamber, on the king's side, which that day was prepared for the lorde's house, the king sitting under his cloth of estate, and all the lords in their degrees; the bp. of Ely, dr. Godricke, ld. chanc. made a proposition for the king, which being ended the lords departed. This was done because the king was sickly."—But the reason why this parl. sat at Whitehall was, because the king was so far gone in a consumption that he was not able to go Westminster. The next day, the same author tells us, that James Dyer, or Diar, esq. was chosen Speaker of the commons. And now the Lords Journal informs us, that the first thing of note that they went upon, was to bring in a bill, for the better answering the revenues of the crown, that all treasurers and other persons, having the receipt of any of the king's money, shall be yearly accountable, and put in sureties for the same. This bill occasioned some debate, and on the 3d reading, the earl of Pembroke, the lords Morley, Borough, Bray, Wentworth, Russel, and Rich, protested against it. And when it was sent down to the Commons they wholly rejected it; but sent back a new bill to the same purpose which passed into a statute. Two other bills also, in relation to the state of the Coinage, were introduced; the 1st was, that it should be felony to give for any of the current coin of the kingdom above what was appointed by the king's proclamation. The other, against the exportation of Gold and Silver out of the realm. The 1st was rejected, but the last passed into a law; which was no more than reviving a statute made the 17th Edw. 4, for the same purpose; and was to continue for 20 years.

A Subsidy.] March 13. A bill for a subsidy and two 15th's and 10ths, by the temporality, was sent up by the commons, and passed by the Lords on the 17th; it was granted for two years. This bill occasioned great debates in the lower-house. The preamble to it was a long accusation of the duke of Somerset, "For involving the king in wars, wasting his treasures, engaging him in much debt, embasing the coin, and having given occasion for a most terrible rebellion. In fine, considering the great debt the king was left in by his father, the loss he put himself to in reforming the coin, and they finding his temper to be set wholly on the good of his subjects, and not on enriching himself; therefore they gave him two 10ths and two 15ths for two years." Whether the debate in the commons was upon this extraordinary demand of a supply, or on the preamble is uncertain. But, it is probable, that when the bill came to be engrossed it was on the latter; which the duke of Northumberland and his party, were the more eagerly set on, to let the king see how acceptable they were, and how hateful the duke of Somerset had been to the people. The clergy also, to shew their affection and duty, says Burnet, gave the king 6s. in the pound on all their benefices; which grant, according to custom, ever since the Reformation, was confirmed by parl.

Ecclesiastical Promotion.] March 21, a bill was sent down from the Lords, that none might hold any Spiritual or Ecclesiastical Promotion, unless he was either priest or deacon. The reason of it was, because many noblemen and gentlemen's sons had prebends given them, on this pretence, that they intended to fit themselves, by study, for holy orders; but these they kept, though their studies went no farther. The bps. had prevailed upon the lords to pass the bill; but, at the 3rd reading, it was cast out by the Commons; which shews what poor interest the clergy had then in that house when so reasonable a bill was rejected.

The Bishoprick of Durham suppressed.] The most extraordinary act, on Church Affairs, which passed this session, was that for the Suppression of the Bishoprick of Durham. The bill was brought into the lords on the 20th of March, and passed both houses soon after. The preamble sets forth, "That this bishoprick being then void of a prelate, the gift thereof was in the king's pleasure; and the compass of it being so large as to extend itself into several shires far distant, it could not be sufficiently served by one bp.; and since the king, by his godly disposition, was desirous to have God's holy word preached in those parts, which were wild and barbarous for lack of good preaching and good searching: therefore he intended to have two bishopricks for that diocese; the one at Durham, which should have 2000 marks yearly revenue, and another at Newcastle with 1000; and also to found a cathedral church at the latter place, with a deanry and chapter, out of the revenues of the said bishoprick. Therefore the bishoprick of Durham is utterly extinguished and dissolved, and authority is given for letters patents to erect the two new bishopricks together with a deanry and chapter at Newcastle; with a proviso that the rights of the deanry, chapter, and cathedral of Durham, should suffer nothing by this act."

In the Journals are the titles of 17 acts which passed this session; in the printed statutes are only 14. The titles of the Public Acts will be found at the end of this reign. On the 31st of March the king came to the house, and gave the ld. chanc. command to dissolve this parl. after it had sat only 1 month.—Thus ended the last parl. in this reign; for Edw. VI. soon after finished both that and his short life; dying of a deep consumption, July the 6th, 1553, in the 16th year of his age, and the 7th his reign.

In the first year of this reign tunnage and poundage was granted for the king's life; besides the revenues arising from suppression of chantries, &c.—In the next year he had a relief granted him out of sheep, cloths, goods, debts, &c. and 6s. in the pound from the clergy.—In his third year, so much as related to sheep and cloths were released: but the relief for goods continued. A subsidy was also granted him of 1s. in the pound on goods, and of every alien 2s.—In the 7th, and last year of his reign, he had a subsidy of two 10ths and two 15ths. The clergy also gave 6s. in the pound.

Price of Provisions in the Reign of Edward VI.

In 1550, a large house in Channon-row, Westminster, within the precincts of the court, was let to the comptroller of the king's household, at 30s. per ann.—In 1551, wheat, 8s. per qr.; malt, 5/1; malmsey, 4d. per qt.; oats, 8s.; straw, 5s. per load; coals, 12s. per ditto.—In 1552, barley, 5s. In this year the price of French wines, of Gascoygne and Guynne, were settled by parl. at 8d. per gallon; wines of Rochel, at 4d.; and no other wines of higher value to be sold for more than 12d.—In 1553, wheat, 8s. per qr.; malt, 5s.; Muscadel wine, 6d. per quart; Malmsey do. 5d.; red wine, 3d.

MARY.

On the 8th of Aug. 1553, writs were issued for a parl. to meet at Westminster, on the 5th of Oct. following. In the mean time, it was thought necessary that Mary should be crowned, which was done on the 1st of that month. And, in order to soften the minds of her subjects, and dispose them to a good opinion of her govt. the queen, by the advice of Gardiner, bp. of Winchester, not only put out a general Pardon, but published a proclamation to this effect:—"That whereas the good subjects of England had always exhibited aid to their princes, when the good of the public and honour of the realm required it; and the queen, since her coming to the crown, found the treasury was marvelously exhausted, by the evil govt. of late years, especially since the duke of Northumberland bore rule; though she found herself charged with divers great sums of her brother's debts, which for her own honour, and the honour of the realm, she determined to pay in times convenient and reasonable; yet, having a special regard to the welfare of her subjects, and accounting their loving hearts and prosperity the chiefest treasure which she desired, next to the favour and grace of God; therefore, since in her brother's last parl. two 10ths, two 15ths, and a subsidy, both out of lands and goods, were given to him for paying his debts, which were now due to her; she, of her great clemency, did fully pardon and discharge these subsidies; trusting that her said good subjects will have loving consideration thereof for their parts, whom she heartily requires to bend themselves wholly to God, to serve him sincerely, and with continual prayer, for the honour and advancement of the queen and the commonwealth."

At the time appointed, viz. Oct. 5th, the two houses met at Westminster. The following are the names of the

The parl. commenced with much formality; a solemn mass of the Holy Ghost being sung in Westminster church, according to the ancient custom. The Queen rode thither in her parliament-robes, all the bps. and lords in their scarlet robes attending, trumpets blowing before them. When she heard mass, two bps. waited on her, one whereof delivered her the chapter and other things. Afterwards they all went to the parl. house, the earl of Devonshire bearing the sword, and the earl of Westmoreland the cap of maintenance, before the queen.

The Journals of the lords in this parl. being lost, we must have recourse to the imperfect Journal of the Commons. It is to be observed, that the queen did not alter the style that her father and brother Edward had taken, in the writs for calling this parl. but the 'Supremum Caput Ecclesiæ Ang.' was in them as usual. The aforesaid Journal acquaints us, that John Pollard, esq. was elected Speaker; and that on the 2nd day of the session, one member moved for a review of the laws made by the late king Edward; which, after being argued a while, was for that time laid aside, and the bill for tonnage and poundage put in instead of it. After this a debate arose upon the case of one dr. Nowel, who being returned a member for Loo in Cornwall, and being also a prebendary of Westminster, whether he could sit in that house? A committee being appointed to search for precedents in this case, it was reported, that the doctor being represented in the convocation, could not be a member of that house; and upon this he was expelled. The bill for tonnage and poundage was sent up to the lords, who returned it to the commons, to be reformed in two provisoes that were not according to former precedents. "How far," says bp. Burnet, "this was contrary to the rights of the commons, who now say the lords cannot alter a money bill, I cannot determine."

Act for limiting of Treason and Felonies.]

The only public bill which passed in this short session was one for repealing certain Treasons, Felonies, and Premunires. By which it was ordained, that nothing should be judged treason but what was within the statute of treasons made in the 25th of Edw. III. and that nothing should be judged felony that was not so before the 1st of Henry VIII. excepting from any benefit of this act all such as had been in prison before the last of Sept. who were also excepted out of the queen's pardon at her coronation. To make the better way for this bill to pass, there were many members in both houses who shewed themselves exceeding hot against king Henry's laws, especially such of them as extended their penalties to death. Some of these zealous speakers were of the queen's privy council, and others were lawyers, who, by this their forwardness, were made soon after of her learned council. They inveighed against them as cruel and bloody laws. They termed them Draco's laws, which were written in blood. Some said they were more intolerable than any laws that Dionysius, or any other tyrant, ever made. "As many men," says Strype, "so many bitter names and invectives were bestowed on these laws. Insomuch, that one would have thought this reign would have been more tender of men's lives than any before it." But the consequence will shew it much otherwise. The preamble to this act declares, "that the queen calling to her remembrance that many hon. and noble persons, and others of good reputation, had lately, for words only, suffered shameful deaths, not accustomed to nobles, Therefore, of her clemency, and trusting her loving subjects were contented that such dangerous and painful laws should be abrogated; from henceforth no act, deed, or offence that had been by act of parl. made treason, &c. by words, writing, cyphering, deeds, or otherwise, should be taken, had, or deemed to be high treason, petty treason, &c. provided that nothing in this act should in any wise extend to give any manner of benefit, advantage, or commodity to any person or persons who were, on or before the last day of Sept. arrested or imprisoned for treason, or to any person heretofore indicted of treason, petty treason, &c. before the said last day of September. All these were to suffer such pains of death, losses, forfeitures of lands and goods, as the law, in such cases of treason, directed." By which act, says Strype, all those of king Edward's friends, lady Jane's well-wishers, or Protestant professors, who had been taken up and crouded into jails, could receive no benefit by this wonderful act of clemency. Bp. Burnet also observes, that this act of repeal was no more than what had passed in the beginning of the late king's reign, without the clog of such a severe proviso.

Two private bills were also passed in this session; the one, for the restitution, in blood, of the lady Gertrude Courtney, widow to Henry Courtney, late marq. of Exeter; who had been attainted in the 32nd of Henry VIII.; and the other for her son, sir Edw. Courtney, earl of Devonshire. After the queen had given her assent to those bills, the parl. was prorogued from the 21st to the 24th of October.

Act declaring the Queen's legitimacy.] When the parl. met again, the bill for tonnage and poundage was resumed in the commons, and passed in two days. The next was a bill concerning king Henry's marriage with the queen's mother, declaring the queen's highness, as the title expresses it, to be born in lawful wedlock. This bill was sent down by the lords, on the 26th, and the commons passed it, nem. con. on the 28th; so strangely, says Burnet, was the stream turned, that a divorce, which had been for 7 years much desired by the nation, was now repealed on fewer days consultation. The preamble to this act has these remarkable expressions; "That truth, how much soever obscured and born down, will, in the end, break out; and that therefore, they declared, that Henry VIII. being lawfully married to queen Catherine, by consent of both their parents, and the advice of the wisest men in the realm, and of the best and notablest men for learning in Christendom, did continue in that state 20 years, in which God blessed them with her maj. and other issue, and a course of great happiness; but then a very few malicious persons did endeavour to break that happy agreement between them, and studied to possess the king with a scruple in his conscience about it; and to support that did get the seals of some universities against it, a few persons being corrupted with money for that end. They had also, by sinistrous ways and secret threatnings, procured the seals of the universities of this kingdom, and finally Thos. Cranmer did most ungodlily and against law, judge the divorce, upon his own unadvised understanding of the scriptures, upon the testimonies of the universities, and some bare and most untrue conjectures; and that was afterwards confirmed by two acts of parl. in which was contained the illegitimacy of her maj.; but that marriage not being prohibited by the law of God, could not be so broken; since what God had joined together no man could put asunder. All which they considering, together with the many miseries that had fallen on the kingdom since that time, which they did esteem plagues sent from God for it; therefore they declare that sentence given by Cranmer to be unlawful, and of no force from the beginning, and do also repeal the acts of parl. confirming it."

All Acts in favour of the Reformation repealed.] The next bill that was sent by the lords to the commons was, for the repealing of king Edward's laws about religion. It was sent down, Oct. 31, and argued for 6 days in that house. In the end it was carried and passed into a law; it declared the great disorders that had arisen in the nation, by the changes that had been made in religion, from that which their forefathers had left them on the authority of the catholic church. Thereupon, all the laws that had been made in king Edward's time, concerning religion, were now repealed. And it was enacted, That from the 20th of Dec. next, there should be no other form of divine service but what had been used in the last year of Hen. VIII. "By which one blow," says Heylin, "was felled down all that had been done in the Reformation for seven years before. And no less than 9 acts of parl. all made for the establishment of the reformed religion, were utterly repealed."

Act relating to Riots.] Burnet observes, that the Commons were now so heated with zeal for the catholic cause, that they sent up another bill to the Lords, against those who came neither to church nor sacraments, after the old service should be again set up; punishments, in these cases, being left to the spiritual courts. But this fell in the house of lords; not so much, adds this author, out of any opposition that was made to it, but they were afraid of alarming the nation too much, by too many severe laws at once. Besides these laws, which were made in order to bridle the reformers in church-affairs, there was another introduced for the security of the public peace. This was another revival of a Riot Act, or against unlawful and rebellious assemblies. By which it was enacted, "That if any, to the number of 12 or above, should meet to alter any thing established by law, relating to religion; and being required by any, having the queen's authority, to disperse themselves, and should continue together, after that, one hour, it should be felony. If the same number met to break hedges or parks, to destroy deer, fish, &c. and did not disperse upon proclamation, it should be felony. If any, by ringing of bells, drums, or firing of beacons, gathered the people together, and did the things before-mentioned, it was felony. If the wives or servants of persons so gathered, carried money, meat, or weapons to them, it should be felony. And if any, above the number of two, and within twelve, should meet for these ends, they should suffer a year's imprisonment; empowering the sheriffs or justices to gather the country for the resistance of persons so offending, with penalties on all, between 18 and 60, that being required to come out against them, should refuse to do it. And this act is ordered to be read and published at every quarter-session, and at every leet and law-day."

The Duke of Norfolk's Attainder reversed.] The reader will remember that the very last act of state, done by Henry 8, was signing a bill for the Attainder of the duke of Norfolk, who was to have been executed, as his son the earl of Surrey had been, if death itself had not brought him a reprieve by taking king Henry before him. The duke was kept close prisoner in the Tower all the last reign; and, being a zealous catholic, Mary thought a person of his great rank and fortune would add a weight to her designs. But the bill for reversing this Attainder met with much opposition in the commons. The patentees, who had purchased some parts of the duke's estate from the crown, desired to be heard by their council against it. And the session of parl. being nearly at a close, the duke came down himself to the commons, Dec. 14, and earnestly desired them to pass his bill; declaring, that the difference between him and the patentees was referred to arbitration; and, if they could not agree, he would refer it to the queen. But, after this, it was long argued, though in the end it was agreed to, and the bill was passed. The Journal of the lords, though deficient in the acts of the 1st and 2d sessions of this parl. has nevertheless inserted in the preamble to this act of reversion, which we shall give in its own words; "And may it please your highness that it be declared by the authority of this present parl. that the law of this realme is, and always has been, that the assent and consent of the king of this realme to any act of parl. ought to be given in his own royal presence, being personally present in the higher house of parl. or by his letters patents under his great seal, assigned with his hand, declared and ratified in his absence to the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons assembled together in the higher house, according to the statute made in the 34th year of the reign of the said late king Henry VIII. in that case made and provided." Another exception made to the act of Attainder, and mentioned in the Journal, was "because the king's stamp, expressing his name, was only put to it, not signed with his own hand, and that was set at the bottom of the said act, and not above. By which it does not appear that the king ever gave his assent to it; and since there was nothing charged against the said duke but some pretended reasons for using coats of arms, which he and his ancestors had, and might lawfully use. And that the lord Paget, late secretary of state to king Henry, came into the commons, also, and deposed upon his honour, that the said letters patents for the passing this act, were not signed with the king's hand, but only the stamp put to them by one Wm. Clerk. The king also dying the night after, the whole shewed that it was disorderly done; and therefore that pretended act is declared void and null by the common laws of the land."

The last act which comes under our notice, was a confirmation of the Attainders which had been made, in a trial at bar, against abp. Cranmer, the lord Guilford Dudley, and the lady Jane his wife, &c. They had all confessed their indictments, and by this act they were attainted of high treason; for levying war against the queen, and conspiring to set up another in her room. The lord and lady were beheaded, but Cranmer, being divested from his bishopric, by this act, was kept in prison till he suffered a more dreadful execution afterwards.

The Commons address the Queen against marrying Philip of Spain.] About this time it was that the queen had been solicited to marry; and three persons were secretly proposed to her for a match; these were Courtney earl of Devon, cardinal Pole, and Philip, eldest son to the emperor Charles V. It was thought that her inclinations stood most for the young earl of Devonshire. He was a fine person, and of royal extraction; his grandmother being daughter to Edw. IV. It is said, that this nobleman had received some intelligible invitation to this match from the queen herself; but he declined it, and desired leave to address the lady Elizabeth, which much displeased her elder sister. It was objected against cardinal Pole, that he was advanced in years; and so much given to his study and devotion, as to be noways fit for her husband or the regal dignity. Philip of Spain was deemed preferable in all respects; he was heir to the greatest monarch in Europe, bred to the business of a crown; of an enterprising genius; and, since the national affairs required a person of his power, it was urged, that by such an alliance, the trade of the kingdom would be extended, and the public interest considerably advanced. But notwithstanding the complacency this parl. shewed to the queen and her ministry, the rumour being spread that she was going to marry Philip, the commons were much alarmed; and came to a resolution to address the queen against it. Accordingly, they sent their Speaker, with 20 of that house, with an earnest and humble address to her, not to marry a stranger. What answer they received is not known; but it may well be imagined no good one, for when the court perceived their inclinations in this matter, and that more was not to be expected from them, on the 6th day of Dec. the queen came to the house of peers, and dissolved this parl. after having given the royal assent to 81 acts, according to the commons Journal; though the Statute books mention only 18. Thus does this right rev. author carry on his invectives, without mentioning any authority for it but his own; which gives an impartial reader some room to doubt of his sincerity. We have taken notice, that the last parl. was as obsequious to the court as possible, except in the affair of the marriage, and yet he does not charge the ministry with bribery in carrying the elections for it.

A Parl. called.] A new parl. was called by writs dated at Westminster, Feb. 20, 1554, to meet at Oxford on the 2d of April following. Grafton informs us, that this call to Oxford was occasioned by a distaste that the queen had taken against the Londoners, as being favourers of Wyatt's rebellion, which was just then quashed: but though great preparations were made for the meeting at Oxford, it was held at Westminster, at the time appointed, by adjournment. The journal of the lords gives us no speech from the ld. chanc. nor the name of the Speaker of the commons. But the journals of the commons acquaint us, that the knights, citizens, and burgesses, chose Robert Brook, esq. serjeant at law and recorder of London, for their Speaker; who made an eloquent speech to the queen on that occasion. And that the purport of the ld. chanc.'s oration, to both houses, was to declare, that this parl. was called for the coroboration of true religion, and concerning the queen's highness most noble marriage. On the 5th of April the ld. chanc. declared to the house, that by reason of the high winds and inclemency of the weather, the queen could not, without some danger to her person, come down to Westminster; therefore, in her maj.'s name, he adjourned the parl. to Whitehall, to meet the next morning at 9 o'clock.

Act relating to the Queen's Marriage with Philip.] April 7th a bill was brought into the Lords to confirm certain articles and agreements touching the marriage between the queen and the prince of Spain. It was read once on that day, and committed to the earl of Shrewsbury, the bps. of Durham and Worcester, the lords Rich, Paget, and Williams. On the 9th, the bill was read again; the next day it passed that house, and was sent down to the commons, who returned it concluded on the 12th. The following is an abstract of the act by which this famous marriage was concluded. 1st. "That Philip should not advance any person to any public office or dignity in England, but such as were natives of the realm, and the queen's subjects; that he should admit a set number of English into his household, whom he should use respectfully, and not suffer them to be injured by foreigners. That he should not transport the queen out of England, but at her intreaty, nor any of the issue begotten on her, who should have their education in this realm, and should not be suffered but upon necessity and good reasons to go out of the same, nor then neither but with the consent of the English. That the queen deceasing without children, Philip should not make any claim to the kingdom, but should leave it freely to him to whom of right it should belong. That he should not change any thing in the laws, either public or private, nor the immunities and customs of the realm, but should be bound by oath to confirm and keep them. That he should not transport any jewels nor any part of the wardrobe, nor alienate any of the revenues of the crown. That he should preserve our shipping, ordnance, and munition, and keep the castles, forts, and block-houses, in good repair, and well manned. Lastly, that this match should not any way derogate from the league lately concluded, between the queen and the king of France; but that the peace between the English and the French should remain firm and inviolate."

Act relating to the Prerogative.] Bp. Burnet says, "that an act passed in this session of parl. which seemed of an odd nature, and has a great secret under it. The Speaker of the commons brought in a bill, declaring, 'that whereas the queen had of right succeeded to the crown, but, because all the laws of England had been made by kings, and declared the prerogative to be in the king's person; from thence some might pretend that the queen had no right to them; it was therefore declared to have been the law, that these prerogatives did belong to the crown, whether in the hands of male or female; and whatsoever the law did limit and appoint for the king, was of right also due to the queen, who is declared to have as much authority as any of her progenitors.' Many of the commons wondered what was the intention of such a law; and authority, as people were at this time full of jealousy, one Skinner, a member of that house, said, "He could not imagine why such a frivolous law was desired, since the thing was without dispute: and that which was pretended of satisfying the people was too slight: he was afraid there was a trick in these words, 'That the queen had as great an authority as any of her progenitors;' on which, perhaps, it might be afterwards said, she had the same power as Wm. the Conqueror exercised, in seizing the lands of the English and giving them to strangers; which also Edw. I. did on his conquest of Wales. He did not know what relation this might have to the intended marriage; wherefore he warned the house to look to it." On this a committee was appointed to correct the bill; and such words were added as brought the Queen's Prerogative under the same limitation, as well as exalted it to the height of her progenitors.

The Bishoprick of Durham re-established.] An act for restoring the bishoprick of Durham to its pristine state, by repealing two acts made in the last reign for its dissolution, was also passed. In the commons this bill met with great opposition from the town of Newcastle; because they had purchased, under the Dissolution-Act, the town of Gateside, and the salt-meadows, &c. which occasioned Tunstal, bp. of Durham, to come down to that house; where, in a long speech, he gave them an account of the troubles he had been under from the late duke of Northumberland; and desired that they would dispatch the bill. Yet still it was debated; and the house dividing, it was carried in the affirmative, by 201 against 120. The preamble to this bill sets forth:—"That certain ambitious persons, taking advantage of the late king's minority, made an interest by sinister practice to procure the dissolution of the bishoprick; that it was done out of mercenary views, to enrich themselves and their friends, by seizing the lands of that see, rather than upon just occasion or godly zeal. That Tunstal, bp. of Durham, was deprived upon untrue surmises and false accusations, and that the process against him was foul and illegal. That upon a full examination of the matter, by the queen's commissioners, the sentence of deprivation was declared void, as may be seen at large by an authentic instrument. That the queen had new founded the bishoprick by her letters patent, and restored all the lands in her possession. But, that neither the reversal of the sentence of deprivation, nor the queen's letters patent, were of sufficient force to recover the honours, lands, &c. to the see of Durham. Therefore, to restore the bishoprick to its former interest, privileges, and revenues, the two dissolution statutes of the last reign were hereby repealed."

Privilege of Parl.] April 17, Mr. Read and Mr. Ernstead brought down to the Commons, from the Lords, a subpoena, that Mr. Beaumont and his wife caused to be served upon the earl of Huntingdon, in this parl. time, and praying the order of this house for that offence:—It is ordered, "that 8 of this house shall declare to the lords, that they take this writ to be no breach of privilege."—April 23d, Wm. Johnson, one of the burgesses, complained upon Monyngton, who had beaten him, and put him in fear of his life; whereupon Monyngton came to this house, and not knowing Johnson to be a burgess, confessed that he had stricken him; for that he took away a net out of Mr. Bray's house in Bedfordshire, and Johnson said it was lord Mordaunt's net, and as under-sheriff he took it; whereupon it was ordered, that Monyngton was sent prisoner to the Tower. On the next day it is ordered, That the serjeant shall fetch Monyngton from the Tower to this house; whereupon Johnson required, that he might go safe in body, and that was committed to Mr. Higham and Mr. Pollard, and thereupon Monyngton discharged.

May 4th, a bill was sent up to the Lords, by the other house, confirming the Attainder of the late duke of Suffolk, sir Tho. Wyat, and others: it was read thrice that day, and committed to the attorney-gen. to carry down to the commons, with this request, that these words, "and forasmuch as divers of the same traitors," with 17 lines to the end of the bill, might be wholly put out. The Journals of the Commons inform us, that it was not till the last day of the session this objection of the lords was debated in that house; when, upon the question, the clause for forfeiting entailed lands, contained in the bill, was agreed by a majority to be kept in. In all probability, this was the reason why the bill did not pass into a law at that time; for it is not mentioned in the catalogue of acts in the Lords' Journal; and this, or another act of like nature, was not carried through till the next parliament.

May 5th, the bills, to the number of 15, being all ready for the royal assent, the queen came to the house and passed them; and then commanded the lord chanc. to dissolve this parliament.

PHILIP AND MARY.

The Marriage being now agreed to, by both houses of parl. prince Philip landed at Southampton, on the 20th of July, and was espoused to the queen, at Winchester, on the 25th of the same month, in the year 1554. After which they were both proclaimed by these titles: "Philip and Mary, by the grace of God, king and queen of England, France, Naples, Jerusalem, and Ireland, defenders of the faith; princes of Spain and Sicily; archdukes of Austria; dukes of Milan, Burgundy, and Brabant; counts of Haspurg, Flanders, and Tyrol."

A Parl. called.] The marriage being solemnized, and other matters of state settled, their majesties thought proper to call a new parl. the next winter, by writs bearing date Sept. 25th, to meet at Westminster on the 11th of Nov. following. It is to be observed, that in these writs, as well as in the foregoing royal style, the title of 'Supreme Head of the Church' was omitted, though it was still by law united to the other royal titles. And this, bp. Burnet observes, was urged as a good reason for annulling the statutes of this parl. in the beginning of the next reign, because it was not called by a lawful writ.

The Queen's Letter to the Sheriffs for electing Catholic Members.] Strype tells us, "that the queen wanting fit parliament-men for her purpose, sent out her private letters to all the sheriffs, to deal with the people for electing such members as would do her work. And that the commons might be the better drawn to it, they were to assure the people, that it was not the queen's intention to take away any man's possessions, many of which came to them by the dissolution of monasteries, or from the church; and to labour to free the people from other rumours spread abroad." The following is a copy of the queen's letter on this occasion:—"By the QUEENE: trusty and well beloved we grete you well. And where, among other matters for the prosperity and commodity of our realme, we intend principally the restitution of God's honour and glory, whom we acknowledge our chief author and helper, as well in bringing us to the right of our estate, as also in this most noble marriage, which we have now atchieved and perfected, much to our satisfaction and contentation; and, as we trust, of the rest of the good catholic people within our realmes: these shall be to will and command you, that for withstanding such malice as the devil worketh by his ministers, for the maintenance of heresies and seditions, ye now, on our behalf, admonish such our good loving subjects, as by order of our writs should, within that county, choose knights, citizens, and burgesses to repair from thence to this our parl. to be of their inhabitants as the laws require, and of the wise, grave, and Catholic sort; such as indeed mean the true honour of God with the prosperity of the commonwealth, the advancement whereof we and our dear husband the king do chiefly profess and intend, without alteration of anyman's particular possessions, as, among other false rumours, is spread abroad, to hinder our godly purpose; but such would have their heresies return, and the realm, by the just wrath of God, be brought to confusion; from which we have seen the same marvailously delivered; and mind, by God's help, and the advice of our counsellors and estates of this our parl. to hold and continue. Requiring you, with the rest of the justices of that county, to whom you shall also shew and declare these our letters, that spreaders of rumours and tales may be, by their diligence, speedily apprehended, and, according to the law of our realm, sharply punished; according to the trust we have in them, and as they will answer for the due punishment of their slackness and remiss dealing in this behalf. Yeven, &c."

What influence this circular letter had on the kingdom will appear best by the sequel. We are told that this parl. began with a very unusual solemnity, the king and queen rode down to the house on horseback, in their robes of state; two swords of state and two caps of maintenance being carried before them. The swords were borne by the earls of Pembroke and Westmoreland, and the caps by the earls of Arundele and Shrewsbury. The initial ceremonies at the opening of the parl. are omitted in the Journals of the Lords; but that of the Commons informs us, that the bp. of Winchester, lord chanc. opened this session with a speech, declaring this parl. to be called for the confirmation of true religion, and other weighty matters. After which, the commons chose Clement Higham, esq. one of the privy council, to be their Speaker; who, in an excellent oration, comparing the body politic to the body natural, introduced the three usual petitions, for freedom of speech, &c. and was accepted.

Cardinal Pole's Attainder reversed.] The first bill that appeared in the Lords was to repeal the act of Attainder against cardinal Pole. It was introduced on the 17th of Nov. passed both houses on the 21st, and had the royal assent on the 22nd, the king and queen being both present on this occasion. The reason of this dispatch was, because the cardinal was then arrived in England, as legate from the pope, and he could not appear in parl. till by this act he was restored to his paternal estate and dignity, from which he had been deprived by an act of Attainder, passed in the 31st year of Henry VIII. The reason set forth in the act for reversing this Attainder was, "that it was laid upon the cardinal, because he would not consent to the unlawful separation and divorce between king Henry and his most godly, lawful, and virtuous wife, queen Catherine; therefore they, considering the true and sincere conscience of the cardinal in that point, and his other many godly virtues and qualities, did repeal that act."

Cardinal Pole introduced into Parl.] Matters being thus premised, the Cardinal was not only restored to his state and dignity as an English nobleman of the blood royal, but at liberty to open his commission from Rome as a legate from that see. Accordingly, on the 27th of Nov. a message was sent to both houses of parl. to come up to Whitehall, to hear him deliver his legation. The reason that the king and queen did not come to the parliament house in Westminster was, because the queen was sick at that time, says Grafton, so the great chamber in the palace at Whitehall was prepared for that purpose. Here, the king and queen being seated under a canopy, the cardinal on their right hand, the bps. lords and commons attending, bp. of Winchester, lord chancellor, spoke as follows:

"My lordes of the upper house, and you my maysters of the nether house here present: The right rev. father in God, my lord cardinal Pole, legate a latere, is come from the apostolique see of Rome, as ambassadour to the king and queenes majesties, upon one of the weightiest causes that ever happened in this realme, and which perteyneth to the glory of God and youre universal benefite. The which ambassade their majesties pleasure is to be signified unto you all by his own mouth, trustyng that you receyve and accept it, in as benevolent and thankfull wise as their highnesses have done; and that you will give attentive and inclinable eares unto his grace who is now readie to declare the same."

As soon as the ld. chanc. had ended, the Cardinal stood up and made a long oration, which Mr. Fox in his Acts and Monuments has given at large, and of which the following is a copy:—

"My lords all, and you that are the commons of this present parl. assembled, which in effect is nothing else but the state and body of the whole realm. As the cause of my repair hither hath been most wisely and gravely declared by my lord chancellor; so, before that I enter to the particularities of my commission, I have somewhat touching myself, and to give most humble and hearty thanks to the king and queen's majesties, and after them to you all; which, of a man exiled and banished from this commonwealth, have restored me to be a member of the same; and of a man having no place neither here, or elsewhere within this realm, have admitted me in a place, where to speak and to be heard. This I protest unto you all, that though I was exiled my native country without just cause, as God knoweth, yet that ingratitude could not pull from me the affection and desire that I had to profit and do you good. If the offer of my service might have been received it was never to seek, and where that could not be taken, you never failed of my prayer, nor ever shall. But leaving the rehearsal thereof, and coming more near to the matter of my commission, I signifie unto you all, that my principal travel is for the restitution of this noble realm to its ancient nobility, and to declare unto you, that the see apostolic, from whence I come, hath a special respect to this realm above all others; and not without cause, seeing that God himself, as it were by Providence, hath given this realm prerogative of nobility above others; which to make more plain unto you, it is to be considered that this island, first of all islands, received the light of Christ's religion. For as stories testifie, it was "prima provinciarum quæ amplexa est fidem Christi." The Britons being first inhabitants of this realm, (notwithstanding the subjection of the emperors and heathen princes) did receive Christ's faith from the apostolic see universally, and not in parts as other countries, nor by one and one, as clocks increase their hours by distinction of times, but altogether at once, as it were in a moment. But after that their ill merits or forgetfulness of God had deserved expulsion, and that strangers being infidels had possessed this land, yet God of his goodness, not leaving where he once loved, so illuminated the hearts of the Saxons, being heathen men, that they forsook the darkness of heathen errors, and embraced the light of Christ's religion; so that within a small space, idolatry and heathen superstition was utterly abandoned in this island.—This was a great prerogative of nobility, the benefit whereof though it be to be ascribed to God, yet the mean occasion of the same came from the church of Rome. In the faith of which church we have ever since continued and consented, with the rest of the world, in unity of religion. And to shew further the fervent devotion of the inhabitants of this island towards the church of Rome, we read that divers princes in the Saxons time, with great travel and expences, went personally to Rome, as Offa and Adulphus, which thought it not enough to shew themselves obedient to the said see, unless that in their own persons they had gone to that same place from whence they had received so great a grace and benefit.—In the time of Carolus Magnus, who first founded the university of Paris, he sent into England for Alcuinus, a great learned man, which first brought learning to that university; whereby it seemeth that the greatest part of the world fetched the light of religion from England.—Adrian IV. being an Englishman, converted Norway from infidelity, which Adrian afterwards, upon great affection and love that he bare to this realm, being his native country, gave to Henry the second, king of England, the right and seigniorie of the dominion of Ireland, which pertained to the see of Rome.—I will not rehearse the manifold benefit that this realm has received from the apostolic see, nor how ready the same hath been to relieve us in all our necessities. Nor will I rehearse the manifold miseries and calamities, that this realm hath suffered by swerving from that unity. And even as in this realm, so also in all other countries, which refusing the unity of the catholic faith, have followed fantastical doctrine, the like plagues have happened. Let Asia and the empire of Greece be a spectacle unto the world, who, by swerving from the unity of the church of Rome, are brought into captivity and subjection of the Turk. All stories be full of like examples. And to come unto the later time, look upon our neighbours in Germany, who, by swerving from this unity, are miserably afflicted with diversity of sects, and divided into factions.—What shall I rehearse unto you the tumults and effusion of blood that hath happened there of late days? Or trouble you with the rehearsal of those plagues that have happened since this innovation of religion, whereof you have felt the bitterness, and I have heard the report? Of all which matters I can say no more, but such was the misery of the time. And see how far forth this fury went. For those that live under the Turk may freely live after their consciences, and so was it not lawful here.—If men examine well upon what grounds these innovations began, they shall well find that the root of this, as of many other mischiefs, was avarice; and the lust and carnal affection of one man confounded all laws both divine and human. And notwithstanding all these devices and policies, practised within this realm against the church of Rome, they needed not to have lost you, but that they thought rather as friends to reconcile you, than as enemies to infest you. For there wanted not great offers of the most mighty potentates in all Europe to have aided the church in that quarrel. Then mark the sequel: there seemed by these changes to rise a great face of riches and gain, which in proof came to great misery and lack. See how God then can confound the wisdom of the wise, and turn unjust policy to meer folly; and that thing which seemed to be done for relief, was cause of plain ruin and decay. Yet see that goodness of God, which at no time failed us, but most benignly offered his grace, when it was of our parts least sought and worse deserved.—And when all light of true religion seemed utterly extinct, the churches defaced, the altars overthrown, the ministers corrupted; even like as in a lamp the light being covered, yet it is not quenched, even so in a few remained the confession of Christ's faith, namely in the breast of the queen's excellency, of whom, to speak without adulation, the saying of the prophet may be verified, "Ecce quasi derelicta!"—And see how miraculously God of his goodness preserved her highness, contrary to the expectation of man, that when numbers conspired against her, and policies were devised to disinherit her, and armed power prepared to destroy her, yet she being a virgin helpless, naked and unarmed, prevailed and had the victory of tyrants, which is not to be ascribed to any policy of man, but to the almighty goodness and providence of God, to whom the honour is to be given. And therefore it may be said, "Da gloriam Deo." For in man's judgment, on her grace's part, was nothing in appearance but despair.—And yet for all these practices and devises of ill men, here you see her grace established in her estate, being your lawful queen and governess, born among you, whom God hath appointed to reign over you for the restitution of true religion, and extirpation of all errors and sects. And to confirm her grace the more strongly in this enterprize, lo how the providence of God hath joined her in marriage with a prince of like religion, who being a king of great might, armor, and force, yet useth towards you neither armor nor force, but seeketh you by the way of love and amity; in which respect great cause you have to give thanks to Almighty God, that hath sent you such a catholic governess. It shall be therefore your part again to love, obey, and serve them.—And as it was a singular favour of God to conjoin them in marriage, so it is not to be doubted but that he shall send them issue, for the comfort and surety of this commonwealth.—Of all princes in Europe the emperor hath travelled most in the cause of religion, as it appeareth by his acts in Germany; yet happily by some secret judgment of God he hath not atchieved the end. With whom in my journey hitherwards I had conference touching my legation; whereof when we had understanding, he shewed a great appearance of most earnest joy and gladness, saying, that it rejoiced him no less of the reconciliation of this realm unto christian unity, than that his son was placed by marriage in the kingdom; and most glad he was of all, that the occasion thereof should come by me being an Englishman born; which is (as it were) to call home ourselves. I can well compare him to David, who though he were a man elect of God, yet, for that he was contaminate with blood and war, he could not build the temple of Jerusalem, but left the finishing thereof to Solomon, which was ‘rex pacificus.’ So may it be thought, that the appeasing of controversies of religion in Christianity is not appointed to this emperor, but rather to his son, who shall perform the building that his father had begun. Which church cannot be perfectly builded, unless universally in all realms we adhere to one head, and do acknowledge him to be the vicar of God, and to have power from above. For all power is of God, according to the saying, ‘non est potestas, nisi à Deo.’ And therefore I consider that all power being in God, yet, for the conservation of quiet and godly life in the world, he hath derived that power from above into the parts here on earth, which is into the power imperial and ecclesiastical. And these two powers, as they be several and distinct, so have they two several effects and operations. For secular princes, to whom the temporal sword is committed, be ministers of God to execute vengeance upon transgressors and evil-livers, and to preserve the well-doers and innocents from injury and violence. Which power is represented in these two most excellent persons, the king and queen’s majesty here present, who have this power committed to them immediately from God, without any superior in that behalf. The other power is of ministration, which is the power of the keys, and order in the ecclesiastical state, which is, by the authority of God’s word, and examples of the apostles, and of all old holy fathers from Christ hitherto, attributed and given to the apostolic see of Rome, by special prerogative. From which see I am here deputed legate and ambassador, having full and ample commission from thence, and have the keys committed to my hands; I confess to you I have the keys, not as mine own keys, but as the keys of him that sent me, and yet cannot open; not for want of power in me to give, but for certain impediments in you to receive, which must be taken away before my commission can take effect. This I protest before you, my commission is not of prejudice to any person. I come not to destroy, but to build; I come to reconcile, not to condemn; I am not come to compel, but to call again; I am not come to call any thing in question already done, but my commission is of grace and clemency, to such as will receive it. For touching all matters that be past, they shall be as things cast into the sea of forgetfulness. But the mean, whereby you shall receive this benefit, is to revoke and repeal those laws and statutes, which be impediments, blocks, and bars to the execution of my commission. For like as I myself had neither place nor voice to speak here among you, but was in all respects a banished man, till such time as ye had repealed those laws that lay in my way; even so cannot you receive the benefit and grace offered from the apostolic see, until the abrogation of such laws, whereby you have disjoined and dis severed yourselves from the unity of Christ’s church. It remaineth therefore that you, like true Christians and provident men for the weal of your souls and bodies, ponder what is to be done in this so weighty a cause; and so to frame your acts and proceedings, as they may first tend to the glory of God, and next to the conservation of your commonwealth, surety, and quietness.”

Petition of the Parl. declaring their sorrow for all past proceedings against the Pope.

The next day the whole court of parl. drew up the form of a Supplication or Petition; and the day after, the king and queen, with the peers and commoners, being again assembled, the bp. of Winchester there declared what the parl. had determined concerning the cardinal’s request, and presented their majesties the said Petition, of which the following is a copy. “We, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons, in this present parl. assembled, representing the whole bodie of the realme of England and dominions of the same, in the name of ourselves particularly, and also of the sayd bodie universally, offer this our most humble supplication to your majesties, to this ende and effect, that the same by your grace’s intercession and meane, may be exhibited to the most rev. father in God, the lord cardinal Pole, legate, sent specially hether from our most holy father pope Julius III. and the see apostolique of Rome, wherein we do declare ourselves very sorry and repentant of the long schisme and disobedience committed in this realme, and the dominions of the same, against the said see apostolique; eyther by making, agreeing, or executing of any lawes, ordinaunces, and commaundements, agaynst the primacy of the same see; or otherwise doyng or speaking that might impugne or prejudice the same: offering ourselves, and promising by this our supplication, that for a token and knowlege of this our sayd repentance, we be, and shall be ever readie, under and with the authorities of your majesties, to the uttermost of our power, to do that shall lye in us, for the abrogation and repealyng of all the sayd lawes and ordinaunces, made or enacted to the prejudice of the see apostolique, as well for ourselves as for the whole bodie whom we represent. Whereupon, most humbly we beseech your majesties, as personages undefiled in the offence of this bodie towards the sayd sea, which nevertheless God by his providence hath made subject to you, so to set foorth this our humble suyte, as we the rather, by your intercession, maye obtaine from the sea apostolique, by the sayde most rev. father, as well perticularly as generally, absolution, release, and discharge from all daungers of such censures and sentences as, by the lawes of the church, we be fallen into. And that we may, as children repentaunt, be receyved into the bosome and unitie of Christes church, so as this noble realme, with all the members thereof, may, in this unitie and perfect obedience to the see apostolique and popes for the tyme being, serve God and your majesties to the furtheraunce and advaancement of his honour and glorie. Amen."

This humble petition being first openly read, the same was delivered by the chancellor to the king and queen, with a request to them, that they would give it to the lord cardinal. Their majesties, rising off their seats and doing reverence to the cardinal, did deliver the said petition to him; who, perceiving the effect thereof to answer his expectation, received it most gladly at their hands. And then, after that he had, in few words, given thanks to God, and declared what great cause he had, above all others, to rejoyce, that his coming from Rome into England had taken such a happy turn; he caused his commission to be read, by which it might appear, that he had authority from the pope to absolve them. The commission was very long; which being ended, and all the parl. both lords and commons, on their knees, the cardinal, by the pope's authority, gave them Absolution, as follows: "Our Lord Jesus Christ, which, with his most precious blood hath redeemed and washed us from all our sins and iniquities, that he might purchase to himself a glorious spouse, without spot or wrinkle, and whome the father hath appointed head over all his church; he by his mercy absolve you; and we by the apostolique authority given unto us by the most holy lord pope Julius III. his vicegerent in earth, do absolve and deliver you, and every of you, with the whole realme and the dominions thereof, from all heresie and schisme, and from all and every judgments, censures, and paynes, for that cause incurred. And also we doe restore you agayne to the unitie of the holy church, as in our letters of commission more plainly shall appeare, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holie Ghoste. Amen."

After this general Absolution was so given and received, the king, queen, and all the lords, with the rest, went into the king's chapel, and there sung 'te Deum' with great joy and gladness for this new reconciliation.

The next thing the parl. went upon was, to testify their grateful sense of the cardinal's Absolution. Accordingly, on the 6th of Dec. a committee of 6 peers and 3 bishops were appointed to confer with certain of the lower house, for the drawing up a bill touching the repeal of certain statutes.

Acts against the Pope repealed.] This conference was carried on till the 20th, and on that day a bill was read the first time in the lords, with this title, "a bill for the repeal of certain Acts made against the supremacy of the see of Rome." It was read a 2nd time on Christmas-day; a day we have never found a parl. sitting on before; but it may be supposed that they thought they could offer no higher oblation to Christ on that festival, than to repeal those laws which had shut his vicar out of this kingdom. No other business was done on that day. On the 26th of Dec. the bill was read a 3rd time, and passed, with the consent of the whole house, the bp. of London only dissenting; the reason of which will appear in the sequel. The title to the bill on its passing this house was, "a bill for repealing all statutes, articles, and provisoes made against the see apostolique of Rome, since the 20th of Henry VIII. and for the establishment of all spiritual and ecclesiastical possessions and hereditaments conveyed to the laity."

Former Acts against Heresy, revived.] To shew how eager the commons were to remunerate the pope and the queen, for these extraordinary favours, a bill was carried through that body, for reviving the statutes made by Rich. II. Hen. IV. and Hen. the Vth, against heretics. It was brought into the lords, on the 15th of Dec. and passed there on the 18th. The commons, also, passed and sent up another bill to the lords, for annulling all leases made by married priests. Burnet tells us, that this bill was much argued in the lower house, that the first draught was rejected, but a new one approved on, and sent up to the lords, on the 19th of Dec. But they, finding it would shake a great part of the right of church-leases that were made by married priests and bps. laid it aside.

In the printed book of Statutes, only 17 acts are given for this session; in the journals are the titles of 21. The reason is, that the private acts are not taken notice of in the Statute Books. The titles of the public acts will be found in the list given at the end of this reign. The prime minister, Gardiner, having now carried all his schemes through both houses, for the restoration of the church, and security of the govt. thought proper to put an end to this parl. Accordingly, on the 16th of Jan. the queen came to the house, and having sceptered the acts, the ld. chanc. by her majesty's command, dissolved it.

Several Members of the Commons leave the House.] A circumstance of a very extraordinary nature happened in this parl.; and the like of which we have not before met with in the course of this history. This was a voluntary secession of some members of the Commons, who actually left the house, when they saw the majority inclined to sacrifice every thing to the ministry. Lord Coke, in order to do honour to their memories, has in his Institutes handed down their names, as follows, to posterity.

We are told, by the same high authority, that the court resented this separation of the members; and ordered Edw. Griffith, esq. the queen's attorney-general, to indict them in the king's bench. On an information being preferred against them, there, for departing without licence, contrary to the king and queen's inhibition, in the beginning of the parl.; 6 of these members were so timorous as to submit to the mercy of the court, and paid their fines. All the rest, among whom was that famous lawyer Plowden, traversed; but judgment against them was prevented by the queen's death.

About this time it was, that the queen entertained suspicions of her being pregnant, and, as it was made public, great rejoicings took place amongst the Catholics here, as well as over Europe, for a blessing which was likely to continue and establish that faith in this kingdom. Upon this occasion the parl. immediately passed a bill for the maintenance, support, and govt. of her offspring.

A Parl. called.] Another parl. was called to meet at Westminster, on the 21st of Oct. 1555. The queen rode to the parl. house in an open horse-litter, to be seen of every one. The journals of the commons tell us, that the bp. of Winchester opened this parl. by a speech, importing, that it was called for a necessary aid to be made to her maj.; and that this house unanimously chose for their Speaker, John Pollard, esq. deeply learned in the laws of this land. It is to be observed, that by the authority of both the journals, the ld. chanc. Gardiner, bp. of Winchester, appeared on the 1st and 2nd day of this session, but never after; for it seems he fell sick on the 24th of this month, and died on the 12th of Nov. following.

On the death of the ld. chanc. it is supposed that the ld. treasurer, the marq. of Winchester, 'virtute officii,' adjourned the parl. from day to day; since there is no mention of any commission granted for executing the chancellor's office. And though by the negligence of the clerks, the adjournments are not entered, yet, on the last day of the session, we find that the ld. treasurer, by the queen's command, did dissolve this parl. The journals of the commons inform us, that Oct. 23, when the commons appeared with their Speaker, to present him to the queen, he made an eloquent oration. After which was read a bull from the Pope, confirming what cardinal Pole had promised relating to the assurance of abby-lands, &c. And when the commons were retired to their own house, a bill was revived concerning the absence of knights and burgesses in the time of parl.

Oct. 24, a motion was made for a Supply to be granted to her maj.; and Mr. Comptroller, Mr. sec. Petre, with 18 more members, were ordered to draw up a bill for that purpose. On the 28th. the bill was read a 1st time, for a Subsidy and two 15ths, but on the 3d reading, Oct. 30, it met with some opposition; and the next day, Mr. sec. Petre declared to the house, That the queen gave them thanks for the two fifteenths, but was contented to refuse them; on which the bill for a Subsidy, only, was passed and sent up to the lords. On the 5th of Nov. this bill passed the lords on the 1st reading, which is the only instance of that kind we have yet met with.

Restitution of Church Lands.] Nov. 20, a bill for suppressing of First Fruits and tenths, and the resigning up all Improprations that were yet in the queen's gift, to the church; to be disposed of, as the legate thought fit, for the relief of the clergy, was brought unto the lords, and passed on the 23rd. It was sent that day down to the commons, who returned it on the 4th of Dec. with a schedule annexed to it, requiring certain things to be amended in the bill; which, upon debate, were by the lords assented to.—But the queen had a much greater design which she hoped to have executed this parl. which was getting an act for restoring all such lands to the church as had belonged to it, and was devolved upon the crown; and from the crown into the hands of private persons, by the fall of monasteries and other religious houses, or by any other means whatsoever. She had been tampering with some lords about this act, but found such a general aversion to any kind of restitution in the lay-nobility, that she was advised to desist from that unprofitable undertaking. "Certain it is," says Dr. Heylin, "that many who were cordially affected to the queen's religion, were very much startled at the noise of this Restitution; insomuch that some of them are said to have clapped their hands upon their swords, affirming, not without some oaths, that they would never part with their Abby-Lands as long as they were able to wear a sword by their sides." Which resolution being told the queen, she thought proper to drop that affair, and only set them a good example, by giving up to the church what was really her own to give, the first-fruits and tenths aforesaid; which, as they had been settled on the crown by an act of parl. must be released* by another.

But, notwithstanding this bill passed the lords so easily, it was greatly opposed in the commons; for on the 19th of Nov. the queen sent for that house, and told them, "She could not, with a good conscience, take the Tenths and First Fruits of spiritual benefices; it was a tax her father laid on the clergy, to support the dignity of Supreme Head; of which, since she was divested, she would also discharge the other." Then the legate made a speech, to shew that tithes and impropriations of spiritual benefices were the patrimony of the church, and ought to return to it; and upon this the queen declared, that she would also surrender up those matters to the church. Whilst the commons were before her maj. one Story, a member of that house, falling on his knees, told the queen, that the Speaker did not open to her their desire that Licences might be restrained. This was a great affront to the Speaker, who, when they were returned, complained of it to the house; but Story confessing his fault, the house, "knowing that he spoke of a good zeal," forgave him. This is the person mentioned in p. 586, as being sent to the Tower, for using great liberty of speech against Edw. VI. and the protector, in his opposition to the act for the first book of the English common-prayer. He was now on the other side of the question, in opposing Licences from Rome; and Burnet himself says, that this man of "good zeal," was afterwards condemned for treason, in the reign of Elizabeth, as will appear in the sequel. Burnet tells us, that it was once thought proper that the surrender of Impropriations should be left out of this bill; since, as was urged, the queen might do that as well by letters patents; and if it was put in the bill it would raise great jealousies; for it would be understood that the queen did expect that her subjects should follow her example. The tithes, however, were resolved to be recovered to the church, so they were put in; though all, says our authority, were long argued in the house; some saying that the clergy would rob the crown and the nation both; and that the laity must then support the dignity of the realm. At last, it being particularly committed to sir Wm. Cecil and others, to be, by them, examined on the 3d of Dec. the house divided upon it, and the bills were carried, on a majority of 193, against 126. To conclude this affair, it may not be amiss to give the preamble to this bill, to see the matter in as clear a light as possible; and, especially, since that act itself is not printed amongst the statutes of this parl. By it is declared, "That the payment of First-Fruits and Tenths was extinguished: and all rectories, benefices impropriate, glebe-lands, tithes, oblations, pensions, &c. vested in the crown since the 20th of Henry VIII. are given up to the Church for the augmentation of the livings to which they formerly belonged, for the advantage of other poor cures, for the furnishing preachers; for the exhibiting scholars; and the disposal of these revenues thus restored, is left to the discretion of the lord legate cardinal Pole. But then there was a proviso for saving the right of the subject, who had any interest in these estates granted from the crown. There is likewise a clause for exonerating the king and queen and their successors, from the payment of pensions and annuities to the monks: to which are added corrodiess, and fees, which for the future were to be paid out of the Tenths, First Fruits, &c. without any burthen upon the crown. There is another proviso, by which the patronage of these impropriations belonging to the crown is still reserved. And because some temporal estates had been intermixed, and leased out by the crown with these tenths, impropriations, &c. It is enacted, that commissions shall be awarded out of the exchequer to 6 different persons, 3 of the spirituality, and 3 of the temporality, to call 12 men, of credit and substance, before them: 12 men inhabiting in the neighbourhood where these estates lie; and to oblige them upon oath to distinguish and sever the glebe-lands and other spiritual possessions, from the temporal estates, and to rate and apportion how much rent shall be payed for the one and the other."

Privilege of Parl.] Nov. 20, "it is ordered in the Commons, That — Tassard, who caused Mr. Mynne to be arrested, shall pay the serjeants' fees and withdraw his action.— Dec. 6, it is ordered, That Mr. Comptroller, with other of the house, shall declare to the lords, that their opinion is, that their Privilege is broken, for that Gabriel Pledall, a member of this house, was bound in a recognizance in the star-chamber to appear before the council, within 12 days after the end of this parl.:—whereupon Mr. Comptroller, from the lords, said, that they would send answer thereof to the house:—Mr. Marten and Mr. Lewis from the lords, said, they required six of the house to confer with the lords, for that cause; and Mr. Comptroller, Mr. S. Petre, with four others went up, and they reported, that the chief justices, master of the rolls, and serjeants, do clearly affirm that the recognizance is no breach of the privilege."

Dec. 9, the queen came to the house to pass the bills; after which, the marq. of Winchester, lord high treasurer, the chancellor being dead, by her maj.'s command, dissolved this parliament.

A Parl. called.] We have now a space of two years before we meet with another parl. At length, however, it was determined that one should be called, which met at Westminster on the 20th of Jan. 1558. And though we have no initiating speech from the ld. chanc. at the opening of this parl. yet the Journalist hath given us the ceremony of presenting the Speaker of the commons to the queen; who was Wm. Cordell, esq. master of the rolls; whose excuse being not allowed, he was admitted, with the usual protestation. But the Journals of the commons acquaint us, that Nicholas Heath, abp. of York, then ld. chanc. declared, that this parl. was called for granting an aid to her maj. And accordingly the first thing that we find deserving of notice, in their proceedings is, that on the 16th of Feb. a bill was sent up by the commons, for granting a subsidy of one 15th, to the queen, by the laity. The clergy, in convocation, having set a liberal example by taxing themselves in a subsidy of 8s. in the pound, to be paid in 4 years; which was also confirmed by parl. The bill for the lay subsidy, &c. passed the house of lords, nem. con. on the 19th of Feb. and this is all which their Journals say of this matter.—But the Journals of the commons acquaint us, "that on the 24th of Jan. the lords sent a message to that house, desiring that the speaker, with 10 or 12 more, would meet with a committee of the lords; which consisted of 3 earls, 3 bps. and 3 barons. The commons consented to this proposal, and agreed that 21 of their house should meet the lords, and confer on the queen's wants and the state of the nation. This conference continued some time; for it was not till the 4th of Feb. that a bill was first read for a grant of a subsidy and two 15ths and 10ths, as agreed on by the lords and commons in a committee. The bill was read a 2nd time the next day; but the day after, we are told, many arguments were used about it; and, it is probable, that the speaker was desired to know of the queen whether a less supply would not satisfy. For, Feb. 10th, the speaker acquainted the house, "that he had opened unto the queen his commission, touching the grant of the subsidy; which the queen thankfully took, giving them present hearty thanks, and all the realm." So that a grant of a subsidy and one 15th only, Feb. 16th, was all that was given at that time; the subsidy consisted of 4s. in the pound on lands, and 2/8 from 5l. upwards, on goods to be made before the 24th of June next.

Feb. 12, a bill was brought in for the confirmation of the queen's letters patents. It was passed by the lords on the 26th, and was returned by the commons, on the last day of this session, with certain amendments. This bill was designed chiefly for confirming the religious foundations the queen had made. Whilst it was depending in the Lower House, one Mr. Copley, a member, happened to say, in the debate, "that he did not approve of such a general confirmation of all she had given, or might give; lest, under colour of this, she might dispose of the crown from the right heirs to it." The house was much offended at this; and Copley was made to withdraw; he was voted guilty of great irreverence to the queen; and though he asked pardon, and desired it might be imputed to his youth, yet they kept him in the serjeant's hands, till they had sent to the queen to desire her to forgive his offence. She returned for answer "that, at their request, she readily forgave him; but, desired them to examine him, from whence that motion sprung?" Nothing further is entered in the Journals relative to this affair.

An act was made in this parl. "that accessories to murder and diverse felonies should not have their clergy; to which was added, at first, that they might not have the benefit of sanctuary. But because this addition might hinder so useful a bill from passing, the churchmen being very tenacious of their privileges, it was thought convenient to leave it out; and a separate bill was brought in concerning sanctuaries, which was wholly to take them away. Against this Feckenham, then abbot of Westminster, for the sake of his church's privileges, in that particular, made much opposition, and desired to be heard by his council. It was ordered, that he should come down to the house the next day, and they should be heard. Accordingly, the famous Mr. Plowden, and Dr. Story, a civilian, appeared for him, and produced several ancient grants from the kings of this realm, and also the queen's grant for the confirmation of this sanctuary. And then they desired the house to consider for the preservation of the same. It is probable that the whole bill was suffered to drop, for we hear no more of it, and it is certain that did it not pass into a law in this reign.—An act, inflicting 5 years imprisonment, or a large fine, on all those concerned in conveying away and marrying young heiresses, under 16 years of age, passed this session and is printed at length amongst the Statutes at Large.

Privilege of Parl.] The following cases of privilege appear in the Commons Journal:—"Thos. Eymys, burgess for Thuske, complained, that a subpoena was delivered to him to appear in the chancery, wherefore he required the privilege of this house: whereupon sir Clement Higham and Mr. Recorder were sent to the Chancellorto require that the process might be revoked.—Feb. 5, a committee was assigned to examine a matter against Walter Rawley, a burgess, complained of out of the admiral court by dr. Cooke's letter. And on the 8th, Walter Rawley, one of the burgesses for the borough of Wareham, attached in the admiral court, hath a warrant to obtain a writ of privilege."

March 7, the queen came to the lords and passed the bills, sixteen in number, though the Statute Book only says ten. After which the lord chanc. by her majesty's command, prorogued this parl. to the 5th of Nov. At which time, being again assembled, they proceeded to business; which the journals of the lords inform us, was only reading some bills, seemingly of no great importance; except one, the title was, 'That no man shall print any book or ballad, &c. unless he be authorized thereunto by the king and queen's majesties licence, under the great seal of England.' As this is the first restraint to the Liberty of the Press, which we have yet met with, it is the more remarkable; because it shews us, that the art of printing, which had not then been much more than half a century in use, was become so obnoxious to the govt. that they were obliged to have recourse to an act of parl. to restrain it. What fate this bill would have had in the house of commons is uncertain; for, at the third reading, on the 16th of Nov. the clerk breaks off the lords Journal very abruptly. This must be occasioned by the desperate state the queen was then in, who died the next day, Nov. 17th; and by her death, this parl. was dissolved.—This is all we can meet with, worthy of notice, in the authority above-cited; but, the Journals of the Commons furnishes us with the following account; "On the 7th of Nov. the queen sent for the Speaker of the Commons, and ordered him to open to them the ill condition the nation was in; for, though there was a treaty begun at Cambray, yet it was necessary to put the kingdom in a posture of defence, in case it should miscarry. But, the commons were so dissatisfied, that they would come to no resolution. So on the 14th of Nov. the ld. chanc. the ld. treasurer, the duke of Norfolk, the earls of Shrewsbury and Pembroke, the bps. of London, Winchester, Lincoln and Carlisle, the visc. Montacute, the lords Clinton and Howard, came down to the Commons, and sat in that place of the house where the privy counsellors used to sit. The Speaker left his chair, and he, with the privy counsellors that were in the house, came and sat on low benches before them. The ld. chanc. shewed the necessity of granting a Subsidy, to defend the nation, both from the French and the Scots. When he had done, the lords withdrew; but, though the commons entered, both that and the two following days, into the debate, they came to no issue in their consultations."

The Queen's Death.] The reason why the Commons came to no resolution about granting a Subsidy, was doubtless occasioned by the queen's death; since, in all probability, according to the above date, they had not time to frame a bill for that purpose; for, on the 17th of Nov. a message was sent, by the Lords, to the Lower House, requiring the Speaker and their whole house to come to them; when they should hear certain matters that the Lords had to communicate to them. Whereupon, he, with the rest of the house, went up. And the ld. chanc. told them, "That God had taken the queen to his mercy, but had furnished them with another sovereign lady, my lady Elizabeth, her grace." And then willed the knights and burgesses to resort to the palace, where the lords would come and cause her grace to be proclaimed queen of England, &c. and, immediately after, the said proclamation was there made.

Taxes during this Reign.

In her first year Mary had tunnage and poundage for life.—In her 3rd year she had a subsidy from the temporality, and 6s. in the pound from the clergy.—In her 6th year she had one subsidy of 4s. in the pound on lands, and 2/8 on goods; also 8s. in the pound from the clergy, and one 15th from the laity.

In 1554, wheat, at 8s.; rye, 6/8; malt, 5s.—In 1555, wheat, 8s.; rye, 16s.; malt, 5s.—In 1556, wheat, 8s.; malt, 5s.; beans, 6/8.—In 1557, wheat, 8s.; rye, 8s.; malt, 5s.; oats, 10s.; for threshing a qr. of wheat, 1/1; for threshing a qr. of rye, 10d.; for ditto barley, 5d. This year, before harvest, wheat was 2l. 13/4 per qr.; malt, 2l. 4s.; beans and rye, 2l.; pease, 2l. 6/8.; but after harvest, wheat at London was sold for 5s.; malt, 6/8.; rye, 3/4; and in the country, wheat was 4s.; malt, 4/8; rye, 2/8 per qr.; so that a penny wheat-loaf, which before harvest was 11 ounces, was after harvest 56. In this year queen Mary borrowed of the city of London 20,000l. at 12 per cent.—In 1558, wheat, 8s. per qr.; rye, 8s.; barley, 5s.; a good sheep sold for 2/10.

That accessaries in murder and divers felonies shall not have the benefit of clergy. 5. Touching the making of woollen cloths. 6. To inquire of the behaviour of Frenchmen being denizens. 7. To make up the jury with 'circumstantibus,' where the king and queen, or the queen's majesty, is a party. 8. For the punishment of such as shall take away maidens that be inheritors, being within the age of 16 years, or that marry them without the consent of their parents. 9. For the continuation of certain statutes. 10. For the confirmation of the subsidy of the clergy. 11. Of a subsidy and one 15th granted by the temporality.

ELIZABETH.

Mary, the eldest daughter of Henry VIII. being dead without issue, Elizabeth, the youngest, succeeded to the crown. She was proclaimed queen of England, &c. immediately on her sister's demise, and was crowned at Westminster, on the 16th of Jan. 1558-9, by dr. Oglethorpe, bp. of Carlisle; the abp. of York, and some other bps. refusing to assist at the solemnity. Elizabeth retained 13 of her sister's privy counsellors, at that time all zealous Catholics, and added 8 new ones, who were equally attached to the Reformed Religion. The names of the former, were, Heath, abp. of York; Wm. Paulet, marq. of Winchester, lord high treasurer; Hen. Fitz-Alan, earl of Arundel; Francis Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury; Edw. Stanley, earl of Derby; Wm. Herbert, earl of Pembroke; Edward Fenys, baron of Clinton, lord high admiral; Wm. lord Howard, of Effingham, lord chamberlain; sir Thos. Cheney, sir Wm. Petre, sir John Mason, sir Rd. Sackvil, and dr. Wotton, dean of Canterbury. Burnet says, that most of these counsellors had complied with all the changes that had been made in religion, backward and forward, since the latter end of Henry's reign, and were so dextrous at it, that they were still employed in every new revolution. The Protestant counsellors, were, Wm. Parr, marq. of Northampton; Francis Russel, earl of Bedford; sir Thos. Parry, sir Edw. Rogers, sir Amb. Cave, sir Francis Knolles, sir Wm. Cecil, and sir Nich. Bacon, soon after made lord keeper of the great seal.

A Parl. called.] Shortly after the coronation, writs were issued, dated at Westminster, Dec. 1, for calling a parl. to meet there on the 23rd of Jan. following. On which day, being all assembled, and the receivers and triers of petitions appointed, the lord keeper, and other great officers of state, declared to the whole parl. that, by reason of the queen's indisposition, her maj. durst not come down to the house on that day; but had sent a writ of prorogation to prorogue the said parl. to the 25th inst.; and the said writ was read accordingly. The following are the

Jan. 25. the queen was present in the lords; but nothing is entered in the Journals but the introduction of the lord Howard, and the lords Hastings, Darcy, Hunsdon, and St. John of Bletso, by the queen's writs, to take their seats in that house. It is remarkable that the abbot of Westminster sat there this parl. but never after. But though the Journals are silent in the speeches, and fuller proceedings at the beginning of this parl. they are amply supplied by a careful collector of the parliamentary proceedings throughout the whole course of this reign. This was sir Simonds D'Ewes, knt. and bart. whose authority, as it is unquestionable, we shall quote from with the same assurance as from the Journals of both houses, when they are deficient in any material circumstances. And, the lord keeper's speech, at the opening of this parl. being omitted in the Journals, we give it from the above collection as follows:

The Lord Keeper Bacon's Speech, on opening the Parl.] "My lords and masters all; The queen's most excellent maj. having summoned hither her high court of parl. hath commanded me to open and declare the chief causes and considerations that moved her thereunto. And here, my lords, I wish (not without great cause) there were in me ability to do it in such order and sort, as is becoming for her maj.'s honour, and the understanding of this presence; and, as the great weightiness and worthiness of the matter doth require it to be done. The remembrance whereof, and the number of my imperfections to the well performing of it, doth indeed (plainly to speak) breed in me such a fear and dread, that as from a man abashed, and well nigh astonished, you are to hear all that I shall say therein. True it is, that some comfort and encouragement I take, through the hope I have conceived, by that I have seen and heard of your gentle sufferance by others, whereof I look upon equal cause equally with others to be partaker: and the rather, for that I am sure goodwill shall not want in me to do my uttermost; and, also, because I mean to occupy as small a time as the greatness of such a cause will suffer; thinking that to be the meetest medicine to cure your tedious hearing, and mine imperfect and disordered speaking, summarily to say, the immediate cause of this summons and assembly, be consultations, advice, and contentation. For, although divers things that are to be done here in parl. might by means be reformed without parl. yet the queen's maj. seeking in her consultation of importance, contentation by assent, and surety by advice; and therein reposing herself not a little in your fidelities, wisdoms and discretions, meaneth not at this time to make any resolutions in any matter of weight, before it shall be by you sufficiently and fully debated, examined and considered. Now, the matters and causes whereupon you are to consult, are chiefly and principally 3 points. Of those the 1st is of well making of laws, for the according and uniting of these people of the realm into an uniform order of religion, to the honour and glory of God, the establishing of the church, and tranquility of the realm. The 2nd, for the reforming and removing of all enormities and mischiefs, that might hurt or hinder the civil orders and policies of this realm. The 3rd and last, is, advisedly and deeply to weigh and consider the estate and condition of this realm, and the losses and decays that have happened of late to the imperial crown thereof; and therefore to advise the best remedies to supply and relieve the same. For the first, the queen's maj. having God before her eyes, and being neither unmindful of precepts and divine councils, meaneth and intendeth in this conference, first and chiefly there should be sought the advancement of God's honour and glory, as the sure and infallible foundation, whereupon the policies of every good commonwealth are to be erected and knit; and, as the straight line, whereby it is wholly to be directed and governed; and, as the chief pillar and buttress, wherewith it is continually to be sustained and maintained. And, like as the well and perfect doing of this, cannot but make good success in all the rest, so the remiss and loose dealing in this, cannot but make the rest full of imperfections and doubtfulness; which must needs bring with them continual change and alteration; things much to be eschewed in all good governances, and most of all in matters of faith and religion; which of their natures be, and ought to be most stable.—Wherefore her highness willeth, and most earnestly requireth you all, first and principally, for the duty you bear unto God, whose cause this is; and then for the service you owe to her maj. and your country, whose weal it concerneth universally; and for the love you ought to bear to yourselves, whom it toucheth one by one particularly; that in this consultation, you, with all humbleness, singleness, and pureness of mind, confirm yourselves together, using your whole endeavour and diligence, by laws and ordinance, to establish that, which by your learning and wisdom shall be thought most meet for the well performing of this godly purpose: and this without respect of honour, rule or sovereignty, profit, pleasure or ease; or of any thing that might touch any person in estimation or opinion of wit, learning or knowledge; and without all regard of other manner of affection. And therewith, that you will also in this your assembly and conference clearly forbear, and, as a great enemy to good council, fly from all manner of contentions, reasonings and disputations, and all sophistical, captious and frivolous arguments and quiddities, meeter for ostentation of wit, than consultation of weighty matters; comelier for scholars than counsellors; more becoming for schools, than for parl. houses. Besides that commonly they be great causes of much expence of time, and breed few good resolutions. And like as in council, all contention should be eschewed, even so by council provision should be made, that no contentions, contumelious, or opprobrious words, as 'heretic,' 'schismatic,' 'papist,' and such like names being nurses of such seditious factions and sects, be used, but may be banished out of men's mouths; as the causers, continuers, and increasers of displeasure, hate and malice; and as utter enemies to all concord and unity, the very marks that you are now come to shoot at.—Again, as in proceedings herein, great and wary consideration is to be had, that nothing be advised or done, which any way in continuance of time were likely to breed, or nourish any kind of idolatry or superstition: so, on the other side, heed is to be taken, that by no licentious or loose handling, any manner of occasion be given, whereby any contempt, or irreverent behaviour towards God and godly things, or any spice of irreligion might creep in, or be conceived: the examples of fearful punishments that have followed these 4 extremities; I mean, idolatry, superstition, contempt, and irreligion, in all ages and times, are more in number than I can declare, and better known than I can make recital to you of. And yet are they not so many, or better known than by the continual budding benefits and blessings of God to those that have forsaken those extremities, and embraced their contraries. And for your better encouraging to run this right and strait course, although that which is said ought to suffice thereto, I think I may affirm, that the good king Hezekiah had no greater desire to amend what was amiss in his time; nor the noble queen Hester a better heart to overthrow the mighty enemies to God's elect, than our sovereign lady and mistress hath to do that may be just and acceptable in God's sight. Thus forced to this by our duties to God, feared thereto by his punishments, provoked by his benefits, drawn by your love to your country and yourselves, encouraged by so princely a patroness; let us in God's name go about this work, endeavouring ourselves with all diligence (as I have before said) to make such laws, as may tend to the honour and glory of God, to the establishment of his church, and to the tranquillity of the realm. For the 2d, there is to be considered what things by private men devised, be practised, and put in use in this realm, contrary or hurtful to the commonwealth of the same, for which no laws be yet provided; and whether the laws, before this time made, be sufficient to redress the enormities they were meant to remove; and whether any laws made but for a time, be meet to be continued for ever, or for a season. Besides, whether any laws be too severe or too sharp, or too soft and too gentle: to be short, you are to consider all other imperfections of laws made, and all wants of laws to be made, and thereupon to provide the meetest remedies; respecting the nature and quality of the disorder and offence, the inclination and disposition of the people, and of the manner of the time.—For the 3d and last, (a marvellous matter) I cannot see how a good true Englishman can enter into the consideration of it, but it must breed in his breast two contrary effects; comfort, I mean, and discomfort, joy and sadness: for, on the one part, how can a man (calling to his remembrance that God of his divine power and ordinance, hath brought the imperial crown of this realm to a princess, that so nobly, diligently, willingly and carefully doth, by the advice of all the estates of the realm, seek all the ways and means that may be, to reform all disorders and things that be amiss; to continue and make firm that that is good; to detect and discourage those that be dishonest and evil; to execute justice in all points to all persons, and at all times, without rigour and extremity; and to use clemency without indulgence and fond pity.—A princess, I say, that is not, nor ever meaneth to be, so wedded in her own will and fantasie, that for the satisfaction thereof, she would do any thing that was likely to bring any servitude or bondage to her people; or give any just occasion to them of any inward grudge, whereby any tumult or stirs might arise, as hath done of late days, things most pernicious and pestilent to the commonwealth; a princess, that never meaneth or intendeth, for any private affection, to advance the cause or quarrel with any foreign prince or potentate, to the destruction of her subjects, to the loss of any of her dominions, or to the impoverishing of her realm; a princess, to whom nothing, what nothing? no, no worldly thing under the sun is so dear, as the hearty love and good-will of her nobles and subjects; and to whom nothing is so odible, as that they might cause or by any means procure the contrary.) How can, I say, a man remember this wonderful benefit, but of necessity he must needs heartily rejoice, and give God thanks for the same! but, my lords, the handling of the princely virtues of this noble princess, the cause of our rejoicing, of purpose I pretermitt, partly because I ever supposed it not altogether meet for this presence; but, chiefly, for that it requireth a perfect and excellent orator, in whom both art and nature concurs, and not to me, a man in whom both fails. Marry, I wish in my heart, an apt person might oft have meet presence, and just occasion, to handle this matter, as the weightiness of the cause requireth. But, as the causes of our rejoicing for such respects be (thanks be to God) both many and great; so for the causes of our sadness and discomfort, they be neither few nor little. But here upon great cause, as a man perplexed and amazed, I stay, not knowing what is best to be done; very loth I am to utter that which is much unpleasant for me to speak, and as uncomfortable for you to hear: but, because sores and wounds be hardly cured, except they be well opened and searched, therefore constrained of necessity I see I must trouble you with these sad matters. What man, that either loveth his sovereign, his country, or himself; that thinketh of, and weigheth the great decays and losses of honour, strength and treasure; yea, and the peril that hath happened to this imperial crown of late time, but must inwardly and earnestly bewail the same? Could there have happened to this imperial crown a greater loss in honour, strength and treasure, than to lose that place, I mean Calais, which was in the beginning so nobly won, and hath so long time, so honourably and politicly, in all ages and times, and against all attempts, both foreign and near, both of forces and treasons, been defended and kept? Did not the keeping of this breed fear to our greatest enemies, and made our faint friends the more assured, and lother to break? Yea, hath not the winning and keeping of this bred throughout Europe an honourable opinion and report of our English nation?—Again, what one thing so much preserved and guarded our merchants, their traffic and intercourses, or hath been so great a help for the well uttering of our chief commodities; or what, so much as this, hath kept a great part of our sea-coasts from spoiling and robbing? To be short, the loss of this is much greater than I am able to utter, and as yet, as I suppose, is able to be understood by any: and yet, my lords, if this were the whole loss, then might men have some hope in time to come to recover that, that in time hath been thus suddenly and strangely lost: but, when a man looketh further, and considereth the marvellous decays and wastes of the revenues of the crown; the inestimable consumption of the treasure, levied both of the crown and of the subject; the exceeding loss of munition and artillery; the great loss of divers valiant gentlemen of very good service; the incredible sum of monies owing at this present, and in honour due to be paid, and the biting interest that is to be answered for the forbearance of this debt; therewith remembering the strength and mightiness of the enemy, and his confederates, and how ready he is upon every occasion, upon every side, and in every time, to annoy you; and how the time most meet for that purpose draweth on at hand. Again, if a man consider the huge and most wonderful charge, newly grown to the crown, more than ever hath heretofore been wont, and now of necessity to be continued; as first, the maintenance of garrisons in certain places on the sea-coasts, as Portsmouth, with new munition and artillery, besides the new increased charge for the continual maintenance of the English navy to be ever in readiness against all evil happs; the strongest wall and defence that can be against the enemies of this island; and further also, the new augmentation or charge, for the maintenance of a garrison at Berwick, and the frontiers northward. Indeed, I must confess that in those matters mine understanding is but small, and mine experience and time to learn less: but, in my opinion, this doth exceed the antient yearly revenue of the crown. Besides, that double so much is of necessity to be presently spent, about the fortifying of those places in buildings. When, I say, a man remembereth and considereth those things, it maketh him so far from hope of recovery of that that is lost, without some aid or contribution of the subject, that he will judge all to be little enough to make and prepare good defence for that that is left.—Here perchance a question would be asked, (and yet I do marvel to hear a question made of so plain a matter) what should be the cause of this? If it were asked, thus I mean to answer; That I think no man so blind but seeth it, no man so deaf but heareth it, nor no man so ignorant but understandeth it. Marry, withal, I think there is no man so hard-hearted in thinking of it, but for the restoring of it would adventure lands, limbs, yea the life. But now to the remedies, wherein only this I have to say, That as the well looking to the whole universally, is the only sure preservation of every one particularly; so seemeth it of all congruence and reason meet, that every one particularly, by all ways and means, readily and gladly, according to his power, should concur and join to relieve and assist the whole universally. Neither can I see, things standing as they do, how any that loveth his country, or hath wit to foresee his own surety, can be withdrawn from this. Is there any, think you, so mad, that having a range of houses in peril of fire, would not gladly pluck down part, to have the rest preserved and saved? Doth not the wise merchant, in every adventure of danger, give part to have the rest assured? These causes well compared, small difference shall be found. And for this, (a strange matter and scarce credible) with how deaf an ear, and how hardly the queen's maj. may endure to hear of any device that may be burthenous to her subjects, I partly do understand, and divers others partly perceive. Is not the cause marvellous and pitiful, that the necessity and need of this ragged and torn state by misgovernance, should by force so bridle and restrain the noble nature of such a princess, that she is not able to show such liberality and bountifulness to her servants and subjects, as her heart and inclination disposeth her highness unto? What a grief and torment this is to a noble mind! what a grief? surely such a grief, as but to a noble mind who feels it cannot be understood. But for the more plain declaration of her highness's disposition in this matter, she hath commanded me to say unto you, even from my own mouth, That were it not for the preservation of yourselves, and the surety of the state, her highness would sooner have adventured her life, (which our lord long preserve) than she would have adventured to trouble her loving subject with any offensive matter, or that should be burthenous or displeasing unto them; and for the further notifying of her highness's mind herein, she hath commanded me to say unto you, That albeit you yourselves see, that this is no matter of will, no matter of displeasure, no private cause of her own, which in times past have been sufficient for princes pretences, (the more pity!) but a matter for the universal weal of this realm, the defence of our country, the preservation of every man, his wife and family particularly; yet her maj.'s will and pleasure is, that nothing shall be demanded or required of her loving subjects, but that, which they, of their own free wills and liberalities, be well contented, readily and gladly, frankly and freely to offer; so great is the trust that she reposes in them, and the love and affection that her highness beareth towards them, nothing at all doubting, but that they will so lovingly, carefully and prudently, consider and weigh this great and weighty matter, that such provision out of hand be taken therein, as her highness shall be preserved in all honour and royal dignity, and you, and the rest of her loving subjects, in common, quiet and surety. Now, to make an end. The queen's maj.'s pleasure is, that you, her well beloved and trusty knights of her shires and burgesses, according to your laudable custom, shall repair to your common house, and there deliberately and advisedly elect, or rather, amongst so many already elect persons, select one, both grave and discreet, who after he be by you presented, and that presentation by her highness admitted, shall then occupy the office and room of your common mouth, and Speaker; and of your day of presentation the queen's maj. will give you notice."

In the same authority we find the ceremonial speeches made when the commons presented sir Thos. Gargrave, knt. as their speaker.

Act for restoring the First Fruits, &c.] Jan. 30th, a bill was brought into the lords for the restitution and annexation of the First Fruits and
